The 10-year period of the agreement effectively transfers the risks regarding service growth to the provinces. Ontario and several other provinces have preferred to renegotiate after five years. There was a general concern among the provinces regarding the application of the three conditions, particularly in respect to the information requirements which have yet to be determined precisely.

It is not possible to establish the exact financial implications for Ontario given the variables contained in the formula. In addition, the fact that a number of relationships with the established programs' financing agreement have not been fully determined could alter the estimate by as much as about five per cent. However, the general financial impact, according to federal estimates, will be approximately as follows:

In 1978-79 funding under the new agreement, estimated at $155 million, will provide approximately $5 to $10 million more than the present Canada Assistance Plan Agreement. In 1979-80 the introduction of the enrichment and levelling factors combined with the escalator will provide an estimated total transfer to the province of $235 million.

In effect, Ontario will continue to bear the costs of "non-shareable" social services during the 1978-79 fiscal year. Federal transfers in that year are significantly lower than the amount Ontario would have received under the Social Services Act. However, in 1979-80 federal funding will increase by approximately $80 million.

Approximately $55 million of that increase is attributable to the "enrichment factor." The remainder represents the escalator and the first levelling payment. The "enrichment" factor is intended to provide for more comprehensive coverage of social services and further development of services. However, the real effect in Ontario will be to extend federal funding to existing social services, which were previously not cost shared.

This point can be readily illustrated by the fact that Ontario, despite its highly developed system of social services, receives the lowest per capita federal contribution for social services in this country. At present, Ontario's per capita federal contribution is approximately $6 less than the national average of $22 per capita, and $12 to $16 less than the per capita payment received by some provinces.

We recognize this agreement is not an ideal solution, but ideal solutions are not readily attainable at this time. However, the block funding proposal has very positive advantages. It increases federal support of social services in the province and provides Ontario with greater flexibility to determine its own priorities. This flexibility must be matched by responsibility. Ontario has always recognized its responsibilities for social services, even when federal cost-sharing was not available. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that Ontario will continue to do so under this new arrangement.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, I seek your advice in this matter; perhaps it will be necessary to obtain a statement of fact from the Treasurer.

I understand the OHIP premium increase, as announced the other night, is in direct contradiction to section 54 of the British North America Act. It is in contradiction of standing order 86, which applies to our House, and in fact to section 90 of the British North America Act, the essence of which says that no tax shall be imposed without legislation. The Treasurer, in his statement, made it quite clear he was collecting the OHIP premium increase as a tax revenue source.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that such a move is in clear contradiction to our standing orders as well as to the direction given by the British North America Act, and I would ask you to make a ruling on that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking me to rule on the British North America Act. I'll take a look at the hon. member's point of privilege to see whether or not it is a prima facie case, then I'll decide as to whether or not I will rule on whether it's in conflict with the British North America Act.

Mr. Sargent: You are talking to a lawyer now.

Mr. Breithaupt: Can you find that out by the end of the question period?

ORAL QUESTIONS

Mr. S. Smith: I have a question of the Treasurer, now that we're not only eating inflation but living and breathing it as well in Ontario.

Mr. Kennedy: Wrestle it to the ground like your leader did. Trudeau is wrestling it to the ground, haven't you noticed?

Mr. Nixon: He wasn't even prepared to admit he's made a typo.

Mr. S. Smith: Actually, he has escalated an obvious typographical error to an art form, but we'll allow him to do that.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Let's have the question.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. S. Smith: Will the Treasurer delay the implementation of the 37 per cent OHIP premium increase, now scheduled for May 1, pending consideration of that increase, and also pending the consideration of alternatives that might be cheaper, and certainly more equitable, in this House? Would he permit us to consider the possibilities of other alternative ways of funding our health care system, admittedly an expensive system, rather than proceeding on May 1 with the 37 per cent increase in OHIP premiums?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I'm quite sure in the debate—which begins not today, not until Monday as I understand it—that the House and certainly the government will look forward to the alternatives put forward by the Liberal Party to that particular premium increase.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary: Since my request was for the House to have an opportunity to consider the possible alternatives that might be suggested on all sides of the House, would he consider delaying the implementation of the increase, which is at present scheduled to occur very soon, starting on May 1—and plans have to be made to collect that of course—and if he has done studies himself concerning the relative efficacy of these possible alternatives, would he be kind enough to table those studies as quickly as possible so that we can consider them in the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, as I recall, there was rather extensive documentation in the budget of two years ago. If there is other documentation, I will be glad to make it available to the Leader of the Opposition. The regulation was brought forward to cabinet yesterday and was passed, and I assume has been signed. Certainly, if the Leader of the Opposition comes forward, or anyone comes forward, with alternatives that make sense, I can only repeat that we'd be glad to consider them.

Mr. Cassidy: Given the fact that a married taxpayer earning $10,000 a year with a couple of kids will now pay more in OHIP premiums annually than in provincial and federal income tax, given the fact that farmers and small businessmen will be particularly hard hit by this particular increase and given that wage earners in the province are being held to a wage increase of six per cent per annum this year under the AIB rules, how can the Treasurer justify a 37½ per cent increase in OHIP premiums?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I doubt that question was supplementary but I will be—

Mr. MacDonald: Are you the Speaker or just provincial Treasurer?

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—glad to answer it.

An hon. member: It's not your job to rule.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think one looks at a variety of ways to increase revenues, be it in direct taxes or be it in terms of premium revenues. I looked at a number of alternatives and, in terms of the amount of money which I felt was necessary to add to the revenues of the province, this seemed in many ways the most equitable and fair way to do it.

Mr. Cassidy: Equitable?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would point out, to put this in perspective, that a roughly similar amount of money to be raised under the personal income tax would require raising our rate from about 44 to 48 or, alternatively, I suppose one might have looked to the retail sales tax and raised the retail sales tax from seven per cent to eight per cent, which would have brought in nearly $300 million.

Mr. Mackenzie: That's a Tory solution.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would point out that one of the features of the present system—and we look for improvements for it—is that in the first instance it is largely paid by employers, and the figures are in the budget. It is true that in many instances it is a taxable benefit. I would point out that, as opposed to going to the retail sales tax or some other route, retail sales tax would be paid by many more people whereas, if memory serves me correctly, 1.82 million people, or something over 20 per cent of the people of the province, will not pay the premium at all because of either their age group or their income level.

All in all, in looking at a series of alternatives, this appeared to me to be the most appropriate way to raise that amount of money, bearing also in mind that we attempt to relate to the public one of our most pressing problems, that is, the cost of health care. It is a large bill and the premium does assist in reminding us of that fact. I am sure that today and yesterday there are many people in the province who are more aware of the large health bill which the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) presents to this Legislature than perhaps they were last Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. Cassidy: You can't have it both ways.

Mr. Mackenzie: You take it away from them, don't you?

Mr. Bradley: Supplementary: Can the minister tell this House exactly how much and what additional financial burdens he has placed on the various levels of governments, for example, local and regional governments, boards of education and transit commissions, especially since most of these pay either a part of the benefits or the entire benefits as they relate to OHIP premiums? Doesn't he realize that these local governments and school boards will now have to find millions of dollars more to meet these costs and will likely have to raise property taxes to do so?

Mr. Warner: It's called double taxation.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would put the matter in perspective. I know in terms of our own payroll, I think on a full-year basis—and in our case it will not be a full year and for the municipalities it will be two-thirds of a year only—

Mr. Wildman: But next year are you going to lower them?

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—the Chairman of Management Board (Mr. Auld) has made a rough calculation that it increases our costs by 0.71 per cent on this particular cost.

Mr. Warner: An extra $2 million in Toronto for property taxes.

Mr. Cooke: You increase the costs and decrease the grants.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would point out to my friends that, for example, what I am budgeting for and in the printed estimates, in respect of our payments in lieu of taxes, which is a tax in effect levied on us by the municipalities on properties, we estimate this year that those payments will go from something like $45 million to $49 million because of rising mill rates. We pay for their rising mill rates. I see no harm in asking them to pay what I would guess to be about a half a per cent increase.

Mr. Cassidy: To the Treasurer, Mr. Speaker: Is it not correct that the only reason the Treasurer is raising the health insurance tax is because this is the only tax he can raise without coming to the Legislature? That is what is happening.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Is the member answering his own question? No, Mr. Speaker, that is not correct. Obviously, we have bills before this House introduced by my colleague, the Minister of Revenue (Mr. Maeck) and my colleague the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller), which raise and lower taxes.

Mr. Cassidy: Is the minister prepared, then, to bring in legislation—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. S. Smith: Supplementary: In regard to the Treasurer's contention that by laying a $144 million bill on working people they will suddenly recognize how much health care costs, doesn't he think it entirely more likely that people, faced with paying this amount of money, may well decide to start to get their money's worth and actually make more use of the system rather than less use of it?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: That's nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Henderson: People are honest.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I can only say if that is the alternative or part of the alternative being proposed by the Liberal Party, I look forward to his suggestions as to where we are going to find this money.

Mr. S. Smith: Then why raise the OHIP premiums to make people know what it costs?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I will say this, I have a little more respect for the medical profession and the hospital administrators than the tenor of that question implies.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary, the hon. member for Scarborough-Ellesmere.

Mr. Warner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Having respect for that group, plus the patients of Ontario and the people of Ontario who are faced with this huge increase, I would ask the Treasurer two supplementaries: I'd like his comment on the fact that because he is raising a revenue tax he is violating the principle of taxation by legislation. Secondly, how can he equate his statement of wanting equity with the fact of double taxation which he has now put on every urban centre in this province?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: On every who?

Mr. Warner: Urban centre in this province. For Toronto, it's $2 million.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't know the distinction between urban centres and rural centres; I assume it has something to do with the fact that that party doesn't represent any rural centres.

Mr. Wildman: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Makarchuk: He's got more land than you have, Darcy.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: If it is a $2 million bill to Metropolitan Toronto, it will also be felt in similar amounts by townships around this province. But I would simply point out that we will pay our share of raising mill rates, and they in turn pay their share of premiums, if they have negotiated that way, and that was their decision.

Mr. Warner: Will the Treasurer answer the first question?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member raised the first question as a matter before the Speaker, and I think the Speaker would want to reply first. I am not going to speak to that point; I am not a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. Martel: You are a plumber.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see no purpose in allowing additional supplementaries. There will be ample opportunity during the budget debate to explore all of the facets of the increase in OHIP premiums.

JOB CREATION

Mr. S. Smith: A question of the Treasurer, Mr. Speaker: Given the fact that there has been an admitted shortfall of 16,000 jobs created in 1977, and given the action that the Treasurer suggests in order to deal with the creation of temporary jobs by paying part of the salary for each of the temporary employees, can he explain to this House why he will not use basically the same type of mechanism, as we originally suggested, to pay part of the salary for permanent or semi-permanent jobs that are desperately needed in the work force?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Again I would make the point that within our resources we feel that we can do a job in terms of summer employment. I would point out to the hon. member that the beneficiary in terms of a savings in expenditures, or therefore a reduction in expenditures, will be mainly to the unemployment insurance fund. If the member feels that there should be more programs for direct job employment, I don't disagree with him, but I think that it has to come from the government to which will accrue the savings—namely, those funds which are going—

An hon. member: Very convenient.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —from general revenues of the government of Canada into the unemployment insurance fund, something like $2 million. If on the other hand, the member feels that I should be spending more money on direct job creation, then I would have to ask him where he would suggest—and I look forward to his alternatives there—I cut expenditures in this current year—or where he would suggest I raise revenues.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary: of course, I'm tempted to answer the minister's question, except that it doesn't work that way—

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Let's hear it.

Mr. S. Smith: —but he found $105 million in one week. That's the kind of fat he has in the budget.

An hon. member: What's your alternative, Stuart?

Mr. S. Smith: But let's deal now with the question of the Unemployment Insurance Commission saving the money that might come from any job-creation initiative taken at the provincial level. Why has the minister not been negotiating with the federal government since last summer to arrange that any program taken as a provincial initiative in this manner, to pay part of the salaries, would in fact be met by a partial or complete compensation from the unemployment insurance fund, something that might have achieved a desirable result, met with public acclaim and very likely might have achieved a successful negotiated position with the federal government?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The hon. member's friends said no.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Let me assure the Leader of the Opposition that those suggestions have been made by several ministers on this side of the House together with their federal colleagues—and, not privately, most publicly, by the first minister of this province.

Mr. S. Smith: Where?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: At the first ministers' conference.

Mr. S. Smith: In February? You had a year to talk about that.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That's exactly what the Premier said at the conference. We've been saying it before and that's exactly what he said at the conference.

Mr. Sweeney: We haven't heard anything since Bramalea.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would have to say, though, that the response has not been forthcoming from Ottawa. I really thought, from that smiling picture—

An hon. member: Always blame Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —of the Leader of the Opposition with the Prime Minister of Canada, which appeared on the front page of the Star—

Mr. Breithaupt: It is closer than the Treasurer ever got.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —several weeks ago, that's probably what they were negotiating and talking about.

Mr. Sweeney: The Treasurer is not answering the question.

An hon. member: Passing the buck again.

Mr. S. Smith: There is no leadership in this province at all.

Mr. Cassidy: A supplementary to the Treasurer, and I hope he will not just take partisan shots on this.

Mr. Havrot: You're so pure, oh boy. Pure baloney.

Interjection.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cassidy: I would hope he could get down to the job of providing jobs for people in this province. Can the Treasurer say, in view of the fact that there is nothing being done for the 137,000 young people who are out of work today, what those young people should do during the period of time when his summer job program will not apply?

Mrs. Campbell: Hold their breath.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Some of them, of course, will undoubtedly find employment. Some of them will return to school. Some of them will go into the Ontario Career Action Program.

Mr. Swart: Most of them will remain unemployed.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Hopefully, the government of Canada may develop something using unemployment insurance funds; and some of them undoubtedly will find jobs in a healthy and expanding private sector. But they're not going to find a permanent job—

Mr. Makarchuk: That's what you've been saying for years.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —through higher government expenditures by this government. I say that frankly.

Mr. Cassidy: The Treasurer's attitude is "Let them eat cake."

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, the Treasurer is looking for sources of revenue to handle this. Now that his government is going out of the mortgage business, he has a $1 billion portfolio; why doesn't he put that on the market to the private sector and pay for this increase in OHIP?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I recognize that the member hasn't been here every day, but I think before—

Mrs. Campbell: He has been ill!

An hon. member: Neither have you, Darcy.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —he asks that question perhaps he should talk to the financial critic of his party who thought that suggestion was disastrous.

Mr. Kerrio: He didn't miss anything, Darcy. It's the same story as last year.

An hon. member: The member has egg all over his face.

Mr. Sargent: Why doesn't the Treasurer answer the question himself?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: If the member for Grey-Bruce would read the budget he would find that's what we are doing.

Mr. Sargent: I've got it right here. It says over the next few years.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: But if he would speak to his financial critic he would find that the Liberal Party apparently thinks that's the wrong idea. Clean up your act over there!

Mr. S. Smith: The government is going to do nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary. The hon. member for London Centre.

Mr. Peterson: You're flogging off the furniture to pay for the debts you've created.

I just want to understand how the Treasurer can reconcile what he has just said in response to these last three questions with an important statement in the study put out by his ministry, reassessing the scope for fiscal policy in Canada. He says this: "The composition of unemployment in Ontario and the rest of Canada merits more attention. Skilled, permanent jobs for youth is highlighted as the pre-eminent challenge to governments in the immediate future. Required are fundamental structural changes in the economy to enhance competitiveness, increase exports and generate well-paying jobs in the private sector."

I want to know what the Treasurer is doing in terms of the structural changes? What is he doing in terms of energy policy and industrial policy? What is he relying on, in fact, except a devalued Canadian dollar that he is hoping is going to drag through his growth predictions and provide temporary relief in the imbalance in tourist funds? He has nothing substantive.

Mr. Speaker: The question has been asked.

Mr. Peterson: He is relying on our deficient dollar to help him in the short run. I want to know what he is doing in terms of permanent structural changes in the economy of this province?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, the member asked a number of questions. He asked what we were doing about an energy policy. We are supporting Ontario Hydro—which is more than I can say for his party—and there are going to be jobs at Elliot Lake because of it. That is point one.

Mr. Kerrio: You are giving a lot more support to Steve Roman, though.

Mr. Cassidy: That's your policy?

Mr. Lewis: Don't forget your storm doors.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, in terms of structural changes, I don't think we will debate structural changes this afternoon.

Mr. Peterson: You used the word here. You used it right here.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't think we are debating structural changes during the question period.

Mr. Peterson: You used it.

Mrs. Campbell: He asked a question. You should answer it.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Was that statement tabled on Tuesday? No, it was tabled two weeks ago.

Mr. Peterson: Yes it was. It was also filed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question has already been asked. If you don't expect an answer why do you ask the question? You have already asked the question. Have the courtesy to listen to the answer.

Mr. Peterson: My apologies, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, structural changes will not take place in the economy overnight. Structural changes imply a medium-term or long-term commitment to certain objectives which were enunciated and enunciated well by the 11 first ministers of this country. Among those structural changes—what amount to structural changes—some of them are a commitment to balance budgets, and we are working to that end; a commitment to reduce the share of government spending and government take in the total economy, and we are working to that end—

Mr. Cassidy: That question was a mistake.

Mr. Wildman: What about branch plants?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —a commitment to deregulation and a commitment to more competition in certain areas, and legislation in some areas has already been introduced in the House.

Mr. Cassidy: We have heard this refrain before and it isn't working. You're destroying jobs.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member talks about an energy policy and I think securing long-term supplies of uranium at the right price is one of those policies and we have done that.

I say to the hon. member he made the same speech last year and we are still waiting for his solutions. Let's hear them.

An hon. member: You wonder why the House gets unruly when we have to listen to garbage like that.

Mr. S. Smith: The only leadership is coming from this side of the House.

PROPERTY TAXATION

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have a new question for the Treasurer.

Given the fact that the government recognizes the need of senior citizens for additional income, and given the findings of a recent social planning council study in Toronto that nearly half the single senior citizens in this city are living below the poverty line and are forced to choose between adequate housing and a decent diet, will the Treasurer explain why the government has not decided to implement the increased tax credits now, but has decided to defer them to some date in the future when market value assessment comes in?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I think the member might want to address that question to the minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Norton). Obviously if we are talking about the necessity of income supplementation—

Mr. Makarchuk: What about the tax credits?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —if we are talking about an increase which is necessary in GAINS, then so be it.

Mr. Foulds: We're talking about property tax credits.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: What the paper in the budget addresses itself to is one aspect, one part of the expenses of our senior citizens, and that is property taxes.

Mr. Foulds: The flimflam was in your budget.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is what that paper is all about, a reduction in the burden of property taxes, if there is one, and that is what it is related to.

Mr. Foulds: When?

Mr. Martel: Ten years coming.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It is not related to a whole variety of other things.

I would also say that I don't think we on this side of the House accept that particular document of the social planning council as the gospel which the leader of the third party accepts it as.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: If I could put the question in more specific terms, why is the Treasurer deferring property tax relief when senior citizens need that relief now?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We would like to see some progress, and I hope to see some progress, towards property tax reform. I recognize that the member opposite thinks that the taxpayers of this province are a bottomless pit who can be mined at any given point in time.

Mr. Bounsall: That is what we are concerned about.

Mr. Makarchuk: It is the other way around.

Mr. Cassidy: You are saying senior citizens can be mined.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: There are undoubtedly going to be certain shifts in many municipalities in this province, with market value assessment particularly, aside from tax reform.

[3:00]

Mr. Martel: That's been 10 years coming.

Mr. Cooke: Answer the question.

An hon. member: You are raising OHIP premiums 37 per cent.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It seems to me that is the time to make the change or to begin to make the change, coincident with those shifts which may take place through the assessment process.

Ms. Gigantes: They need it now.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I know the member would have us do it twice. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in fairness to the general taxpayers of the province it may be better to do it at one time rather than to do it twice. I know the member would not agree.

Ms. Gigantes: Is your mother hungry, Darcy?

Mr. Mackenzie: Let them starve a little longer, eh?

Mr. Peterson: I'd like to know just what the Treasurer's philosophy is. Is there only one taxpayer or are there many taxpayers? On the one hand he argues that there is only one taxpayer paying all of these taxes; on the other hand he says there is no point in solving unemployment here because we are only helping the federal government with their unemployment insurance premiums. What is the Treasurer's view on that matter?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, if I can be so bold as to suggest—

Mrs. Campbell: You are always bold.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —the question, and it was a good one, was about senior citizens. I don't look on senior citizens in this province in the context that the question was asked as being "one of the taxpayers." We put them in a little bit different category than that.

Mr. S. Smith: Yes, hostages for your tax reform. No tax reform, nothing for the senior citizens.

Mr. Swart: By way of supplementary: In view of his comments about fairness in taxation does the Treasurer not realize that according to his own documents tabled last year the net increase in property tax to those in the $5,000 family income range has been 73 per cent and those in the $7,500 income range has been 61 per cent in the last three years, whereas the average in Ontario has only been 43 per cent? Does he not therefore think it would be fair to—

Interjection.

An hon. member: They're all frightened of comebacks.

Mr. Swart: —increase the property tax credits to senior citizens this year so they do not pay more than the rest of the taxpayers in this province?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the member to the budget paper which details—

An hon. member: This is just the beginning, Darcy. Wait until next week.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —the amount of assistance which is already being given to senior citizens. It is our pledge to do more.

Interjections.

An hon. member: Not this year.

Mr. Swart: Next year.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: But we will do so responsibly—

Mr. Swart: But not this year, what kind of a future—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —and we will bring it before the House when we do it.

Mr. Makarchuk: That is what you have been pledging for the last 30 years.

Mr. Foulds: Like the OHIP increase.

An hon. member: When the next election comes.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: But I would say to the member that if he reads that budget paper he will find that the taxpayers of this province have assumed their responsibilities for senior citizens in many and dramatic ways. And the proportion of taxes already paid by all of us to assist senior citizens is very high already.

Mr. Swart: Most of all the senior citizens, the tax is paid by them.

An hon. member: Half the seniors in Toronto live in poverty.

Interjections.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary.

Mr. Cassidy: Given the fact that it is 12 years since the Smith committee recommended the move to market value assessment and the government has been farfing around with that ever since that time—

Mr. S. Smith: What?

Mr. Cassidy: —what assurance do we have that the senior citizens will not have to wait for a further 12 years before this property tax relief is given?

Mr. Conway: What was that word, Michael?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would say that the answer to that question rests in part with all members of this House. If they are prepared to be responsible, then we can get on with the job.

Interjections.

Mr. Martel: You have postponed it at every election

An hon. member: We'll bring it in if you'll support it.

Mr. Lewis: Just stop farfing around over there and get on with it. Just do your job.

Mr. Cassidy: I felt, Mr. Speaker, that the English language needed to be enriched with a new word.

Mr. Lewis: Hear, hear!

Interjections.

Mr. Cassidy: There are a few other words that are needed to describe this budget and this Treasurer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nixon: There is a perfectly good one already, why don't you use it?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Define farfing.

REFORESTATION

Mr. Cassidy: A question of the Minister of Natural Resources. There he is; I can see him peeking around the government whip.

In view of the fact that the budget contains no real increase for the Ministry of Natural Resources, can the minister say what has happened to the government promise of two trees to be planted for every one cut, which was so clearly outlined in the Bramalea charter?

Mr. Kennedy: It is winter time. You don't plant trees in winter.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I am sure when you get the details of the budget I think, you will discover that my regeneration moneys have been increased by between $5 million and $6 million for the coming year.

An hon. member: What percentage is that in trees?

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Since he is a member of the cabinet can the minister explain why there was absolutely no reference to the needed rebuilding of the forestry industry of this province in the budget which was handed down this week?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, there were no tax changes related to it, therefore there was no need to mention it.

Hon. Mr. Snow: That will come in the estimates, you know.

Mr. Foulds: Supplementary: Is the minister therefore indicating to us that there will be no changes in the Crown Timber Act and subsequent tax changes with regard to his last statement?

Hon. F. S. Miller: No, I am not indicating that.

Mr. MacDonald: You're going to have it both ways.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary; the hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Wildman: Is it correct that the ministry has circulated a new code of ethics, or a rejuvenated code of ethics, for its foresters or for its staff which admonishes them not to publicly criticize the forestry program of the ministry?

Hon. F. S. Miller: How could they? It's perfect.

Mr. Martel: A perfect mess.

Mr. Reid: Who believes it?

STUDENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Sweeney: A question for the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Mr. Speaker: In releasing the new student grant program today, how can the minister say that he is firmly convinced that the new program brings greater equity and will be to the advantage of every student when in three significant ways it is clearly a disadvantage: post-graduate and professional school students can't qualify; families with even lower net income than previously are expected to contribute; and, finally, students' living expense allowances are going to be even lower than those qualified under the federal plan?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: There's no doubt that I can say that because, somewhat like my friend in the Ministry of Natural Resources, almost the perfect plan evolved.

Mr. Deans: Oh, don't get smart.

Mr. Martel: For what class of people?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: I won't go quite so far as to say perfection; that I will leave to my confrère the Minister of Natural Resources.

Mr. Makarchuk: What have you guys been eating over there?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: Let me say to the hon. member that I think when he has an opportunity to take a close look at the information he now has in his hand he will see that indeed he is not quite correct on several items. Let me give the hon. member an illustration that perhaps makes the point. I hope so.

Mr. Speaker, this perhaps will be a long reply but I don't know of any other way of addressing the problem.

We're trying to compare this year's plan with last year's plan and in preparation I had these figures compiled.

Taking the gross income of a family as $8,000, the parental contribution last year would have been zero; it would be zero this year.

With a gross income of $10,000 the parental contribution under the new plan would be $200 if the student is away, and zero if at home.

With a gross income of $12,000, the parental contribution would be $672 under the old plan. Under the new plan it would be $555 if the student is away from home and $70 if the student is at home—which is considerably less, about $600 less, in that particular illustration.

With a gross income of $14,000, the contribution would have been $1,045 under the old plan. Under the new plan it would be $995 if the student is away from home and $440 if the student is at home.

I could go on to give the hon. member other illustrations. The point that must be made at this time is that if he will take the figures and do them one by one, he will find that the contribution from the parents is less than it was last year—in contradiction to what the hon. member originally thought.

Mr. Sweeney: Let me say, before I ask a supplementary question, that we also have selected three examples and they don't work that way. Let me use one precise one, and I would ask the minister to explain how this works: A parent with a net income—net income meaning what they have got to spend—of $6,600 can be expected to contribute; that means a net income of $127 a week. How can the minister expect any parent in those circumstances to make a contribution? That's even lower than it was last year. It depends on where one picks the examples.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: No, I think it doesn't. First of all, in reply, to give some details of that, I think the member opposite would agree that we likely will have fewer students in the system next year than last year. We have more money. Fewer people, indeed, will be therefore applying for the assistance. It follows, I believe, that there would be more assistance per student. That's pretty basic and there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. Sweeney: No, it doesn't follow.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: There's more money in the program and there are fewer students.

Mr. Sweeney: There was $23 million left over in the budget one year.

Mr. B. Newman: Oh, for crying out loud!

Mr. Sweeney: Just because the minister puts it into the program doesn't mean he is going to use it.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: It is a little difficult—I accept this criticism of the plan. In just two minutes of looking at it, one cannot comprehend all of the details. The member asked me where his information was. It was put in the mail to him this morning. I sent him a copy five minutes ago. I suspect he has not had time to look at the whole program and understand it.

Mr. Sweeney: They have been available for months.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: They have not been available to members for months. They were available at 10 o'clock this morning.

Mr. Bounsall: Supplementary: How can the minister possibly explain and justify for those roughly 13,000 students who will be on the Experience '78 program that when they subtract their allowance expenses from that, there is not enough money to pay the assumed savings that would be required under this program?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: That is another gross illustration of the fact that members of the New Democratic Party, particularly, don't understand the program. For many years students have wished that their contributions would be assessed on actual earnings. This year, for the very first time, that is exactly what's going to happen. There is no assumed contribution. It is a direct result of an assessment on the actual earnings. I am afraid the member is absolutely incorrect in the statement he has just made.

I have had the advantage of seeing the release by the New Democratic Party. I can't begin to tell them the number of errors they have made. I know it wasn't the member himself but it does have the New Democratic logo on it. There are innumerable errors in the arithmetic in their press release.

Mr. Lewis: You're just falling apart over there. All of you are coming apart at the seams. There is nothing left.

Mr. Cassidy: If it was so good, the minister would have brought it out two months ago.

Mr. Deans: I have a question for the Minister of Labour but I can't ask it because I must ask the Solicitor General something with regard to his statement.

OPP ROLE IN STRIKE

Mr. Deans: I want to ask the Solicitor General whether or not the provisions contained in the in-service training manual on strikes that is available, he says, in every detachment library, could be table in this House in order that we might determine whether it is appropriate within the direction given for an OPP officer to attempt to drag a woman out of a car while her seatbelt is still in place and while the car is still moving?

Further, I would like to ask him whether it says in there that it is appropriate for the OPP to go into a plant to speak to union employees about the possibility of a strike without first checking and discussing the matter with their representatives? I want to ask him whether he thinks it is right and necessary for the OPP to be involved at all until there is an evident problem?

Finally, I would like to ask him whether he doesn't believe that by the very nature of their intervention, which was unwarranted and unjustified, starting on Friday afternoon right through until Monday morning when they moved themselves into a situation which to that point had created absolutely no problem, the OPP were not the major part of the problem and not part of the solution at all?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I am sure the manual to which the hon. member refers does not specifically mention an incident regarding a female employee of the plant with her seatbelt on.

Mr. Deans: The woman got hurt, by the way.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: This is the first I have heard of this and I have had representation both from the union and from the police officers in the area.

Mr. MacDonald: Are you going to investigate it?

Mr. McClellan: How come you find out these things so late?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Dealing with the second question, which I feel is much more relevant, I think the hon. member should realize that some days before the strike took place a representative of the union attended at the police detachment headquarters—

Mr. Deans: One woman.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Right—and asked certain questions regarding picket lines and the conduct of the employees and questions of that nature, very valid questions.

Ms. Gigantes: Very responsible.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Management also wanted the same information, and as a result the sergeant of the detachment decided that everybody should know what the situation was—

Mr. Lewis: That's just a crock. What a dream world you live in.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—what their rights were, and what their obligations would be in a situation of that kind. I think it is important to realize that these women workers have just been organized and the union has just been certified.

Mr. Lewis: That's right.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I realize that, and because of that they wouldn't be aware of all their rights—

Mr. Mackenzie: Two dollars and eighty-five cents an hour in a sweat shop.

Mr. Cassidy: That's why you have to be particularly sensitive.

Mr. Warner: They've got a union to tell them that.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—and what could take place in the event that the strike occurred. I'm saying that the employees, because they were employees of a plant that was just newly organized—

An hon. member: The Minister of Labour is really protecting the women in this province.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—and because there were certain uncertainties as to what their rights were—

Mr. Cassidy: You're unbelievable. That's unbelievable.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—it seemed to make sense to the sergeant of the detachment that everybody in the plant should have that information—

Mr. Cassidy: That means you condone intimidation across this province.

Mr. Deans: They had no right to make that decision.

Mr. Lewis: That's terrible, terrible.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—and that is why he attended at the plant. I will say this, that this is certainly not a routine procedure by the OPP.

Mr. Foulds: It should not even be an extraordinary one.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: It is not, and I would hope it would not be.

Mr. Martel: What would happen again?

Mr. Foulds: What have you told them?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: But I think under the circumstances there are reasons here why it's occurred, and another point I want to make is that because the police had this prior information and because the police were told there was a certain amount of intimidation and there could be violence on the picket line—

Mr. Deans: By whom?

Mr. Lewis: Intimidation by whom?

Mr. Warner: By management. They were meddling.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—there was an obligation by the police to deal with the situation to avoid any trouble before the strike took place.

Mr. Deans: Supplementary question: What investigation was undertaken by the police to determine whether or not the information given to them with regard to intimidation, or whatever, was even valid? Let me ask a further supplementary so the minister can answer them both while he's on his feet. Is it true that he said that it was justified because a lot of the employees really didn't want the union anyway?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: No, Mr. Speaker. I should have probably have made a point of privilege while answering the hon. member's question. I didn't say that which was attributed to me in this morning's Globe—the words, "he added that only half the workers of the plant want the union."

What I said to the reporter was that there was a division of opinion there, that there was some exception by a number of employees as to whether or not they wanted that strike. That's what I said.

Mr. Deans: That's irrelevant. They've been certified.

Mr. MacDonald: In this country, 60 per cent of the people aren't in favour of you at election time; that's a division of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The members don't want to take it out of context, that's why they wanted to know about the legal aspects of the strike; and the other point that I made in reference to the bus was incorrect as well.

Mr. Lupusella: Taking into particular account incidents which have taken place too often in the province of Ontario—

Mr. Deans: Does the minister ever wonder why there are difficulties in picket lines? It's the mentality of the whole thing.

Mr. Lupusella:—is the minister ready to introduce legislation regulating strike-breaking in the province of Ontario in order that those incidents will never take place again?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Is that like selling hydro to the poor people in the States?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, that of course is the whole argument about the question of crossing the picket lines. It is something the Minister of Labour would be concerned with, and I would suggest—

Mr. Cassidy: She's not concerned about it.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—that it probably should be debated rather than answered in this instance.

Mr. Lewis: Supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: This was raised last week. The original question was a four-part question. His second supplementary was a three-part question. There were 17 interjections while the minister was trying to answer. We have spent enough time on it. The hon. member for Armourdale.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: You should send me a copy of your question, Ian.

Mr. Deans: It will be in Hansard.

CLOSING OF SCHOOLS

Mr. McCaffrey: For the Minister of Education: My question concerns the matter of declining student enrolment in Ontario, and the related question of school closings and the Jackson commission. Am I correct in assuming that the ministry does not have a position with regard to school closings in this province—

An hon. member: That's typical.

Mr. McCaffrey:—and if that is correct, is it reasonable to assume that that position will be unchanged after the Jackson commission report?

Mr. Martel: Yes, no position afterwards, right.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, it is not reasonable to claim we do not have a position. The position is very clear. It is one of local autonomy—investing the authority to provide accommodation and to make arrangements for accommodating the students, and that this is to be done by the local school board. It is in the local school board's jurisdiction and authority to close schools if it so desires.

MANAGEMENT STUDY

Mr. Blundy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Community and Social Services. Was his ministry spokesman correctly reported in the Globe and Mail on February 15 in saying that the only reason a full copy of the Currie Coopers and Lybrand management study of the ministry was not released was that it was too technical and expensive to print? Was it for those reasons we must rely on an unsatisfactory edited version? Why can't we have the full report so that its recommendations can be seen in their full context?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I don't know to whom that statement was attributed. The fact is that what is being referred to as a report, I would rather refer to as background working documents. Also they are rather bulky, and there are only four copies that have been prepared.

Mr. S. Smith: We'll come to your office and read them.

Hon. Mr. Norton: There were four copies for the members of the steering committee within the ministry. This included myself, my former deputy, my present deputy and the representative of Management Board whom we invited to sit on the steering committee.

Mr. Martel: You can give one away from the former deputy.

Hon. Mr. Norton: There are no other copies in existence to my knowledge. I don't have any intention of having additional copies of those working documents prepared.

Mr. S. Smith: We'll read them in your office, how's that?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I did take steps to immediately release, upon receipt of the report, the full range of recommendations.

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I can assure the House that if I were to go to the expense and the problem of trying to reproduce additional copies for the members, they would be terribly disappointed because there is no scandal in the place. There are no personalities referred to. There is none of the stuff that opposition members think is in there.

Mr. S. Smith: Can we read it in your office or not?

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition is repeating himself.

Hon. Mr. Norton: In fact, they are just what I said they are. They are working documents. As far as I'm concerned, for the present and until we have continued to deal with them, I'm not hiding a thing.

Mr. McClellan: Then let's read them.

Mr. S. Smith: What are you hiding?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Members have copies of every recommendation that is made in that report.

Mr. S. Smith: Then we will come to your office and read it.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I have no intention of producing the working papers at this point in time until we have proceeded further.

Mr. Warner: Then let us read them.

Mr. S. Smith: Then what are you hiding? We'll come to your office.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I would think it would be one of the most disappointing exercises members might ever engage in.

Mr. S. Smith: Then we will be disappointed.

Mr. Blundy: Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary, when the ministry spends $70,000 on a report such as this, does it not seem reasonable that the members of this House, at least, should see that report and benefit from it? I understand this is not the first time the distribution of a report by that ministry has not been made available. If it's going to cost the ministry that much we'll take up a collection and Xerox the matter in the minister's office.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Actually, the Xerox machine in my office is usually busier than to allow for that length of time to be taken up.

Mr. Foulds: I thought it had been replaced by a shredder.

Hon. Mr. Norton: There is simply nothing that is being hidden in the report. I can assure the member that I am being open with them on that point.

Mr. Cassidy: Then make it available.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Perhaps I can take it in excerpts and read it during statements from the ministry from time to time. If members wish, I would be quite happy to do that.

Mr. Martel: Invite us over to read it.

Mr. S. Smith: We'll read it in your office.

Hon. Mr. Norton: But I'm not intending to spend the money of the taxpayers of this province to duplicate working documents that are for the use of people in my ministry to implement recommendations that I gave to members several weeks ago.

Mr. Martel: Then invite us over to read it.

Mr. Speaker: One final supplementary from the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. S. Smith: Will the minister give one valid reason why we in the opposition should not be permitted to go to his office and read the full reports there and decide for ourselves whether in fact it was a worthwhile venture? One reason.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Everyone here wants me to invite the member over. But, actually, I think there is—

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Invite him over and let him bring his own couch.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—a reasonable explanation as to why not.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The fact of the matter is that I happen—perhaps just by chance—to have been elected as a member of the government of this province and I have been charged with certain responsibilities for administrative matters in my ministry, which I am discharging. I have shown the members recommendations that have been made to make certain improvements, and that—

Mr. Warner: The new Jean-Jacques Blais.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—we are proceeding very quickly and very effectively to do that.

Mr. S. Smith: What are you hiding?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I'm hiding nothing. You just see how good a job we do, Stuart, and baby, will you ever be impressed.

Mr. S. Smith: Then we will be disappointed.

An hon. member: You will be Minister of Government Services by then.

Mr. Cassidy: Jed Baldwin would be ashamed of you.

An hon. member: A government of secrecy.

MINI-SKOOOLS LIMITED

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, this morning at the Metro social services committee meeting a day-care consultant provided material on Mini-Skools Limited which provides evidence of serious violations of the Day Nurseries Act and regulations. I now want to present this material to the minister and to ask him a number of questions.

Using his powers under regulation 13A of the Act, will the minister review this material and conduct an investigation with respect to Mini-Skools' financial dealing with the Metro social services, and report back to this House inter alia whether it is true:

1. That Metro awards its subsidy agreements to Mini-Skools without the necessity either of proper financial submission or adequate accounting;

2. Whether subsidy payments made without a signed contract, as is the case this year between Metro social services and Mini-Skools, are legal under the Act;

3. Whether in his opinion the actual profits of Mini-Skools on the Metro subsidy contracts, which are as high as 24 per cent on tax dollar revenue received, are in his opinion a ripoff?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Yes, I will review this material and attempt to answer the hon. member's questions.

Mrs. Campbell: Not if it costs too much.

Hon. Mr. Norton: As he is aware and has indicated, the contracts or relationships are between Metro and the particular provider of service. I can't answer those questions at this point but I will.

Mr. McClellan: Supplementary: May I ask the minister, using his powers under Ontario regulations 232, 71, section 3, will he review the material and conduct an investigation into Mini-Skools' enrolment practices and child-staff ratios between 1975 and 1977 and report back to this House whether it is true and to what extent:

1. Mini-Skools' rated capacity exceeds the licence capacity as established by his ministry;

2. That Mini-Skools repeatedly violated licence capacities by over-enrolling at all six Metro day-care centres between 1976 and 1977;

3. That the child-staff ratios at Mini-Skools day-care centres are violated as a matter of habit? Finally, Mr. Speaker, will he—

Interjections.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The original question was a three-part question. The hon. minister indicated that he would take it as notice, that he would review the information made available to him and get back. Surely if the response isn't complete, then supplementaries may be appropriate at that time.

Mr. McClellan: If I may, on a point of order, I had asked the minister to report back on a number of points. I have one small point to finish off: Will the minister report to us why Mini-Skools' licence should not be revoked under the provision of section 8 of the Act? And one final supplementary, if I may, Mr. Speaker—

Interjections.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No bloody way.
[3.30]

OMB HEARINGS

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, this is in answer to a question that was asked by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Epp) of the Deputy Premier (Mr. Welch). The answer is some three pages and it has to do with expediting hearings of the Ontario Municipal Board. I am prepared to give the answer now or in the form of a statement tomorrow morning.

Mr. Speaker: Give it as a statement tomorrow morning.

MIDLAND DISPUTE

Mr. Epp: I have a question for the Treasurer. Given that he is the minister responsible for municipal affairs, and given that both elected and private citizens in the town of Midland have asked for a public inquiry into the affairs of the municipality, and given the fact that more than 150 signatures were on the petition, would the minister consider holding a commission of inquiry into the affairs of the municipal council of Midland?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, as I recall, we have written back to the petitioners and asked them why there should be an inquiry. To the best of my knowledge they have not indicated to our satisfaction that there are substantial reasons for an inquiry. As I recall—I am not entirely sure of this—I think the council purchased some property and these petitioners disagreed with that purchase. I am doing this by recollection, but my view is that what has been raised to date does not necessitate any kind of an inquiry—a judicial inquiry by a judge, or a provincial inquiry. However, if the petitioners have additional information we will be glad to take another look at it.

Mr. Wildman: I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs. In view of the comments by the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow), quoted in the Sault Daily Star of February 24, 1978, that he was fully aware of the desire of the people of Blind River to have Highway 555 completed to Elliot Lake, and "it is up to the Northern Affairs ministry to set the priorities"; in view of the fact that the people of the north shore of Elliot Lake have submitted to the Minister of Transportation and Communications a petition with over 1,300 names requesting the completion of the Granary Lake Road, can the minister indicate when his ministry will make a decision on this project, and whether or not that will be in the affirmative?

Hon. Mr. Bernier: I can't say that the decision will be in the affirmative. I can't even tell the hon. member when the priority will be established. It will be some considerable time; but I can assure him we are looking into all aspects of it. I am sure the hon. member is aware of the problems—

Mr. Cassidy: Sure; the minister is the problem.

Mr. Makarchuk: You are waiting until the election, are you, Leo?

Hon. Mr. Bernier: —relating to that particular road going into the town of Elliot Lake. There is some concern expressed by that particular community and I think it is fair to say there is not a great deal of enthusiasm from the Elliot Lake end. We are looking at all aspects of it.

Mr. Wildman: Supplementary: In view of the expansion of Elliot Lake, which is being encouraged by this government, to say the least, and also in view of the fact that the council of the town of Elliot Lake recently passed a resolution that it would agree to the completion of the Granary Lake Road, will those matters be taken into account in making the decision?

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Yes. I think that, further to this, we will wait the results of the environmental hearings that are at present going on and will take place with regard to the radon gas problem in Elliot Lake, which will have a bearing on the development in that particular community.

Mr. Reid: There is a gas problem around here.

ELDERLY PERSONS' CENTRES

Mr. Bolan: My question is for the Minister of Community and Social Services. Is the minister aware of the provincial-municipal grants reform committee's proposal that the grants to elderly persons' centres be eliminated, and can the House have his assurance that this proposal will not be acted upon, and that the elderly persons' centres will continue to receive these grants?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I can assure the hon. member opposite that those are simply recommendations by a committee. I have not given any consideration whatsoever to the implementation of such matters with respect to those programs. At this point, it is my full intention to continue as we have with those centres.

MINING TAX

Mr. Laughren: A question for the Minister of the Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs: Is the Treasurer aware of the testimony of both Inco and Falconbridge before the select committee on the layoffs that the problems they were facing in the mining industry had nothing to do with the level of taxation but rather with world markets? If he is aware of that testimony, why has he granted further exemptions and concessions in his budget which will reduce the income to the province from mining in this next fiscal year to only $33 million?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I'm not sure I'm aware of the specific testimony but I'm aware of that statement or feeling. I do not look for the package of incentives which will be brought forward by my colleague the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller) to create jobs tomorrow. I think the member is well aware as a northern member that—

Mr. Cassidy: At least he's bringing it into the Legislature.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —we have been concerned, and I'm sure the member has been concerned, for several years now that we haven't had the level of exploration or the level of activity in terms of new mines—

Mr. Martel: This government used to blame that on Barrett. What's happening here?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —coming on stream either to add to the total mining production or to replace production which may otherwise disappear in a period of time as mines run out. So, the package is not going to have any significance in so far as the world of the current world metal oversupply is concerned, but hopefully it will position our industry to take advantage when the cycle turns in two, three, four or five years.

As the member is well aware, it takes four or five years to bring a mine to the production stage. We hope to encourage through this package a greater exploration and hopefully some new mines. Let me put it this way: if they came into production tomorrow, they would obviously, as the member has said, be adding to a metal glut at the moment. That is not the purpose of the package.

Mr. Laughren: Supplementary: Would the Treasurer indicate to us how granting the processing allowances for offshore processing against Ontario profits will create any kind of employment in the province of Ontario? Would he not agree that in effect he is exporting jobs, not creating new ones or protecting existing ones in this province?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No doubt the Minister of Natural Resources would say more about this. Let me simply say I think that particular change is recognizing the reality of life. It's unrealistic to expect that either the existing refinery in Wales or in Norway is going to be closed down and moved to Canada. I think it simply faces the facts of life. I don't think we could develop incentives powerful enough or large enough to do it in the absence of the stick approach, which essentially the present regulation is.

Mr. Cassidy: Why not make them be responsible?

Mr. Laughren: Boy, wouldn't I like to play poker with the Treasurer. They have bluffed you. For 45 years Falconbridge has bluffed you.

Mr. Cassidy: There is not a job for five years in that concession.

Mr. Laughren: Does the Treasurer ever play poker?

Mr. Martel: They keep winning the game.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH REPORT

Mr. Conway: Pursuant to provisional order 7 of the Legislative Assembly, we, the undersigned members of the assembly, hereby petition that the annual report of the Ontario Ministry of Health for 1976-77, tabled November 14, 1977, be referred to the standing committee on social development for such consideration and report as the committee may determine.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that that is a petition to the House.

Mr. Conway: Yes, it is, Mr. Speaker, under provisional standing order 7. I signed it myself.

Mr. Speaker: Does it have 20 signatures?

Mr. Conway: Yes, it does.

Mrs. Campbell: Yes, it does.

Mr. Speaker: It's agreed then?

Agreed.

MOTION

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that when the House adjourns at 6 p.m. on Thursday, March 16, it will stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 28, at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McKeough moved first reading of Bill 30, An Act to amend the Municipal Elections Act, 1977.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I have several minor amendments to the Municipal Elections Act. As a result of the change of the election date from December to November it was necessary to specify in the Act that the term of office of the present incumbents will expire on the last day of November 1978. Where such members are paid an annual allowance, the allowance for the year 1978 shall be reduced accordingly. So there is an amendment to that effect.

The second amendment is designed to facilitate the verification of nominators. Others clarify the procedures to be followed when the number of candidates nominated at the end of nomination day is not sufficient to fill the number of vacancies that exist. Those nominated will be acclaimed, and additional nominations for the remaining vacancies may be received on the Wednesday following nomination day. On the Wednesday following nomination day the acclamation provisions will also apply similarly.

The remaining amendments clear up the procedure to be followed when a new, as opposed to a regular, election is required to be held.

I might add that as a result of the change in the date in the Municipal Elections Act there will be a series of amendments required to the Municipal Act and the regional Acts in order that county and regional councils can select the heads of council and set up their committee structure at an earlier date.

MINISTRY OF GOVERNMENT SERVICES AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Henderson moved first reading of Bill 31, An Act to amend the Ministry of Government Services Act, 1973.

Motion agreed to.

An hon. member: It's an increase in salary, is it, Lorne?

Hon. Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment is to clarify the authority of staff of the ministry to carry out some of the responsibilities of the minister as they may be delegated by the minister to such staff from time to time.

Mr. Foulds: Need this to fix the Thunder Bay courthouse?

Hon. Mr. Henderson: It may be.

ANSWER TO PETITION

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I wish to table the response to petition 2 presented to the House. (See appendix, page 539).

ANSWERS TO WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the answers to questions 1 and 11, standing on the order paper. (See appendix, page 539).

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL UNIFORM PRICING ACT

Mr. Lane moved second reading of Bill 3, An Act to require a Single Price for Gasoline and Heating Oil sold in Ontario by a Wholesaler.

Mr. Lane: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill was to require a wholesaler of gasoline and heating oils in Ontario to sell gasoline and heating oil products at a single price throughout the province, thereby preventing the wholesaler from charging a higher price in certain regions. I understand I have 20 minutes to speak on my bill, and if I wish I can reserve some part of that time for summing up after other speakers have been heard.

Mr. Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. Lane: Thank you. I would like to point out that my colleagues the members for Cochrane South (Mr. Pope) and Timiskaming (Mr. Havrot) are both in support of this bill and would like to be able to speak on it. They are not able to be here and the time will not allow them to speak, in any case. I want that on the record.

Mr. Wildman: He is right over there.

Mr. Lane: They will not be here later in the afternoon.

I guess the first question is, why do I bring this bill before the House?

Mr. Foulds: That is a good question.

Mr. Lane: The reason I do that is that I want some answers that I haven't been able to get. I want to find out why there are 17 or 18 cents per gallon differences in price for the same grade of fuel at various places in this province.

Mr. Bolan: Because of the tax structure.

Mr. Mancini: Because of 35 years of Tory rule.

Mr. Lane: Yesterday in Toronto, regular gas was selling at 91.9 cents. In Elliot Lake the same gasoline was selling for $1.08. On Manitoulin it was selling for $1.05 and in Sudbury it was selling for 91.5 cents.

My understanding is that to put a gallon of gasoline on the market costs about 87.9 cents, and it is broken down like this: Ontario gasoline tax, 19 cents; federal excise tax, 10 cents; federal sales tax, 4.9 cents; average dealer margin, 8.5 cents; cost of refining, distributing and marketing, 9.5 cents; and cost of crude oil, 36 cents—for a total of 87.9 cents a gallon.

I would just point out that in Elliot Lake the price of gasoline yesterday was slightly more than 20 cents per gallon higher than the cost of producing it.

It's a conundrum to me why a farmer who has on his farm a fuel tank—holding 500 or 1,000 gallons in some cases—can go to a service station and put 10 or 15 gallons of gasoline in his tractor for fewer cents per gallon than the cost of getting it delivered to the storage tank on his farm. This gasoline is not going through a service outlet. It is not being pumped by a dealer. It seems to me that a part of that average of 8.5 cents that's going to the dealer should be available to the farmer as a benefit for buying 500 or 1,000 gallons at a time.

I have talked to different people in different oil companies over a period of years. This problem is not a new one as far as I am concerned. As those hon. members who were around here in 1972 know, I raised the matter when I introduced a bill last May—the same bill as I am speaking on today, as a matter of fact—but, because we were forced into an election, the bill died on the order paper and I didn't get a chance to debate it. But I still want some answers—

Mr. Ruston: The election was forced by your leader.

Mr. Wildman: If we had changed the government, we might have got some legislation.

Mr. Lane: We were forced into an election, as the hon. gentlemen will recall.

Mr. Wildman: John, if we had changed the government, we would have had some decent legislation.

Mr. Lane: At one point I was told that the difference in price is because of the transportation cost. That is not a fact.

Mr. Wildman: That's right. You're right.

Mr. Lane: In my riding we have storage tanks at Little Current and at Cutler, and the big tanker that comes from Sudbury hauls the gas a total of 160 miles—80 miles each way. The little retailer in Little Current can follow that truck to Sudbury and fill his gas tank at the pump there cheaper than he can get the gas dumped in his storage tanks at Little Current for resale to his customers. There's something sadly wrong with the situation when that happens, but it certainly isn't a transportation problem.

Mr. Wildman: No, it is free enterprise.

Mr. Ruston: Ever heard of competition?

Mr. Lane: The same thing goes for Elliot Lake. If people at Elliot Lake are getting their gas from the storage tanks at Cutler, it involves a round trip of about 56 miles as opposed to 160 miles return to haul the gas from Sudbury. Despite that, the gas in Elliot Lake yesterday cost $1.08 a gallon and in Sudbury it was 91.5 cents—and the two places are only 100 miles apart. So there is something wrong with the situation.

Mr. Wildman: Right.

Mr. Lane: Apart from mining in Elliot Lake and paper mills in Espanola, the bulk of my riding is made up of farming and tourism. The farmers have been selling their cattle below the cost for production for the last three or four years, and many tourist camp operators find it very difficult to make any money because of overhead costs. Would-be visitors to the area are looking at areas where gas prices are cheaper; and even if gas prices were the same in the north as they are in the south gas would still cost more, because it is farther from point A to point B. Anybody going there for a holiday or living there has to use more gas; so if they are paying the same price, they are still paying more. If they are paying 10 cents a gallon or 15 cents a gallon more, then of course they are paying a lot more. That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. Wildman: They should have a lower price.

Mr. Lane: I have a letter here from the Manitoulin Tourist Association. It has a membership of 150 different firms; 66 of these people are camp operators and 84 are associate members. I noticed, in going over the list, that 15 of these people have a retail gasoline sales outlet on their premises.

The letter I refer to is addressed to the Minister of Energy. It says:

"Dear Mr. Minister: It is obvious that if the tourist industry is to survive in north-eastern Ontario there must be an equalization in the prices of gasoline at the wholesale level."

Mr. Foulds: What was the minister's reply?

Mr. Lane: It says: "As you know, the north country is very attractive to tourists because of its great beauty, but it mainly consists of a vast rural countryside with small towns and villages scattered throughout. The distances are great."

Mr. Foulds: Rural countryside? Six of the seats are held by New Democrats.

Mr. Lane: It continues: "The price of gasoline ranges as much as 17 cents per gallon within the large heavily populated areas and the sparsely populated areas of this province. When a family is looking for a place to spend their vacation, the attractions of northern Ontario do not compete well with other parts of Canada or even other countries, when many of the miles to be travelled are to be considered in relation to the fact that the prices of gasoline are well over a dollar a gallon. Something must be done and done soon."

"All the tourist operators and affiliated members of this association which appear on that tax list"—that's the 150 people I was referring to—"and thousands of other northerners are in full support of our member, John Lane, in his efforts to get the wholesale price for gasoline and heating oil equalized across this province. We hope the government gives his private bill on this matter its full support."

The letter is signed by Carl Irwin, secretary.

Mr. Wildman: Do you have a copy of the minister's answer?

Mr. Foulds: What was the minister's reply?

Mr. Lane: I don't know.

Mr. Wildman: Is the minister going to speak in the debate?

Mr. Reed: Come on over to this side.

Mr. Lane: In an effort to find out why we have this discrepancy in prices, I've asked some other officials from other oil companies, when I couldn't live with the transportation problem, and they explained to me that wasn't the problem.

Mr. Wildman: That's right. It isn't.

Mr. Lane: One official quoted the reason for the difference in price between Sudbury and Manitoulin Island as being that the sale price is based on Toronto price, plus shipping cost. He said: "If one of our dealers cannot meet the competition, we place him on consignment, which means we buy back all of the gas in his tanks, regardless of the loss, and pay him eight cents a gallon to sell our gas to meet the competition at that point."

Mr. Wildman: That's the thing right there.

Mr. Lane: He went on to say that there is as much as 300,000 barrels of surplus gas being produced per day.

Mr. Philip: It's a lot cheaper for the gypsies to take a truckload of gas than a truckload of milk.

Mr. Wildman: That's right.

Mr. Lane: It's a little hard to accept because it's not so very long ago since we were told there was a shortage of fuel and we should not burn very much gasoline. Yet here's a gentleman who says we have a surplus production of over 300,000 barrels a day. That's a lot of gas. Sometimes when there's a surplus, one doesn't pay too much money for it, but we're paying $1.08 in Elliot Lake.

Another official of the same company said: "There is too much refining capacity chasing too little volume and, with another refinery under construction in Ontario, this problem of overcapacity is going to get worse before it gets better." It sounds as if there are no better days ahead, according to the officials of that particular company.

None of these statements really provides acceptable answers to a very serious problem. It is out of sheer frustration on behalf of my constituents and myself that I bring this bill for debate into this House. I personally think the government should stay out of the marketplace as much as possible. I would also hope to keep regulations and legislation to a minimum because sometimes, I'm sure, we interfere in people's lives and businesses too much. But somehow this great difference in price between one point in this province and another must be corrected.

After all, we are all Ontarians. If our federal government had had the foresight 25 years ago to come up with some good energy policy for Canada, the provinces would now be sharing our resources one with the other and we would be depending on each other so much we would not have to worry about unity or these crazy gasoline prices. But, of course, hindsight is a lot easier than foresight.

I'll now listen to what other speakers have to say on this matter. I'd like to use whatever time is left of my 20 minutes to sum up after they have spoken.

Mr. Reed: I appreciate very much the intent of the member for Manitoulin or Algoma-Manitoulin who wants answers to this problem.

Mr. Foulds: You don't even know where the riding is.

Mr. Reed: I'm learning.

Mr. Kerrio: Are we supposed to?

Mr. Reed: We all want answers to this problem. Hopefully, through the course of the debate, information and points of view will be exchanged that will perhaps help to put a better perspective on the problem.

I want to say that I sympathize with the concern the member has about the discrepancy in gasoline and heating oil prices in northern Ontario. I would submit to him that if the provincial government had moved to provide some tax dispensation for that fuel some years ago when the Liberal Party asked for it, this bill would probably not have to be presented today.

I would also ask him, getting into the content of the bill, what in heaven's name is a wholesale price in the petroleum industry? It is a very difficult thing to assess.

Mr. Foulds: Good question.

Mr. Reed: I have done some investigating and I am even more confused now than I was before, and I guess I was pretty confused before. We have things like the delivered price, which is the price the oil company delivers to its branded dealer, and that includes the cost of production plus certain other incurred costs. We have the rack price, which is, I suppose, the price an unbranded dealer pays, in cash or whatever, to the oil company when he goes down and makes a block purchase of gasoline. That does not include cost of transportation; it doesn't include the cost awarded to the branding of the product or the sale cost that is incurred.

Then we have what is called the posted tank-wagon price which, I understand, is the price paid by farmers and heating oil customers. So we have a whole hodgepodge of bases to assess. Then we add to that the fact that the forces of competition are very active in the petroleum industry at the present time.

Mr. Wildman: To the detriment of the consumer.

Mr. Reed: I will go on to explain that it is currently very much to the advantage of the consumer—

Mr. Wildman: Only in some areas.

Mr. Reed: —that the forces of competition are operating just now.

We have an overbuilding of refinery capacity in the province of Ontario and it is being further extended in Nanticoke at the present time; to such an extent that if you asked Texaco privately how they assessed their prospects with the Nanticoke refinery, they will probably tell you that they wish they had not considered it.

This overbuilding of refinery capacity is general around the world—the Arabs did it; the Europeans did it; we did it in North America. As a result, anyone who has studied the economics of refinery petroleum knows that in order to break even we have got to keep the refinery moving at about 85 per cent capacity.

The projections about growth and consumption did not pan out in recent years. So, consequently, last year, the consumption of petroleum in Ontario was revised by one oil company three times during the course of the year. It started out at something around four per cent or a little more in terms of the projected growth. Last June or July, if I remember correctly, it was revised downward in the three per cent area, and it came out at the end of 1977 at two per cent.

So we can see that the petroleum companies made an error. All of the petroleum companies across the world made an error. That error is currently working to the advantage of the consumer—

[4:00]

Mr. Wildman: Only in some areas.

Mr. Reed: In some areas, quite correct. In three areas of northern Ontario—the member for Algoma-Manitoulin pointed out one area—the price of gasoline is lower today than it is in Toronto.

Mr. Wildman: That's right.

Mr. Reed: That's the result of competitive forces. They're involved in a very hot war in order to try to keep their refineries going. I would submit to the member that if we were to introduce a standardized wholesale price across Ontario those localized advantages would of necessity be brought to an end. I hope the members of this House would be prepared to live with that eventuality should they vote in favour of that.

There are a few other factors which should be pointed out too. First of all there are some petroleum companies who do not operate in northern Ontario, so the problem is not relevant to them. The Act states in section 6 that the minister may make regulations exempting any wholesaler, either generally or in respect of a particular sale or a particular class of sale. I would suppose the reason for this inclusion would be to exempt those companies who are not operating in northern Ontario. Let me submit this thought to the member, that if those exemptions were made, the competitive forces of course would once again take over. We would then experience a greater disparity than we have at the present time. This is of particular concern.

It is also of concern to me that the incentive for investment by the petroleum companies in northern Ontario would be diminished by these resulting exemptions. It would stand to reason that if the petroleum company considered that it would elect to do business in its largest-volume area, then one would consider that it might divest its holdings in northern Ontario in order to qualify for such an exemption as is contained in this bill. I hope the member for Algoma-Manitoulin might have something to say about that in rebuttal.

Whether or not we should give this bill our support, I suppose, is a question of being seen to be concerned about the problem in northern Ontario, as opposed to getting down to the nitty-gritty and actually being able to do something about it. While I support, in every respect, any move to allow us to be able to come to grips with this very real problem, I see only in this bill the ability to be seen to do something. I really can't find in this bill the means by which these necessary corrections—and we all agree that they are needed—can be made.

The member quite rightly pointed out some of the cost awards and said that distribution was not a major factor here. It is a factor and it's an important one.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Reed: All right, Mr. Speaker, thank you. In conclusion, then, I would say that while this is a free vote, I will not be able to support this bill. But I would, on the other hand, support an alternative for consideration of the reduction in taxation.

Mr. Wildman: I rise in support of the purpose of this bill, which is to reduce the excessively high gasoline prices in the north and in rural areas of the province.

I'd like to point out, in relation to what the member for Halton-Burlington was saying, I appreciate his concern, as a southern Ontario member, for northern Ontario. I'd like to point out that the problem the member for Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Lane) is attempting to address in this bill is not just the problem of northern Ontario but a problem of rural Ontario generally.

It's a problem for rural and small communities throughout the province and not just the north. Obviously, as a northern member, along with the member for Algoma-Manitoulin, most of what we might have to say relates to the north. But this is a problem, as the member for Halton-Burlington indicated, in relation to competition especially; I think that's what we have to look at.

I said I was supporting the purpose of the bill; however, I must say that it's certainly my position that this bill would require extensive amendments in order for it to be effective in doing what it purports to do.

Mr. Foulds: It has to be rewritten.

Mr. Wildman: Obviously, something has to be done to equalize the differences in prices between the competitive markets of places like Toronto and other, rural parts of southern Ontario, but it should be pointed out for the benefit of the member for Halton-Burlington that places like Timmins, Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury have prices which, in some cases, are comparable to the ones in Toronto. It's the small communities outside of those centres that are suffering from the exorbitant gasoline prices that we now face.

Mr. Foulds: And Thunder Bay.

Mr. Wildman: Yes. The price of gasoline in cities like Sault Ste. Marie and Timmins is less than 90 cents a gallon.

Mr. Gaunt: And Wingham.

Mr. Wildman: When the drivers drive out of those cities into the more isolated communities and have to stop for gasoline then they face paying 10 cents to 20 cents more per gallon.

I can give you a couple of examples in my riding, Mr. Speaker. In the Sault Ste. Marie area the price of regular gasoline is 88.9 cents a gallon. In Blind River, which is close to Elliot Lake, to which the member for Algoma-Manitoulin referred, the same gasoline purchased for 88.9 cents a gallon in the Sault Ste. Marie costs over 95 cents.

If you go north of the Sault, Mr. Speaker, you run into even more serious problems. Up there they don't sell gas by the gallon any more, they sell it by the half gallon. I think that's to try and hoodwink the tourists. They see a sign saying "52 cents" or "56 cents" and they say, "What a bargain." They drive in and find out when they get in there that the price in White River is $1.10 a gallon. The price in Wawa is $1.11 a gallon. It's the same in Chapleau. In Horne-payne and Schreiber it's $1.13 a gallon.

Mr. Foulds: Is that for unleaded gasoline?

Mr. Wildman: No, this is regular gasoline that I'm talking about. Unleaded gasoline is more expensive and as more cars require unleaded gasoline you're paying even more.

An interesting point is that seven miles from Wawa, where you're paying $1.11 a gallon for regular gas in comparison to about 90 cents a gallon in the Sault, there is a large Imperial Oil tank at Michipicoten Harbour. The gasoline is transported by boat to Michipicoten and then, seven miles into the town of Wawa where you're paying over 20 cents more than you are in the Sault.

Mr. Foulds: Just figure that one out.

Mr. Wildman: Besides hurting the consumers it really hurts the businessmen up there as well.

Mr. Foulds: A very good point.

Mr. Wildman: The problems of competition and developing an industrial base, or even tourism in the north as the member for Algoma-Manitoulin suggested, are compounded by this high price of gasoline. Frankly, northerners are very angry about the whole situation, Mr. Speaker, and feel that they're being exploited by the oil companies.

Mr. Foulds: They sure are; it's shameful.

Mr. Wildman: We know that transportation costs which have been used as an excuse for years for the differential prices are only a fraction of the increase in the price. One can talk of about one to five cents difference in the gallon price for the towns that I am talking about in comparison to Sault Ste. Marie, and yet they are paying about 20 cents more. Frankly, when one talks about White River and Wawa, the wholesale price there—that is what the dealer is paying for his gasoline in most places—costs more wholesale than the consumer pays retail in Sault Ste. Marie. There's no reason for that; it's really an unbelievable situation.

The problems with the bill, though, have to be addressed. There is already a uniform posted wholesale price in the sense of what the member for Halton-Burlington was talking about, the tank-wagon price if one wants to use that. I don't know what the member for Algoma-Manitoulin really means by wholesale price, but if we talk about a tank-wagon price they have a posted price in that sense.

What I am leading to is that that price doesn't in the end determine the retail price, because the oil companies in many cases are forced by independent retail competitors, or because of excess competition in certain areas, to lower the prices by consignment sales in that they rebate, as was pointed out earlier; in essence, they are rebating up to eight cents a gallon to the dealer in a competitive market to try to keep him in business. This doesn't happen in areas where competition isn't strong. They don't offer the rebates, and of course retailers make an additional mark-up in many cases, so the consumer is paying double the margin between the tank-wagon price that the member for Halton-Burlington was referring to and the consumer price.

We in this party have been arguing for years, on the basis of equity, that northern consumers should be protected from being victimized by the oil companies. While this government, before the election, gave us a lower licence fee of $10, which they eventually learned also had to cover pick-up trucks and vans, it can't be forgotten that this really doesn't compensate for the higher gasoline prices that we pay. Even with the increase in the licence fee in southern Ontario, the difference between the two prices doesn't compensate for what you are paying, considering the distances we drive and the amount of gasoline we use.

Frankly, I congratulate the member for Algoma-Manitoulin for standing up, in spite of the reticence of the members of his government to do anything about the problem, and pointing it out in introducing this bill. But, frankly, I wonder if he's alone over there. If the minister is going to participate in the debate, I am looking forward to what he has to say, especially in relation to the letters I have received over the last two years from him and his predecessor on this very problem; it shows a complete misunderstanding of the whole problem and a complete lack of desire to do anything about it.

The question is how do we deal with this problem; and we have some suggestions. According to the bill, the problem would be dealt with through wholesale prices, the companies determining the wholesale prices themselves. Also, of course, there is the problem of the need for exemptions and the companies being allowed to vary those prices themselves. There is no regulatory agency responsible, according to the bill as it's proposed, and that's a tremendous hole in the concept as far as I can see.

There's nothing in this bill that would prevent the refiners from undercutting the so-called posted wholesale price by offering support payments to retailers in the same way they do now by the consignment sales process, unless something can be done to equalize those rebates for the areas that are not competitive, in the rural areas and areas of the north. That applies if the member considers this to be a maximum posted price. If he is talking, however, about a minimum posted price, if he is not allowing the company to sell below some posted price—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Wildman: If he is not allowing this, I just want to conclude by saying he would be cutting the feet out from under the small independents who in the competitive areas are keeping the prices down. We think the Ontario Energy Board should be given the power to set a competitive price and to require the companies to pay the same kind of rebate to all of the dealers in the areas to which they are delivering gasoline, if this is to be an effective bill. Because of the problem I will support it on second reading, but it obviously needs to be amended at the committee stage.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I rise to speak on the proposed single price bill with really mixed feelings.

Mr. Wildman: I can imagine.

Mr. Reed: Make an announcement about lowering the tax.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I respect the intentions of my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin, in presenting for the consideration of this House a bill he feels would lead to a more rational, a more equitable and a comprehensive pricing system for motor gasoline and home heating oil in Ontario.

Mr. Kerrio: We could use one for uranium too.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: He wants to reduce the differentials among communities throughout Ontario in gasoline and heating oil prices. Many of us in government share the very same concern as does the hon. member. That was one reason why in August, 1975 the government established the Ontario royal commission on petroleum products pricing, also known as the Isbister commission. As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, Commissioner Isbister concluded in his final report—

Mr. Philip: A shoddy Tory rag if there ever was one.

Hon. Mr. Baetz:—that the consumer in this province was, in his language, well served by a competitive petroleum industry.

Mr. Philip: The worst whitewash that ever was tabled in this House.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Full-scale regulation was therefore not recommended after a very thorough study of the problem. Since receiving that report in July, 1976, the Ministry of Energy has monitored market development closely and has held discussions on a regular basis with executives of the petroleum industry.

Mr. Philip: You could drive to Manitoulin on the methane gas produced from the Isbister report.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: We feel these meetings have been generally fruitful in spite of rapidly escalating world prices, over which I would remind all members we have had no control. The increase of oil and gasoline prices here in Ontario has generally been kept to a minimum through efficient operations and competition.

The need for competition was expressed by the hon. member for Halton-Burlington and was also alluded to by the hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Philip: You haven't driven to Florida lately, have you?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: There is no doubt that both wholesale and retail prices of gasoline and home heating oil could be made uniform across the province. But this could only be achieved through complete government regulation of petroleum manufacturing, distribution and marketing in this province.

Mr. Philip: Nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: A partial cure or a Band-Aid approach to higher prices in certain locations, such as proposed in this bill, could be worse than the disease. The consumers in Nova Scotia have had to suffer higher prices—

Mr. Wildman: Only if you live in the competitive areas.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —as a result of their provincial government's tinkering with regulations. I feel there are a number of weaknesses in this bill, both in its ability to achieve the hon. member's objectives and in the undesirable implications which would arise from its enactment. In the first place, the bill will not provide a uniform price for the Ontario consumers for either motor gasoline or home heating oil. This is because different wholesalers, under the proposed legislation, would still be free to charge different prices.

Mr. Wildman: So tighten it up.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Furthermore—and the hon. member for Algoma seems to have missed that point because he just wanted to deal with that one section—there is no provision in this legislation for regulation of retail prices.

Mr. Foulds: Amend the whole bill. Why didn't you get some help in drafting it?

Mr. Wildman: Give it to the Ontario Energy Board.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: It is important to note the impact of service station dealer margins, which I'm advised can vary from as much as four cents a gallon in some of the larger centres to 18 cents per gallon, depending on market circumstances.

Mr. Foulds: Yes, and gallonage, eh? Do you expect the people in smaller communities to get service or not?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: To achieve the objective would require imposing regulations on the whole commodity, which they would like to see but which is against our policy and which in turn—

Mr. Foulds: Yes, you'd rather gouge the consumer, like you did the Hydro deal.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —would create a need for an evergrowing bureaucracy, my friend; something we're trying desperately to reduce, not to expand.

Mr. Bolan: If you want to look at bureaucracy, look at Hydro.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: We want to deregulate, not regulate, and all the members opposite can think of is regulate, regulate, regulate.

Mr. Foulds: Why don't you just try protecting the consumer for a change? Are you attacking the member for Algoma-Manitoulin?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Moreover, accountability for petroleum product pricing would become a direct responsibility of government, which would be a further intrusion into the operation of the market economy. That's what they want, I guess.

Mr. Wildman: That's right. That's what the member for Algoma-Manitoulin wants too.

Mr. Foulds: Where is the Minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Bernier)?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Regulations designed to provide more uniform prices would in reality be an estimated $6.5 million transport subsidy on petroleum products moving to destinations more remote from refineries. That's what it would be. Directly or indirectly this would lead to higher petroleum product prices for the majority of the consumers.

Mr. Wildman: Do you think it's just transportation?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Regulating the petroleum product prices would undermine the highly competitive petroleum market which does exist in this province at this time.

Mr. Wildman: In some areas.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Indeed, as the hon. member for Halton-Burlington has indicated, competition is currently so keen it is of concern to us, because in certain parts of the province it has resulted in retail price wars which can pose a real threat to the independent dealer, who we feel should remain in the marketing picture in order that the consumer continues to be well served in the future.

In conclusion, I believe Bill 3 as envisaged would not achieve the ultimate objective which my colleague desires and which is one I share. In fact, I believe firmly that the opposite would be true—

Mr. Wildman: All right then, what are you going to do?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —that such a measure could have the opposite effect. That is why I feel that the present government's policy should continue and why I cannot support this bill.

Mr. Foulds: You mean the present government's non-policy. You're repudiating the north.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: In reaching this conclusion I would, however, like to say that my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin, has done us a service by directing our attention to this issue at this time.

Mr. Nixon: You have been saying he is wrong.

Mr. Bolan: Who wrote your speech?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I would like to assure my colleague and the public that in pursuing our policy of encouraging competition rather than the state-imposed regulations which the members opposite would like to see on motor gasoline and fuel oil pricing—

Mr. Foulds: Just try protecting the consumer, you clown!

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —we will continue to monitor closely the petroleum industry to make certain that a competitive market system will continue to be in the best interest of the consumer.

Mr. Foulds: When are you going to become a Minister of Energy instead of an apologist for major oil companies? You are a disgrace.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bolan: First of all, I support the bill in principle, because I think that what the member for Algoma-Manitoulin is trying to do is to bring to the attention of this House and bring to the attention of the people of Ontario the inequities which exist in the structure of the gasoline and fuel prices in this province.

In looking over the bill, it would appear to me that it arises out of two frustrations. The one frustration, of course, is the high price of gasoline in northern Ontario—not only the high price of the gasoline, but also the irregularities which exist within the gasoline industry. You never know from one day to another what the price is going to be. You never know what the price is going to be even if you drive 15 or 20 miles from where the price is known.

Mr. Foulds: Or even from day to day.

Mr. Bolan: Even from day to day.

People like to point to the people of northern Ontario and say, "Why are you people always complaining about the high price of this and the high price of that? Why were you complaining about the high price of licence fees on cars and trucks?" The simple fact of the matter is this: It does in fact cost more to live in northern Ontario than in any other part of this province.

That being the case, I think that the government owes some obligation to the people of northern Ontario to treat them in a more equitable fashion.

I think that the member for Algoma-Manitoulin was expressing his frustration in the sense that the party of which he is a member, which forms this government, is obviously not prepared to do something about these inequities.

Mr. Foulds: Where is the Minister of Northern Affairs?

Mr. Bolan: He is not even here—that is how much he even thinks about the bill.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: What will you do? Let's hear it, what have you got?

Mr. Wildman: You told us what you weren't going to do; you are not going to do anything.

Mr. Bolan: I might also point out—and I say this to the member for Algoma-Manitoulin—he has got guts. The member for Algoma-Manitoulin has guts to stand up on his own two feet and to point out to that party over there that he disagrees very much with the way they are treating people in certain parts of this province.

An hon. member: There is no comparison with what Hydro does to rural customers.

Mr. Bolan: It is absolutely shameful what they do to rural customers.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Get on with your proposal.

Mr. Bolan: I would have expected that the member for Algoma-Manitoulin would have been able to present his case to his party caucus in such a way that they would have done something about the high price of gasoline in northern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Wildman: I mentioned that.

Mr. Bolan: Obviously his inspiring remarks have fallen on deaf ears. It certainly is not the intention of that government, and this is clearly demonstrated by the Minister of Energy, who I presume speaks on behalf of the cabinet, and who can't even give it lip service. Probably the Minister of Energy does not even understand what it is like to be up there when you are going from one area to another without even realizing whether you have enough money in your pocket to pay for the next gallon of gasoline.

Mr. O'Neil: Give it to 'em, boy.

Mr. Bolan: As was pointed out by one of the previous speakers they sell gas there by the half gallon. That is how ridiculous the price has gone out of sight.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Get on with your proposal; let's hear what you have to offer.

Mr. Bolan: When the minister gets up and speaks on behalf of the government, which he has just done, he confirms what I have been saying in this House and what I have been saying on the street. He is confirming that his government, his party, has abdicated its responsibilities and it has abdicated its will and its desire to govern the province.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Give us your better idea, come on, I am waiting.

Mr. Ruston: Resign, let's go.

Mr. Bolan: Addressing myself to the bill, I say to the member for Algoma-Manitoulin it would be with much difficulty that he would be able to effectuate this bill. I look at, for example, his definition for uniform gasoline price and I look at the wholesale price. How he arrives at a wholesale price is something, I would suggest, which would have to be determined. We don't know how he arrives at it. In effect, he is leaving it up to the government, through regulation, to determine what that wholesale price will be. So unless he has some kind of regulatory mechanism to set that wholesale price, then I would say to him that he is in difficulty with the bill.

But as I indicated to you earlier, Mr. Speaker, we will support the bill in principle, because I think the member is right in trying to do what should be done for that area.

There is another way, of course, but this can't be done through a private member's bill. That is through the gasoline tax structure. The member for Algoma-Manitoulin may be able to impress upon these other people who sit over there that what the government ought to consider is tax rebates in certain regions of this province. I suggest to the member for Algoma-Manitoulin that that may be a more appropriate way of trying to remedy this inequity.

One clause which really does give me some concern—it is what I call a catch-22 clause—is paragraph 6, where he says that the minister may make regulations exempting any wholesaler. Let's assume that the bill were to pass: Under this, the minister can exempt any wholesaler from the provisions of this bill. With that clause in the bill, and assuming that the bill were to pass, we are giving the Minister of Energy, who has denounced the bill, the opportunity to exempt any wholesaler who applies.

Mr. Foulds: Putting Dracula in charge of the blood bank again.

Mr. McEwen: I would suggest to the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin that the bill really loses whatever impact it has by including that particular clause.

As I indicated earlier, on general fundamental principles I will support the bill. Perhaps something can be done with it in committee—if it should go to committee—to beef it up. But, as I also said earlier, I personally want to congratulate the member for Algoma-Manitoulin for bringing some of the inequities which exist to the attention of this House and to the attention of the people of Ontario.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Etobicoke. And I would like to remind him that the hon. member for Algoma will resume his remarks at 4:38.

Mr. Philip: I would like to compliment the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin on his bill. The hon. member and I served together on a committee that studied regulation at some great length. He certainly has a better grasp of the value of regulation, at least in terms of the trucking industry, than does his minister, who had the audacity to introduce a silly bill like Bill 21, which I guarantee will not pass in this House.

Mr. Gregory: What bill are you debating?

Mr. Nixon: That's out of order.

Mr. Philip: The member for Algoma-Manitoulin has raised a number of questions. The fact is that his government has failed to get the answers to the questions that the member has raised and to many other questions that have been raised in this House. They had a perfect opportunity to obtain that information in the Isbister commission, which heard much testimony that the essence of the problem was the large vertical integration by the large, monopolistic oil companies. Anyone who has read through the reports on matters concerning the gasoline market in British Columbia, tabled in December 1975, or indeed who sat through any of the Isbister commission hearings, could not help but understand that the real problem deals with the whole vertical integration of the oil industry.

A number of members have pointed out that there is a problem of overcapacity, and there is little doubt that is the case in the case of the refineries. There is little doubt in my mind though, that the problem we are facing is a problem of monopoly. While there is competition, as the member for Ottawa West (Mr. Baetz) has pointed out, and certain price wars, they only exist at local levels. When you examine what takes place in those price wars, you invariably find that the consumer is being squeezed because the monopolies are squeezing out the independent dealers and the independent service stations.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: No, they are not; we are watching that.

Mr. Philip: A number of members have suggested it would be difficult to discover what the wholesale price would be. I suggest that the Ontario Energy Board could determine a competitive price level on the basis of the maximum or average rebates offered to dealers in the major regional centres.

I suggest that this government has failed to come up with any energy policy. If they had, they would have realized that at the centre of that policy would be divorcement legislation that would get the oil companies out of the retailing game.

Mr. Foulds: Damn right. Exactly right. And get Denison out of the uranium game.

Mr. Philip: I suggest that at the centre of that legislation would come the power of the Ontario Energy Board to find out what the oil companies really are doing in this province not to do the kind of whitewash the Isbister commission did. I suggest that if this government were serious, it would work with the Ontario Energy Board and we would have competition; then we wouldn't need to have the kind of well-meaning, piecemeal legislation which the member for Algoma-Manitoulin has just introduced.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: You'd regulate all the competition away—more government interference.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member for Algoma-Manitoulin. I believe there are nine minutes left.

Mr. Lane: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will respond in the order that the members spoke.

My friend from Halton-Burlington said we should have listened to the Liberals when they wanted to make some adjustment on the tax. Well we need the tax in order to build roads and keep the roads up. We in northern Ontario maybe are more aware of that than some people down here.

Mr. Reed: I suppose you could say you need some licensing fees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lane: The only thing I could say to the hon. member regarding the tax is that the federal government is taking 14.9 cents a gallon and I don't see them putting any money into highways in Ontario, not even the Trans-Canada Highway, even though they do it in other provinces. We here in Ontario must support our entire network of highways and municipal roads through the gas tax that we now collect.

Mr. Reed: Tell your Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) to get busy.

Mr. Lane: So I really can't agree that we should cut the tax.

Mr. Reed: Put them to work and make our case in Ottawa.

Mr. Lane: Of course, the other thing, as the member for Algoma has pointed out, is this isn't a north-south problem.

Mr. G. Taylor: They won't listen in Ottawa.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We keep trying.

Mr. Lane: This is a sparsely populated area problem against a heavily populated area problem—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Like the UIC program. We've been trying that for a year.

Mr. O'Neil: Behave yourself, Bette.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You don't get anywhere.

Mr. Lane:—so you just can't have tax apply here and tax not applying someplace else or a differential in the tax. I don't really think we can do it that way.

Again, I would say to the member for Halton-Burlington that I'm not as concerned about the big oil companies as he seems to be.

Mr. Foulds: You are losing credibility, John.

Mr. Lane: I'm more concerned about the farmers and the tourist operators and the small business people in the sparsely populated parts of this province.

Mr. Reed: I'm concerned about investment in northern Ontario.

Mr. Foulds: They have to buy gas.

Mr. Lane: Maybe that member has more shares in the gas company than I have, I don't know.

Mr. Reed: Not yet.

An hon. member: He's putting his commercial money into that.

Mr. Foulds: Do you have any? Do you have shares in a gas company, John?

Mr. Lane: To my colleague from Algoma, I would like to say that I'm sure he understands the bill probably better than some people in this House, because he and I share some of the same kinds of problems in our adjoining ridings.

Mr. Kerrio: I think we pay more money for gas in Niagara Falls.

Mr. Lane: I can appreciate that the bill, if it is carried today, will need to have some amendments—

Mr. Foulds: Force a vote on it, John.

Mr. Lane:—and will need to go into committee. I'll see that it goes into standing committee on resources development where we can all look at it and hopefully the we can all look at it and hopefully the members opposite can help me improve the bill.

Mr. Foulds: The Minister of Northern Affairs will help you.

Mr. Kerrio: It's about time the Minister of Northern Affairs arrived.

Mr. Reed: Where were you? We were talking about your bill.

Mr. Lane: I would like to thank the Minister of Energy for his remarks and offering to monitor this problem if this bill should fail to get through the House today. If that should be the case, I shall be watching and waiting—

Mr. Foulds: The bill will get through if the cabinet doesn't block it, John.

Mr. Lane: —and asking the minister for results from the monitoring he is doing with the oil companies, because this differential in price just has to be corrected.

Mr. Wildman: He still thinks it's only transportation. He doesn't understand.

Mr. Philip: Where are the independent service station operators now that they're bankrupt?

Mr. Lane: It has to be corrected.

I would thank the member for Nipissing (Mr. Bolan) for his remarks. I know he is a legal person, and he can understand that I, not being a legal person, probably would not have the correct wording in the bill.

Mr. Kerrio: Don't apologize for that, with their record.

Mr. Lane: Again, as I said to the member for Algoma, if we get into committee with the bill—

Mr. Ruston: Right.

Mr. Lane: —hopefully the members can help me make it a better bill so that it will do a better job.

Mr. Foulds: Not if, when. Why are you so pessimistic?

Mr. Lane: The member for Etobicoke (Mr. Philip) pointed out that he and I sat together on a committee. We didn't always agree but we had a fair bit of respect for each other and we both learned a great deal, I think, about transportation and transportation costs.

Mr. Philip: About the value of regulations.

Mr. Lane: I appreciate very much his remarks and thank him for his moral support in any case.

Mr. Foulds: Legislative support.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That completes the time allotted for Bill 3. It will be dealt with further at 5:45.

EMPLOYMENT STANDARDS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. O'Neil moved second reading of Bill 2, An Act to amend the Employment Standards Act.

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, in the explanatory note, if I might read from the bill: "The purpose of this bill is to increase the time for notice to an employee whose employment is to be terminated where the employer plans to terminate the employment of 50 or more employees within a short period of time. The bill also requires the employer, when requested, to confer with the minister and any trade union that represents the employees to discuss alternative methods of reducing the number of terminations."

Mr. Speaker, before I start on the explanation of this, I would like to reserve approximately 10 minutes at the end for the final discussion.

The minister might note that the amendment relates only to mass terminations, that is the termination of 50 or more employees during any period of 12 weeks or less, as has occurred all too frequently in Ontario recently, as exemplified by the layoffs at Inco and Falconbridge. There are two main components to the bill: Increasing the period of notice which an employer must give; and secondly, requiring the employer to give notice to the Ministry of Labour in the event of a mass layoff.

The purpose of increasing the period of notice is fairly obvious, namely, to enable discharged employees to make suitable arrangements with respect to other employment, housing, schooling et cetera. A long lead time may be required in the case of a mass termination because a large number of employees, perhaps with similar skills, will be laid off in essentially the same job market. The problem is particularly acute when the layoff occurs in a locality where there is only one major employer or type of employer, such as in Sudbury or Port Colborne.

I have been able to do a little research into notice provisions in other jurisdictions. It appears that the period of notice of termination required in France is one year and in Sweden six months. I am sure that the minister, with the resources available in her ministry, could undertake more comprehensive research in this regard and provide it for us, if this does go to committee.

I have also obtained a copy of Swedish legislation dealing with individual as compared to mass terminations. In the Swedish legislation, it appears that where an employee has been working for the same employer for at least two years, the length of notice which must be given by the employer varies with the age of the employee. For example, he must give two months notice to an employee aged 45 but at least six months notice to an employee of 55. I find this a novel proposition and commend it to the minister for further study.

I have also heard the minister speak on many occasions of the need for increased employer-employee business co-operation. I note that the Employment Standards Act currently requires the employer to co-operate with the minister during the period of notice to employees. I feel this requirement should be strengthened so that the employer is required in all cases to communicate with the minister at the beginning of what I propose to be an extended notice. I feel this might have had a beneficial effect for example, with respect to the recent Inco and Falconbridge layoffs. There seemed to be some concern on the part of the Inco officials that discussion with the minister prior to the period of notice would somehow have been a contravention of securities legislation.

When questioned on this matter in the estimates, I understand the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Grossman) disagreed with the view taken by Inco officials, while some of the officials are reported to have agreed with the stand taken by them. I think this entire matter should be clarified with the rights of workers given some consideration.

I have also found that the members of the European Common Market have passed a directive related to collective redundancies, or what we would call mass terminations. I note that the directive stipulates three main requirements as follows: Employers should consult workers representatives in advance about proposed layoffs; employers should notify the relevant government ministry of such layoffs; the relevant government ministries should be able to postpone the layoffs in such situations.

I would commend a study of this document to the minister. We have had some discussion with employer groups with respect to this proposal. They have some concern, particularly with respect to market fluctuation. However, industry in this province has learned to live with a 16-week notice, and it is not clear to me that they could not also adjust to the longer period of notice.

As I have mentioned, this bill would apply only to mass layoffs. Our members have also been informed of certain problems and inequities with respect to the operation of the bill concerning temporary layoffs. For example, one of our members received a letter whereby a long-term employee was to be temporarily laid off with only several hours notice. While this may technically be in accordance with the current employment standards provision, in my view, the provisions with respect to individual layoffs may also require further examination.

In any event, I urge that this bill be given second reading and sent to committee so that it can be examined in detail.

Mr. Renwick: I arise to join in the debate with a considerable degree of interest and concern about the bill. We will, of course, support the bill and trust that the government will have the good sense to send it to a committee so that we can give some consideration and depth of attention to the intention of the bill.

It's an interesting coincidence that it's exactly eight years ago this week that the employees of the Dunlop Tire Company plant in my riding were given notice that the plant was to be shut down. There had been no prior communication, apart from one sort of afternoon tea party exchange between the Minister of Labour and the president of Dunlop. Notice was given to the employees on a Friday afternoon, on March 6, 1970; the plant was closed and vacated by May 1, and at the end of May the minister introduced the first provision dealing with this whole question to amend the Employment Standards Act, and it was passed by the House after a long debate at the end of June, 1970.

I think it may be well worthwhile to recall the traumatic effect which that closing had on the persons directly affected, the riding of Riverdale, Local 132 of the United Rubberworkers and all of the people who were involved in that occasion. There was nothing that was left undone by anybody in the union, amongst the employees and in the neighbourhood to try to persuade the government to protect the men and women in that plant. So 600 or 700 men and women lost their jobs in a very short period of time, the great bulk of them men and women of very long service. When I say very long service, I spelled it out when I spoke in the assembly, both in the Throne Speech debate in 1970, in March—

Mr. Nixon: I remember it well.

Mr. Renwick: —and when I spoke again on the second reading, as did the member for Brant-Norfolk or wherever it is—

Mr. Nixon: Those places.

Mr. Renwick: —because we were all very much concerned that the government did not seem to understand that there is now an obligation on corporations not to take unilateral decisions without lengthy and adequate prior consultation. The government had commissioned the Rand commission to study the whole question of labour relations and the mutual responsibilities of employers and employees to themselves and the public interest which is involved in it, and it specifically stated that in this day and age it was not proper for that kind of decision to be made.

I can recall the specific statement made by Mr. Justice Rand, and I quote from his report: "Industry and business today are carried on for the benefit of all three interests—employer, employee, and public—a conception which does not admit the right of an employer, regardless of the circumstances, to send a senior employee into the wilderness as a result or a means of gaining an operating benefit." I just want to say that was in 1970, in June, and there was in my opinion a direct causal connection between the Dunlop closing and the introduction of the first provisions related to this notice, which are now before the House for amendment proposed by my friend.

It does seem to me that there is still something seriously wrong when we have to talk about the kind of notice which even my friend has incorporated in his bill, when we consider men and women of very long service being given that very short termination notice. It is instructive to note in a very class sense that the only person really protected at common law with respect to the termination of their employment are persons who have a professional capacity, such as engineers, or lawyers, or accountants, or persons who have a particular skill. In case after case where they have a contract of service for a definite or indefinite period, they're given notice, they go to the court and they're protected up to a year, a year and a half, two years.

We had many such cases fought in this province at the time of the shutdown of the aircraft plant at Malton under that disastrous decision of Prime Minister Diefenbaker, and each time we get the impression that the only person who gets adequate protection—adequate protection—is somebody who has a special skill or a special trade.

In those circumstances, the whole question of availability of other employment, loss of remuneration and the length of time to be given is considered by the court. Principles were established and notice was given, but we are still using, for ordinary men and women in the work force, a uniform method, not graded at all with respect to the length of time of the service which people have given to a particular plant. So in the case of Dunlop, it didn't matter whether you were hired two months before, or were an employee of two years' standing, or whether you were an employee of 30 years' standing; you got the identical notice, you got the identical remuneration. That was at a time when only the company made the decision about the length of time that the notice was to be given.

I went back to Hansard to check, and at the time the bill was introduced into the House we moved a reasoned amendment which tried to give effect to two principles. One was that there was an obligation not to treat everybody the same way, but to take into account the length of time that each of the persons affected by a shutdown were in the service of the company. It required the employer to pay on that basis.

In the reasoned amendment, we also tried to give to the minister, and to the ministry, the authority to look into the whole question of curtailment of operations; the whole question of shrinkage of labour force of any plant; and to decide whether or not, as a business matter and as a matter of obligation to the society in which that plant had been operating, it was a fair and reasonable adjustment which was being made by the employer with respect to his employees.

We were then, as now, quite unable to change the mind of the government. But I do hope that at some point we will be able to give to the minister the power and authority which will require companies to give adequate advance notice of intended layoffs, both to the minister and to the working men and women in the plant, adequate opportunity for discussion about the way in which the termination of employment is going to be carried out; and adequate consideration for the varying lengths of time and duration of service of the many employees.

I don't know why it is that, even at this late date, we still have to treat everybody who happens to be a working person in a plant as if he is identical with everyone else, regardless of any variation in the length of time which he has served the company. I would hope very much that the Minister of Labour (B. Stephenson) will persuade her colleagues that this is a bill, when it passes today as I believe it will, will get to a committee, will be considered in committee, and will at some point allow discussion in committee, with representations being made, so that we can have at least this step forward in the provisions relating to the termination of employment in the case of mass shutdowns. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, the intent of Bill 2, An Act to amend the Employment Standards Act, is very laudable—to soften the financial, the social, the psychological impact of a mass termination.

The concern for terminated workers, I think, is expressed very clearly by the hon.

member for Quinte (Mr. O'Neil) in the pre-amble to his bill, and it's a concern which I share very deeply.

I believe it was this same concern which led to the introduction of section 3 of regulation 251 in 1970, as the hon. member for Riverdale has noted. Perhaps I should take just a moment to outline the purpose of section 3 of regulation 251.

It's designed to give advance notice of mass termination so that the employees can make the necessary adjustments in order to continue their careers without major interruption in earnings.

Secondly, it is designed to provide government with enough lead time to explore all possible means to assist either the company in resolving the problem or the workers in finding solutions to their termination difficulties and to minimize the potential disruptive effects. Like the hon. member, the members of my staff have, during the past year, questioned whether section 3 of regulation 251 fulfils these two objectives appropriately. They undertook an intensive review of mass terminations during the year 1975. This is also part of a total review of the Employment Standards Act which is at the present time being carried out by my staff.

They found—and I can report this to you—that terminated employees fell within two groups. The first group was the group that began to seek alternative employment immediately after the termination was announced. The second group was the group which does not do that, expecting that the termination will be rescinded at the eleventh hour, I suppose. This pattern was obvious, regardless of the length of time of advance notice.

Those with an optimism that I suppose could be construed as somewhat unrealistic, waited until they were actually terminated to start looking for another job, whether they had been given eight weeks' or 12 weeks' or 16 weeks' notice.

Our research has shown as well that the first six weeks after a notification of termination is the most crucial period of time. Most of the people who find alternative work in this kind of situation do so within the first six weeks of the notice of termination. I really have no evidence which would support the concept that lengthening the period of notice required would be productive in assisting the terminated workers, or the potentially terminated workers, in finding alternative employment, which is certainly one of the goals of this bill.

On the second point, regarding government action, the staff has also carried out a fair amount of research which shows that all possible government action can and is explored and implemented within the length of time required under section 3 of regulation 251. I believe that more time would not appreciably affect government's ability to either change or prevent the termination or to soften its effect upon the workers. I have grave concern on that point and feel that a lengthening of the period of time might not be beneficial at all.

Some may feel that the bill would, in effect, provide one benefit—another eight or 12 or 16 weeks of work. That isn't necessarily so, because if you take, for example, the case of an employer who must terminate 60 employees on June 30, under the present section the employer is required to notify those employees of the termination by no later than May 5. The proposed bill would not mean that the plant would remain open an additional eight weeks until August 25; indeed, what this bill would ensure was that the employer would simply notify the workers eight weeks earlier, on March 10, and regardless of the length of notice, the plant would still close on June 30.

An extension of the notice period through government action would not appreciably benefit the employee directly or indirectly; and I am afraid that it could have a negative effect because with mass termination—since most employees find other jobs before the date of termination and leave to take up their new jobs—there can be rather damaging effects during a very prolonged period of notice, and we have had some evidence of that within the past several weeks.

This situation often makes it very difficult for the employer to maintain the plant in operation and thereby continue to employ those individuals who have not found alternative employment. Obviously, the employer in that situation can't replace the employee, because no one's going to take a job knowing that the plant is going to close; therefore, the operation may have to be suspended earlier, the workers who are remaining there are put out of work earlier; and in fact it could provide an additional fairly hefty cost to the employer in that situation in terms of money in lieu of notice.

I doubt very much that extending the notice period could improve that problem. I think it would probably exacerbate it, except for one provision which is not included within Bill 2, and that is the provision that would freeze the employment of those employees for the period of notice, ensuring by law that all of those employees would be required to remain in their jobs until the period of notice had been concluded. That, I think, is a requirement which most employees would loathe to become a part of.

I cannot concur with the hon. member's suggestion that the four-week period in section 42 of the Employment Standards Act should be extended to 12 weeks. As members will understand, it is far more difficult for a terminated employee to find alternative work if there are hundreds of others seeking jobs at exactly the same time, particularly in small communities.

Take, for example, a situation in which 100 workers are to be terminated. If all 100 employees were to be terminated on the same day, the effect on the individual and on the community I think would be much more serious. If, however, the termination of 100 employees is spread over six months, for example, the effect while still serious is very much less so in the community context.

Section 42 of the Act was designed to encourage employers to space out terminations where it was necessary to have them, while protecting the worker's right to reasonable advance notice. And increasing that four-week period to 12 weeks would not reduce the number of persons terminated; it would merely mean that they would all be terminated on the same date.

The intent of the hon. member's recommendation, as I said, is laudable. But I have a suspicion that it might worsen the effect, rather than improve the situation. Under the Employment Standards Act as it is presently written, the mass termination requirements are prescribed in regulation 251. The purpose of stating the requirements in this manner is to allow some flexibility to make changes to the regulation when experience shows that those changes are necessary. That is something that can be done.

The intent of the hon. member's amendment is to move these portions into legislation, thus inhibiting the kind of flexibility that is now available—of the type suggested, for example, by the hon. member for Riverdale—for amending the regulation. In this instance, I believe that a legislative strait-jacket would not be in the best interests of either the employees or the employers.

I share the member's sincere concern about mass termination. As a result of that concern, the ministry has been not only attempting to prevent such terminations when they do occur but to limit the damage. In addition, we have been reviewing actively all the provisions of the Employment Standards Act related to this specific area. However, I cannot support Bill 2 at this time because I do not believe that it will do much to alleviate the financial, social or psychological effects of a termination. In fact, in certain instances it may indeed intensify them.

The ministry recognizes that changes are needed in the termination legislation and to this end our study is being carried out. We will continue that study. It should be completed within the very near future—I would say within the next two months—and hopefully at the end of that time the suggestions which have been made during the debate upon this very laudable bill suggested by the hon. member for Quinte—a bill which has some major imperfections—I think will be of great help to the ministry review staff in reviewing the termination provisions of our Act so that indeed we can make the required improvements.

Mr. Bolan: I would like to start off by saying that I support this bill introduced by my colleague from Quinte for various reasons which I will express. I do not expect to take my full allotted time because my comments are brief, but I would hope that they will be to the point.

Mr. Mancini: Brief but very good.

Mr. Bolan: On going over this bill, I think what really brought this to the minds of the people of this province is what transpired last October in Sudbury. We reacted in such a way to this mass layoff that one of the members of this House has seen fit to bring this bill forward. All I am saying at this time—I'm really addressing myself to all the members of this House—is that I think something can be done with this bill. I think something can be done to improve the lot of the employee who is faced with mass unemployment. This is why I am urging the members of this House to approve second reading of this bill, so that we can bring it to committee and, hopefully, do something with it.

It could very well be that at the committee level it could be debated more extensively. I think that an important piece of legislation like this should not just be given one hour and 10 minutes or whatever the case may be. I think that if the matter were brought to committee, ministry officials as well as members of the opposition—members of all parties—would have a better opportunity to explore the whole bill.

What's so magic about 16 weeks in the existing piece of legislation? Are we playing with numbers or what? My information as to how this 16 weeks came about—and I tried to get some historical background on it—is that it is the result of a strike which took place a few years ago when it was generally felt, following the strike, that 16 weeks was an appropriate period of time. As I say, what is so magic about 16 weeks? If 16 weeks will do it, why won't 32 weeks do it? Again, why should we be playing with numbers when we're dealing with the livelihoods of so many people.

On going through the bill I've also looked at other pieces of legislation in the western world. These people aren't crazy. These people have some good ideas. These people run sound economies in some of these countries outside of North America. I think we have to take a long, hard look at the type of legislation which they have which affects the worker. I suppose there is nothing more frustrating than to walk off the work line at 4 o'clock one evening and to be given a notice that says: "This is it, buddy. You're gone. You're not going to be around. You're no going to be wanted here very much longer."

I think this sense of frustration was expressed by the workers who were laid off in Sudbury. I really feel that had there been a longer period of time perhaps something more could have been done. I know that through attrition perhaps not as many people would have been laid off. I suppose one of the complaints of the employer is that he can't tell from one month to six months down the line, for example, how many cars Ford will have to produce. This is the argument which I get from people in industry. Because of the market conditions, they can't determine three months or six months down the line what the market requirements or what the demands will be for that particular product.

Surely there's more to it than just that. Surely these people have market researchers. Surely they study the market conditions. Perhaps they might have to sharpen their pencils. One realizes that when the pinch is on people come up with answers. As I say, perhaps the pencils will have to be sharpened to find alternative ways of dealing with the problems.

The other section of the bill which I would like to address myself to is the requirement that the ministry be notified of massive layoffs and that the notification be done in such a way that the minister and her people can sit down to see if anything can be worked out. I think that's a good idea.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's what we do now.

Mr. Bolan: I don't think the minister did it in this case.

Hon. B. Stephenson: In Inco?

Mr. Bolan: I really don't think the government did. It knew back in February that this was going to happen when the report—

Mr. Martel: That's right.

Mr. Bolan: —was filed from the Ministry of Natural Resources.

Mr. Martel: The Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller) sent it to a cabinet committee.

Mr. Bolan: I think it was February 22, 1977, that report was filed. It was filed with the Ontario cabinet and it predicted at that time what was going to happen to the nickel industry.

Mr. Martel: The cabinet rejected it.

Mr. Bolan: In fact, if the Inco officials would have read that report they probably would have seen what was coming.

Mr. Martel: Or if the government had read it.

Mr. Bolan: These were ministry officials of the Ministry of Natural Resources who had done an exhaustive study of the nickel industry in the province of Ontario. These were their findings and these were their reports. Unfortunately, for whatever reason, the ministry did not heed these storm signals that were out, as a result of which we had this massive layoff. All I'm saying is that the more time one has to work on these things, the better it is. I feel that if something had been done in February 1977 with that report this catastrophe might have been avoided.

Again, I don't think it is something which can be decided in the space of an hour and 10 minutes. This is why I am urging the members of this House to bring this bill to committee. Let's have a long, hard look at it. Put your people to work on it. The minister has competent staff. Let's see if something can be done to improve the situation of the worker who is affected by massive layoffs.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, I am going to be very brief. I don't really think there is that much time needed on it. I want to say at the outset, as my colleague did, that we will support the bill. I think it has a lot of merit. I think the minister is away off base in arguing that it may have exactly the reverse effect.

I remind the minister that necessity is quite often the mother of invention, and certainly a longer period of time could help this government undertake something they should have been doing a long time ago, and that is a planned, long-term employment policy, or industrial policy, in the province. We obviously don't have one at the present time, and that is part of the reason we are in some trouble.

I would go a little further than the member has—quite a bit further as a matter of fact—but don't want at this particular time to fudge the issue. However, I would ask him what the difference is between an employee who has served five, 10, 15 or 20 years with a company that has 25 or 50 or 100 or 500 employees. I really wonder if we are not in some ways creating first, second and third-class citizens, with the little additional notice one would get, depending whether one worked for a bigger or smaller plant.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You are contradicting your colleague from Riverdale.

Mr. Mackenzie: No, I don't think so necessarily. If I am, fine, I'm in disagreement; because that happens in this caucus and we are not as straitjacketed as I find the members across the way are when it comes to employment policies in Ontario.

Mr. Bounsall: Or votes on members' bills.

Mr. Warner: Inflexible, dogmatic Tories.

Mr. Mackenzie: It seems to me that there should be a longer period of notice—considerably longer—and it should apply to employees of a plant of any size, but certainly not less than the 50 employees plant size, and I would go lower than that.

The minister fears that it might result in an earlier closure; however, the companies are going to look at it very carefully because they are responsible for the salaries and benefits of the employees for the period of time once they have given the notice. In terms of corporate planning, most of them should have, if they are as good as we hear from the members across the way, the ability to know what they have to do, when they are in trouble, what kind of planning is necessary, and what costs they are going to have to allow for in terms of the employees.

I say that simply because everything we seem to do seems to be an incentive for business. We have seen, in my honest opinion, darn little in this House that deals with the employees and the problems they have when they are faced with layoffs. There certainly wasn't very much advance work done in the situation in Sudbury.

I think also there could be some real merit in—and I mentioned this before in committee and in the estimates—taking a look at the Swedish system, taxing some of these companies in good times and putting away a little bit for the bad times. Maybe if there were something they could draw on in terms of their own earnings, they might find their way out of a situation rather than close down a plant.

But certainly I wish the member had not broken it up into three sections and created the differential between the employees, depending on the size of the plant. As I said, I don't think it makes any difference how you do it.

Mr. O'Neil: You weren't here when I made my comments. I covered a bit of that.

Mr. Mackenzie: In any event, I just don't think the minister's comments hold water. I think if this kind of notice has to be given it puts an added obligation on the government, which is responsible for any welfare program costs. It gives the employees notice further in advance that they have to start looking for other employment. I think if the company were locked into the cost for that period of time they would do their best to see that that full period of time was used before the employees were let go.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But if they lose their key employees what happens?

Mr. Mackenzie: I think there is real merit in the bill, and I would hope all members of our party would support this bill.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for London South.

Mr. Martel: There is a great fellow to be speaking on this issue, I want to tell you.

Mr. Reid: You want to amend it now.

Mr. Walker: I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support the workers of this province—

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Sunset.

Mr. Walker: —and indicate that I oppose this bill because I think it is contrary—

Mr. Reid: That is having it both ways at once.

Mr. Bounsall: This is a Liberal-type speech.

Mr. Walker: —not only to the long-term but the short-term interests of industry, of economy and ultimately of jobs in this province.

The bill, as we know, basically will double the prescribed time from eight to 16 weeks in the case of 50 to 200 employees, from 12 to 24 weeks in the case of 200 to 500 employees and to as much as 32 weeks from the present 16 weeks in the case of more than 500 employees.

Mr. Warner: It's called protecting the workers.

Mr. Walker: I am opposed to this bill for a number of reasons, but there are two that I would like to touch on specifically. I would ask the question: What would happen if these employees were frozen into their jobs? If they were frozen into their jobs, they would not have the latitude they would need to get out and seek alternative employment when the appropriate time came. On the other hand, if they were not frozen into their jobs, what would happen if some of the skilled workers were lost in the line perhaps one month into the mission of some seven and a half months?

Mr. Mackenzie: Have you seen the lineup of unemployed?

Mr. Walker: Thirty-two weeks, of course, is almost three-quarters of a year. If a line were being shut down at some point in time 32 weeks on, or seven and a half months on, and if workers in some significant and integral part of that line were to leave their jobs—say the electricians or some form of mechanic were to leave their jobs—what would happen would be that the entire line itself would be shut down. How else could it happen?

No skilled employee would ever take on the balance of the job, to continue for that period from, say, the end of the first month to the end of seven and a half months, when the job would be finished; and the firm itself would be not inclined to hire. What would happen is they would end up paying full salary and having to shut down the whole line at that particular point in time, which would be well premature to the ultimate date of separation.

I take it in this bill there is no reference to the freezing of employees' jobs; so we have to assume there is no freezing of employees' jobs.

Mr. Mackenzie: Why not? They're still the ones who are facing the layoffs.

Mr. Walker: If that is the case, I could see the jobs being destroyed as soon as the line is shut down.

The next thing relates to the unnecessary burden that this would bring upon the employer.

Mr. Warner: You are getting silly.

Mr. Walker: There is a responsibility that we have to the workers. But there is a responsibility that we have to the shareholders of a company as well; they have to be acknowledged as being an integral part of our whole economy.

Mr. Mackenzie: That's all you ever looked at.

Mr. Martel: For a change, we thought about the workers.

Mr. Walker: What this bill is attempting to do is to destroy and emasculate the entire operation of our economy.

Mr. Warner: Take your jelly beans and go home.

Mr. Mancini: You are a heartless Tory.

Mr. Walker: In the case of Inco—and I served on the Inco committee—

Mr. Warner: No, put it the other way: You served for Inco.

Mr. Walker:—just look at that situation: There are 1,850 employees there who, I suppose, are averaging about $15,000 per year in terms of income. If they were to be given 32 weeks' notice—seven and a half months' notice—that would be about $9,600 per employee. For the 1,850 employees, it would have cost Inco well over $16 million just to carry the line when they had made the decision to cut out the line.

Mr. Martel: What did it cost society to see the layoffs?

Mr. Hodgson: You're the guys who destroyed Inco.

Mr. Martel: What did it cost society? The cost will be $60 million in unemployment insurance for the year.

Mr. Walker: That additional $16 million would have been imposed on that company instead of the $8 million.

Interjections.

Mr. Walker: The NDP are trying to squeeze the last drop from the lemon. That's what they are trying to do.

Mr. Mackenzie: Do you want to pass that on to the taxpayers?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bounsell: You wonder why your revenues are down in the province.

Mr. Bradley: They should have let the cat out of the bag earlier.

Mr. Hodgson: Elie, you were the guy who destroyed Sudbury. Take credit for it.

Mr. Walker: This kind of thinking being displayed by the opposition—by the member for Quinte—

Mr. Martel: You'd sooner pay $60 million in unemployment insurance.

Mr. Walker:—would destroy any marginal firm. If this had been applied to a firm like Falconbridge, the company would likely have gone under. That's the kind of thing that would have destroyed that company. And wouldn't the NDP have been happy then?

Mr. Martel: Come on. They had to give 16 weeks' notice.

Mr. Laughren: You don't know what you're talking about. You are being silly.

Mr. Mackenzie: As long as they had you in the House, they didn't have to worry.

Mr. Laughren: You are being silly.

Mr. Walker: Then the NDP would have been happy. They would be gleefully happy when that company fell completely. Then they would be delighted, I can tell.

Mr. Laughren: What a silly speech.

Mr. Walker: This is more than a firm can bear, to go on to the 32 weeks; it's absolutely ludicrous to continue on for that time.

Mr. Sargent: He is out of order, Mr. Speaker. He is out of order.

Mr. Walker: There would have been all kinds of firms that would have declared bankruptcy. I know the member for Owen Sound is going to support the position I am advancing right now, since he is a person who has worked in this area—

Mr. Sargent: The money was spent offshore, Gordie—hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Walker: If the employees had some 32 weeks' notice, almost three-quarters of a year, before the period of actual severance—

An hon. member: Oh, terrible!

Mr. Walker: —what then would be the value of unemployment insurance?

Mr. Mackenzie: Finally looking after workers.

Mr. Walker: That's exactly why we have unemployment insurance: to cover off the problem of the individual who in that period of time cannot find another job.

Mr. Bounsall: Let the taxpayers pay.

Mr. Mackenzie: They know they will get a tax credit from you people, so what the heck.

Mr. Walker: There would be another 50 weeks of unemployment insurance available on top of the 32 weeks.

Mr. Warner: The member for London South should start collecting immediately.

Mr. Mancini: He knows what it is like to be without a job, doesn't he?

Mr. Walker: I think that is reasonable. We have to ask, and understand, what do we expect the firm to really bear? What do they really have to bear in terms of their responsibility to society?

Mr. Bounsall: You are embarrassing the minister.

Mr. Warner: You should resign: You should do that right away.

Mr. Walker: I think that in the case of 16 weeks, these firms are respecting their responsibility to society and balance that off with their responsibilities to the shareholders.

Mr. Bounsall: You're embarrassing the minister.

Mr. Walker: It's absolutely impossible for companies automatically overnight to come to the conclusion that there should be a layoff.

Mr. Warner: Is this one of your personal concerns?

Mr. Walker: It takes a while to arrive at the conclusion that 500 or 600 or 700 employees should be laid off—

Mr. Mackenzie: One look at the balance sheet.

Mr. Walker: —so there is a significant period of lead time that would add perhaps two or three months.

In the case of Inco, it was obvious there should have been layoffs occurring in July, perhaps even sooner—

Mr. Germa: You're provoking me.

Mr. Martel: You heard the good news but your cabinet forgot to act on it. You might mention that.

Mr. Walker: —but that did not happen. They carried people something like one full year beyond what was necessary and I think there's a responsibility these companies have to have—

Mr. Bradley: They are all heart.

Mr. Walker: —particular when they're marginal industries. I'm not saying that Inco is a marginal industry, but there are a good many marginal industries which have had large layoffs.

Mr. Martel: What did your government do when they were warned, Gordon?

Mr. Walker: It would completely destroy companies like that to insist on some 32 weeks. In fact, it would end up triggering bankruptcies in a good number of cases where those companies would not otherwise have gone bankrupt.

That is the essence of the points I would like to make. We have to take a responsibility, not just to the employees. We have to balance that off with a responsibility to people who are owners of the company, such as the owners of Inco where this has been most prominent in the last few days.

Why, I think the members would even agree, some of us more quickly than others—

Mr. Bounsall: Some of us not at all.

Mr. Walker:—that MPPs after four years don't even get 32 week's notice of cancellation of their contract.

Mr. Bradley: We'll give you notice right now.

Mr. Mancini: Mr. Speaker, I rise to support Bill 93—

Mr. Bradley: Now here is a working man.

Mr. Mancini:—An Act to amend the Employment Standards Act, 1974. This bill has been introduced by my colleague and Liberal Labour critic, the member for Quinte. Once again, we see—

Mr. Warner: The man who's against the 40-hour work week.

Mr. Hodgson: That's the member for Rainy River (Mr. Reid) you're talking about, Liberal-Labour.

Mr. Mancini:—we see the Liberal Labour critic bringing forth legislation for the benefit of working people of the province of Ontario. And I hear some heckling from my left, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But Remo, it is Bill 2, not Bill 93.

Mr. Mancini: I hear the third party howling and crying, for once again the NDP have been sleeping on the job.

Mr. McClellan: How would you know? You are never awake.

Mr. Mancini: I realize that when a party is demoralized and confused and slips into third place the way they did, I know that now and then they can sleep on the job.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Mancini: It now is up to the Liberal Labour critic—

Mr. Acting Speaker: Request for a point of order.

Mr. Warner: He is out of order.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, a point of order, simply because the word "confused" has been used. The member said he was speaking on Bill 93. I've been speaking on Bill 2. Could you tell me who is right and who is wrong?

Mr. Acting Speaker: We're discussing Bill 2. The member for Essex South may continue.

Mr. Martel: Who is confused?

Interjections.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Mancini: I wish to thank my good friend, the member for Hamilton East—

Mr. O'Neil: Point of order.

Mr. Acting Speaker: There's another point of order by the member for Quinte.

Mr. Mancini: Another one?

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, this was more or less prearranged. We wondered how long it would take the NDP to wake up.

Mr. Bounsall: We waited until he used the word "confused."

Mr. Acting Speaker: Will the member for Essex South please continue uninterrupted?

Mr. Martel: Would you give that fellow a shovel?

Mr. Mackenzie: We have seen how confused you are. Like the 40-hour week.

Mr. Mancini: I would like to thank the hon. member for Hamilton East for catching that slight error, but that still does not detract from the fact that it was the Liberal Labour critic who took the initiative to introduce this bill—

Mr. Martel: Liberal Labour. Sounds like Pat Reid.

An hon. member: Sounds like a contraction.

Mr. Mancini:—when our friends to the left are still in a state of confusion since June 9, and I'm sure that their friends in labour, who have supported them over the past few years, are wondering to themselves just what kind of a mess they've got themselves into by supporting—

Mr. Warner: They wonder about your critic who opposes 40 hours a week.

Mr. Mancini:—one party which is in third place and is constantly confused.

Mr. Bounsall: There is no confusion over the support of you.

Mr. Mancini: There are two important points to this bill. First of all, it gives extended protection—

Mr. Martel: I hear they are going to guillotine it—led by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Mancini:—to people who are going to permanently lose their jobs.

Mr. Martel: I wish she defended labour as much as the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. W. Newman) defends farmers.

Mr. Mancini: I don't know if the Minister of Labour understands exactly what that means—to permanently lose your job.

Mr. Bradley: They'll know after the next election.

Mr. Mancini: When a person has been employed for a number of years and has built up a standard of living, I think this society and our corporate citizens should take all possible steps to make sure that the transition from an employee to a jobless person is done in a very orderly fashion and in a very humane fashion. That's why I don't think it is extraordinary at all that my colleague, the member for Quinte, would see fit to move this bill and to have notice extended, for 50 or more employees who are being laid off, to 16 weeks from eight; for 200 or more employees who are being laid off; to 24 weeks from 12, and finally, for 500 employees, from 16 to 32 weeks. I don't know how any one in this Legislature can tell me that when one lays off as many as 500 employees it's just done, as if there was no consultation, as if it just came upon us, as if we did not know that in the future the market was going to slump. It just happened.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's not true.

Mr. Mancini: There are four automobile corporations that control the whole market here in North America. Is the minister trying to tell me that their market analysts and their researchers cannot project the layoff of 500 employees, when year after year they have been smart enough to make huge profits and yet when they have to lay off employees they are not smart enough to be able to know what is going to happen?

A part of the bill which I think has been demonstrated to be so very necessary in the past few weeks is where the employer must consult with the Minister of Labour or the appropriate ministry and the trade union involved which is representing the workers. I would like to quote from an article written by Richard Gwyn, which states: "I was informed of the layoffs 24 hours in advance." This is a statement made by the federal Minister of Finance, Jean Chretien, October 21, 1977, and it deals with the Inco and Falconbridge matter. Can anyone tell me why in our society today the most important people in public office would not be told of such a devastating action of one of our corporate citizens longer than 24 hours before the action took place? I think that's insulting to the people of the province and also to us as their representatives.

I don't think the bill is calling for anything extraordinary. It asks corporate citizens to consult with their government. It asks corporate citizens to consult with the representatives of the workers, and this bill asks that corporate citizens give people who are going to become jobless after having permanent jobs the chance for a human transitional period. I urge all members of this Legislature to support this bill and, once again, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Quinte.

Mr. Bounsall: I will be very short, Mr. Speaker. I will start right at the start that as far as this particular private member's bill goes I have no problem supporting it. I am sure other speakers have indicated what it does. It deals with the mass lay-off section of the Employment Standards Act dealing with termination of employment, and it doubles the amount of notice time for the various categories of employees that are already so defined in this case in the regulations.

I might just say that over the years, from the spring of 1972 through to the spring of 1977, when I was Labour critic for our party, I had argued that mass layoffs, irrespective of percentage of persons employed in the plant, should pertain when 20 or more are laid off. I saw no reason for the figure 50 being retained in the Act or for the figure being as high as 50. Mass termination should start at the figure 20. That is when the weeks of notice pertaining should prevail. This Act is fine as far as it goes in that it doubles the weeks for those contained in the regulations under this Act but it is flawed in the sense that it should have started at a much lower figure.

Also there's a problem with the Act, though not particularly with the bill in so far as it goes. In a bill dealing with termination of employment, the section of the Act with which it is much more important to deal is section 1 of the Act and not section 2. Section 1 deals with the notice required to be given to individual employees. In the Employment Standards Act under section 1 if an employee has worked from three months to two years, an appalling short amount of one week's notice only is required.

Our sister province in Quebec gives one month's notice after one year of employment. They have given that length of notice, I believe, since the fall of 1972, or it may be the spring of 1973. For all those years, either since late 1972 or early 1973, in the Quebec statutes the amount of termination notice required to be given to an individual employee after one year's service is one month.

Here in this province this Labour minister and Labour ministers before her, I might say, of which I notice there is one here in the House today, are content to have and always have been content to have just one week's notice if someone has worked up to two years. It's that individual notice to employees, irrespective of how many others are laid off, which has always been of much more concern to me and which will have much more effect in the workplace.

The present Act under section 1 gives two weeks' notice for from two to five years' employment. That should be two months. It provides four weeks' notice for from five to 10 years. That should be four months. It states eight weeks' notice for someone employed over 10 years. That should be six months or even be eight months. Our proposals over the years have been six months. I might say that the minister can refer to the in-depth studies which the ministry has done. They reside in the Ministry of Labour library and have been there since 1974. All the arguments are made therein for giving much longer termination notice. All the advice has been tendered by the people charged with making the study to the successive Ministers of Labour about how the times under this Act need to be extended, particularly in part A of the Act. And nothing has been done.

One of the arguments used by previous Ministers of Labour, and I would assume by this one—we certainly got it from the member for London South—is that if the employer is required to pay for further weeks of termination notice in lieu of continuing to hire that employee, then that would interfere with the unemployment insurance system. We all know in this House that the unemployment insurance system payouts for a few years now, have overrun the income which has been taken in. When they say they don't want these notices to interfere with the unemployment insurance payouts, what they are saying is they are content to have the taxpayers of this province ripped off in terms of termination payments rather than have the companies pay them, which is where the onus for that should be residing.

They're saying they will let off the companies, whose lack of organization and lack of proper planning are responsible for the layoff anyway, and they'll let the taxpayers of Canada pay for that lack of organization, foresight and planning on behalf of the employers in this province. I put to you that it is reprehensible to take that attitude. You're quite willing, over there—at least, as stated today, the member for London South is quite willing—to do that.

If the former Minister of Labour, now the member for Humber (Mr. MacBeth), speaks to the bill, this was his argument for not making this change when it was presented to him in the 1975 Labour estimates. As I say, that is a position which says: "We would prefer to have the taxpayers of Canada ripped off through payments out of UIC than to put the proper onus on the employers in the province when that occurs." It's simply not a valid argument. I don't see, in this instance, why the taxpayers should pay when the responsibility lies clearly with the lack of planning of the employers in this province.

Because of another meeting I wasn't in the House to hear the remarks of the member for Riverdale, whose effort was responsible for this section coming into the Act in the first place. But I would say that what was obtained then was the very maximum which could be squeezed out of the government of the day, while we recognized it, on this side, to be bare minimum protection. To think it has not been changed for nine years indicates the attitude of the government with respect to terminations of workers by employers of this province.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Oh, come on.

Mr. Bounsall: It is an attitude of saying to employers: "Go ahead, and do virtually anything you wish."

Hon. B. Stephenson: There's exactly the same thing in every other jurisdiction in Canada.

Mr. Mancini: You have no social conscience.

Mr. MacBeth: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martel: There's the former Minister of Labour. There is another defender of the working people.

Mr. Sargent: How does it feel to be a private citizen, John?

Mr. MacBeth: I want a little time to say a few words. I hadn't intended to rise on this bill but the good member for Windsor-Sandwich took my name in vain and I thought perhaps I should say a word on my own behalf in the matter of labour.

When it comes to notice, fair is fair. So many of the people on the opposite side of the House always put the employer in the black hat. Some employers wear white hats and some employers don't have very big heads either, and they don't have very big pocketbooks. But, as I say, fair is fair, and if they're to give notice then perhaps the employee should have to give notice too.

I remember, when I was Minister of Labour, the number of complaints I got from employers whom the Ministry of Labour took to court because they hadn't given proper notice. Yet when an employee suddenly walked out and gave no notice at all there was little that the Ministry of Labour would do for them and there was little point in getting after those people individually.

So I'm saying that if you want to make the employer give this kind of notice, perhaps it is fair that the employee, likewise, should have to give the employer that kind of notice—if the planning is all that far advanced as some of the people in the Liberal caucus seem to think it is.

Mr. Makarchuk: It might be fair to tell the OPP to lecture management too on strike breaking.

Mr. MacBeth: No employer wants to lay people off. They only do it for one reason and that is because their business is not succeeding.

Mr. Laughren: Yes, you're right, John.

Mr. MacBeth: They don't do it because they want to ruin their own business. They don't do it because they don't like their employees. They do it out of economic necessity.

If we're to encourage the small businessman—and I tell you that all business people in this province are not Inco—there are a lot of small corporations who—

Mr. Mancini: Small businesses lay off 500 people?

Mr. MacBeth:—try to do fairly by their employee. But, at the same time, if we want to encourage these people, then we must make reasonable laws for the employers as well. We hear from the other side so often how they want to encourage people to invest in this country. As I said, fair is fair and if we're going to have one set of rules for the employees we better make sure that the set of rules for the employers is equally just.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for London Centre, for no more than two minutes.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, in fairness now, I always get caught at the end.

An hon. member: What, are we out of time?

Mr. Peterson: I am very happy to rise on this bill, with the very mixed point of view that I have. At the outset, I want to compliment my colleague, the next Minister of Labour in this House. I want to say that I think he has shown a great deal of sensitivity and understanding in bringing this bill forward. It amazes me how this chap has grabbed hold of his critic's job in labour, Mr.

Speaker, and we are still friends and we are still associates.

Mr. Martel: Yes he has. He voted against a 40-hour work week. Tell us how he grabs it by the handle.

Mr. Peterson: Every day the working people of this province are coming to my friend, the member for Quinte, and responding to his leadership.

Interjections.

Mr. Peterson: I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, he has done wonderful things for the Liberal Party. He has opened up new avenues for this party, and legions of support heretofore belonging to our friends on the left.

Mr. Nixon: More, more.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, with a combination of that kind of support plus other kinds of support in this province, there's no doubt in my mind that we will be forming the government at the next election, due in very large measure to the efforts of my friend.

Interjections.

Mr. Peterson: However, Mr. Speaker, I want to just speak very briefly on this issue, because I cannot support this bill at this time. It is with great regret that I am on the same side of this issue as my red-necked friend from London South (Mr. Walker) because I really don't like to be associated with him in any way.

Mr. Sargent: That's understandable.

Mr. Peterson: Unfortunately, I hope that it's not construed that way.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: What makes you think his feelings are anything but the same?

Mr. Peterson: I want to say at this time that I have sympathy with the import and with the ideas behind the bill.

Mr. Martel: That's what he said about the 40-hour work week too.

Mr. Peterson: Ideally it's the kind of legislation that we do need, but in this time of great economic trouble in this province, in a time when we are facing very serious de-industrialization, when there's a very major crisis of confidence in the investment community, then I say that this may be just one more nail in the coffin of industry and enterprise in this province and I say that this should be delayed.

Mr. Mackenzie: Are you going to cross the floor too?

Mr. Peterson: This is the kind of bill that would not help the situation now. My very great regret is this, that decisions that are made in the investment community, in the corporate boardrooms and when the people—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I know my friend, the member for Quinte, who was going to take 10 minutes, wants to cede to me at least three or four minutes of that, he being a decent sort of chap.

Mr. Hodgson: Withdraw the bill, withdraw the bill.

Mr. Martel: Oh there is the friend of labour.

Mr. Foulds: Cut him off, his time has expired.

Mr. Peterson: I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, we will never know in this House the ill effects of this bill because there is no scientific way of measuring them; but I can say this, that the investment community, the people making these decisions are getting increasingly disgruntled about the province of Ontario as a place to invest or as a place to participate on future growth.

Mr. Foulds: Boy, it sure is nice to get stabbed in the back by your own colleagues.

Mr. G. Taylor: David, come on over.

Mr. Peterson: We cannot afford at this point in our history any more of this kind of self-defeating regulation, in my judgement.

Mr. Foulds: Marvin Shore moved over, David; why don't you?

Mr. Peterson: That is why, even though patently on the face of the bill there is great benefit to the working people, and I understand that, as I say; I want to repeat we will never know the ill effects but we will see a gradual deterioration in the economic climate in this province, something that we will all be dealing with from a much more urgent point of view in two or three or four years, unless of course a Liberal government is elected.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to thank all those members of the parties who have supported this bill of mine.

Mr. Foulds: Except the previous speaker.

Mr. O'Neil: It's also a pleasure to see the NDP falling in behind the Liberal labour policy. We realize it has taken them a long time but they are finally coming around to the way we see things.

I would like to comment on a couple of the minister's statements. I think the minister and her staff also see the benefit of a bill such as this. She mentioned that there is a study at the present time being undertaken by her ministry and I would hope she would change her mind and those of her colleagues to see that this bill is supported. She mentioned that she felt a six-week period was sufficient for people to find other employment. I don't think this has been the case with the Inco and Falconbridge layoffs. These people have not found jobs over a six-week period and I would ask her to change her mind on it.

When we get listening to that far-to-the-right member there for London South, I wonder if he has ever had anything to do with the working man.

Mr. Havrot: He is one; he is a working man.

Mr. O'Neil: I just don't think he knows what it's all about.

Mr. Havrot: Describe a working man.

Mr. O'Neil: I can say that there was no intention of a freezing as part of this bill; and I don't believe that you are going to have any of these lines in the larger companies closing down just because they can't find other employees to fill a position. So I don't think that stands at all.

As previously stated, I hope that the members of this Legislature will vote in support of this bill; and I would urge that it then be sent to committee to be studied and to possibly bring about some great changes in this province of ours.

ANSWERS TO WRITTEN QUESTIONS AND PETITION

Hon. Mr. Welch: With the consent of the House, I could table some answers to questions. I wish to table the interim answer to question 10 standing on the notice paper; to table the response to petition 1 presented to the House, and to table the answers to questions 8 and 14 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix, page 539).

VISITOR

Mr. Bounsall: Mr. Speaker, I wish the House to recognize that the former member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. R. G. Hodgson) is here with us today.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL UNIFORM PRICING ACT

Mr. Lane moved second reading of Bill 3, An Act to require a Single Price for Gasoline and Heating Oil sold in Ontario by a Wholesaler.

Sufficient members having objected by rising, a vote was not taken on Bill 3.

EMPLOYMENT STANDARDS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. O'Neil moved second reading of Bill 2, An Act to amend the Employment Standards Act, 1974.

Sufficient members having objected by rising, a vote was not taken on Bill 2.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Welch: May I take advantage of this time to indicate the order of business for the balance of this week and for the next week. This evening we will be in committee of the whole to continue consideration of Bill 59.

It had been understood earlier that perhaps we could wait until all the amendments had been considered by the committee and have one bell next Tuesday evening, but there appears to be an amendment presently before the committee which would have to be disposed of one way or another, because it has some implications as to whether another amendment is introduced in its place. So it's felt that we should advise members of the House that there is likely to be a division in committee in connection with Bill 59, some time this evening from about 9 o'clock on.

After that particular amendment is handled then it's my understanding the remaining amendments will be stacked. The plan at the moment is that we might reach the completion of that bill in committee by next Tuesday evening.

Next week's schedule: On Monday afternoon of next week, a financial critic, the member for London Centre (Mr. Peterson), speaks on the budget.

Mr. Nixon: That'll be good.

An hon. member: Another Tory speech.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Then if time permits, if the hon. member is finished before 6 o'clock, we will then go into committee of the whole and carry on with Bill 59. On Tuesday the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) will make his contribution to the budget debate in the afternoon.

An hon. member: That won't be a Tory speech.

Mr. Martel: He's not even a plumber.

Hon. Mr. Welch: If time remains when he finishes, between then and 6, we'll do Bill 59 as well. Then on Tuesday evening, in the evening session from 8 to 10:30, we will do Bill 59 again and hopefully complete the work in committee of the whole some time before 10:30 next Tuesday.

The House does not meet in the chamber on Wednesday, and on Thursday we deal with two other ballot items standing in the names of the members for Welland-Thorold (Mr. Swart) and Simcoe Centre (Mr. G. Taylor), with the House adjourning at 6 o'clock for the winter break.

I might also indicate to members of the House at this time that there have been some discussions with respect to handling the supplementary estimates which have been tabled in the House. We'll have the motion ready tomorrow but perhaps I might take advantage at this time to indicate to the members the disposition of the supplementary estimates.

Those estimates standing in the name of the Minister of Education (Mr. Wells) will be referred to the standing committee on social development, which will start its work on Monday afternoon, it's my understanding.

Agriculture and Food and Northern Affairs will go to the resources development committee for consideration on Tuesday evening, March 14.

Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs and Government Services will go to the general government committee on Wednesday afternoon, March 15, it being the understanding that all of the supplementary estimates will be completed not later than March 15 in order to be reported back to the House on Thursday prior to the spring break.

Also, we would indicate by motion that the resources development and the justice standing committees may sit next week on Wednesday morning if they require time for meetings.

As far as the main estimates are concerned, we'll have a motion that will spell out those in some detail. However, the Ministry of the Environment and the Ministry of Culture and Recreation will start in their respective committees on Tuesday, March 28 after the break. The Ministry of Government Services will start in the committee of supply in the House on Monday afternoon, April 3.

Some time is being found to honour the statutory requirement with respect to a debate on the 1976 annual report of the Workmen's Compensation Board, which will go to the resources development standing committee next Wednesday, March 15.

Mr. Foulds: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that should we complete Bill 59 early next Tuesday evening we would proceed with Bills 25 and 27. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Yes, thank you very much. If by any chance we did complete Bill 59 before 10:30 next Tuesday evening, we would then turn to Bills 25 and 27, being orders 16 and 18 on the order paper.

The House recessed at 6 p.m.

8. Mr. Reid—Inquiry of the ministry: 1. Will the ministry advise the total revenues received from the mining industry in Ontario, exclusive of aggregates, for the last five years ending December 31, 1977? 2. Will the ministry provide a breakdown of the different provincial taxes paid by the mining industry in these five years? (Tabled February 22, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller):

1. Total revenues received from the mining industry in Ontario for the past five years, ending December 31, 1977, amounted to $316,800,000 *excluding Ontario Corporations Income Tax and Capital Tax, and Ontario Sales Tax.

*Corporations Capital Tax	12,200,000
	(4 years only, up to March 31, 1976)

*Supplied by the Ministry of Revenue.

10. Mr. Peterson—Inquiry of the ministry: Would the ministry provide an updated list of all boards, agencies and commissions to which the government makes appointments, the administrative costs of the above boards, agencies and commissions including names of commissioners and method and amount of indemnity, and the amount of funds administered by the said boards, agencies and commissions in the current fiscal year? (Tabled February 23, 1978.)

Interim answer by the Chairman of Management Board of Cabinet (Mr. Auld):

I respectfully request an extension of time required to complete the answer to question 10, order paper 4.

11. Mr. Reid—Inquiry of the ministry: Could the ministry provide details of the contract between the Ministry of Industry and Tourism and Trillium Advisory Consultants of Sudbury? How long has there been such a contract? How much has been paid to Trillium? What are the details of the contract? Please advise the same information in regard to other consulting firms under this program. (Tabled February 27, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) tabled as sessional paper 31.

14. Mr. Warner—Inquiry of the ministry: Will the Minister of Government Services table an inventory of all provincially owned vacant land located within the city of Metropolitan Toronto, and the accompanying appraised "book value" of the lands? Further, will the ministry forward the information to the Minister of Housing so that he might make lands available to the city of Metropolitan Toronto solely for the purpose of developing housing? (First tabled November 25, 1977. Interim answer December 8, 1977. Tabled March 6, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Government Services (Mr. Henderson):

The following is a list of provincially owned land which is currently vacant and located within the city of Metropolitan Toronto:

1. The former Driver Examination Centre (1349 Kennedy Road).
2. The former Rouge Patrol Yard (West side of Sheppard Avenue East and one mile North of Highway 2).
2. A portion of the proposed site for the Scarborough Courthouse (McCowan and Ellesmere Roads).
4. Property located on Falstaff Avenue near the Driver Examination Centre (Keele Street and Highway 401.)
5. Property east of Bay Street adjacent to the Queen's Park complex.

Current appraised values are not available for these lands.

These lands would not be suitable and/or available for the purposes of developing housing for various reasons, such as property partially surrounded by commercial development and secondary industry, property being negotiated for sale, plans being developed for future use, close proximity to multi-lane highway, et cetera.

It should be noted that this ministry has in the past and does continue to discuss with the city the disposal of any surplus government lands which might be suitable for housing development, whenever such lands become vacant.

In addition, it should be noted that the Ministry of Government Services recently reviewed with the Ministry of Housing all surplus and/or vacant lands in Metropolitan Toronto, as well as other areas of the province. It was determined from this review that current surplus and/or vacant land in Metropolitan Toronto would not be suitable for housing development.

Petition 1:

Response by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kerr) to petition to the House requesting change in the Coroners Act:

A petition has been filed in the Legislature requesting that an amendment be made to the Coroners Act enabling forensic pathologists to remove pituitary glands from all cases where an autopsy is performed pursuant to the provisions of the Coroners Act. The principle behind this petition is that some 10,000 autopsies are performed a year pursuant to the provisions of the Coroners Act and this would enable the medical profession to obtain pituitaries to treat persons who are suffering from a rare growth hormone deficiency.

A couple of years ago this matter was considered in the form of an amendment to the coroner's case is the result of a coroner's gists to remove pituitary glands in cases coming to autopsy pursuant to the coroner's warrant, if there was no contrary intention of the deceased known at the time of death, or if the next-of-kin did not object.

It was thought that as the coroner's autopsy is done in many cases without the approval of the next-of-kin, that it was unfair and indeed improper to remove organs or tissue for medical purposes. The autopsy in a coroner's case is the result of a coroner's warrant pursuant to sections 9 and 23 of the Act because the cause of death is not apparent without this medical procedure.

At that time it was also thought that more organs for transplant and tissue for medical research would become available through an expanded information program.

In January, 1978, the Ministry of the Solicitor General, in conjunction with the chief coroner's office, commenced an education and information program per the attached news release of February 2, 1978, and the enclosed brochure Help Somebody Someday. This expanded publicity program has had a most beneficial effect on the number of organs donated for transplant and tissue provided for scientific research. In addition, the public has been made aware of the form which is now available on their driver's licence which can be filled out and carried on one's person in the event of death. This card then informs the family physician, the coroner and the police. Action is then taken to have the organs removed which have been designated on the voluntary donor card.

I am informed that one of the petitioners in this case is Linda Geiger, whose son Brett Watson, is suffering from a rare growth hormone deficiency that requires treatment. Chief Coroner Cotnam has been in conversation with Dr. John Bailey who is in charge of this program at the Hospital for Sick Children. Dr. Cotnam is informed that this particular youngster is now about to receive treatment. Dr. Bailey at one time was of the opinion that compulsory taking of pituitary glands would be necessary to fulfill the medical needs of this program. However, with the expanded information program, people are becoming aware of the need for such tissue and this has resulted in an increased number of glands over the past few years. In 1972 there were only 2000 glands donated to this program. In 1976 there were 3945 glands and in 1977 before our new expanded program commenced requesting this type of tissue donation, there were 5703 glands. It is estimated that the total number of glands required to meet this medical program would be 10,000 per year. Dr. Bailey is of the opinion that mandatory taking of such glands is not necessary for this quota to be met in the very near future.

It is submitted that it would be better for this anatomical tissue to be donated voluntarily by persons while still in life or by the next-of-kin after death, than to take them from deceased persons who have not indicated while still in life, a desire to have their bodies used for such purposes.

In the event that these glands are not forthcoming in the numbers required, I would recommend an amendment to the Coroners Act providing these glands be removed by forensic pathologists after obtaining the consent of the next-of-kin.

Petition 2:

Response by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Grossman) to petition filed by Mr. R. Van Horne:

The government has already indicated that the age at which one can consume alcohol is under study. A formal decision will be announced during the current session of the Legislature.

The advertising of alcohol beverages is a complex area which has substantial social and economic impact in this province. The government intends to continue to strengthen its monitoring and control of beverage alcohol advertising but has no plans at the present time to ban advertising. Recent studies commissioned by the federal government questioned the direct relationship between advertising and consumption. In addition, other influences such as uncontrolled advertising from US media, loss of jobs in Ontario, changing consumption patterns, et cetera, lead the government to believe that its current course of action in allowing advertising which meets carefully prepared guidelines is in the best interest of the majority of Ontario's citizens.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MARCH 9, 1978

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Resumption of the adjourned debate in committee of the whole House on Bill 59, An Act to reform the Law respecting Property Rights, and Supporting Obligations between Married Persons and in other Family Relationships.

Mrs. Campbell: On a point of order, if I may, Mr. Chairman: My point of order is that this committee did engage in a procedure by which the votes were to be stacked. We are now informed that there has been an intrusion of change on that and that there will be a vote at 9 o'clock. If I am correct about that, my point of order is that the member for Carleton East (Ms. Gigantes) in moving the adjournment of the debate indicated that she would be speaking at some length on this particular amendment, and I would ask whether there is any provision for some division of time among the other parties in view of the limitation of debate tonight on this section.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I would inform the member for St. George that the debate is not limited. The vote at 9 o'clock is only an estimate. As far as I am concerned, lacking any other instruction, the vote on this clause will not be taken until everyone who wishes to speak has spoken.

I would remind the hon. members that we are dealing with section 3, and particularly with the amendments by Mr. Bounsall.

On section 3:

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment moved by my colleague the member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Bounsall), which says in effect that family assets which are to be shared should include all assets which are acquired after the marriage or the appreciation of any assets which were acquired before the marriage as well as the appreciation of those acquired after.

In my opinion section 3 is the key section in the bill, because it says what assets shall be shared on the 50-50 basis that comes in section 4.

It seems to me this amendment is the test of whether the members of this House are really going to recognize the equality of the spouses and that marriage is a partnership, which is set forth in the preamble as the objective of the bill. If we do not accept this amendment, we are not recognizing those objectives in the preamble. It is as simple as that.

I can understand to some extent the reluctance of some members to broaden the concept of assets, because they have lived for so many years with an unequal situation where one spouse, the spouse who stayed at home—and usually it was the wife, of course—was expected to contribute all her services for love and not to get any recognition for her contribution to the growth of family wealth. In fact, they used to try to dignify her role by saying that she filled many roles; that she was in effect a seamstress, a laundress, a cook, a child psychologist, a household economist and many other things.

But if you look at the way her contribution was recognized, she was just one thing: She was a philanthropist. She was a philanthropist in that she gave all of those services and performed all of those roles for nothing. There was no recognition that in performing those roles she was contributing to the opportunities of the other spouse to build up assets. Nor was there any recognition that in fulfilling all those roles she was denying herself career opportunities, education opportunities and experience opportunities.

Generally, she would not be in any sense an equal of the other spouse at the time of marriage breakup when they both were entering the employment market together, because over those years she had lost a great deal of the opportunities to develop herself for the employment market. Moreover, she would be entering an employment market which is biased against women, in which basically only the lower-paid jobs are open to women in any quantity. So if we are going to change that thinking and start to recognize the contribution that women have made by being the spouse, who stayed in the home and who forwent all those things, we must include all assets. Otherwise we are making a mockery of the preamble and of the objectives of the bill.

I find it difficult to understand the reason that the member for St. George does not appear to be supporting this concept.

Mr. Sterling: Because she understands the law, that's why.

Mr. Bounsall: Oh, come on, Norman.

Mr. Swart: The whip's been at work.

Mr. Bounsall: It is what the law should be.

Ms. Bryden: I find it rather strange that the only contribution to an attempt to improve the Act appears to be one amendment from the Liberal Party which would perhaps clarify section 4. It sets forth equal sharing, but it would clarify it only in the guidelines given to judges when one goes to court to settle whether there should be other assets included.

The one thing the member for St. George does not seem to understand is that women do not want to have to go to court to settle what assets they should be entitled to. They want it laid down in the law that they are entitled to a 50-50 sharing of all assets. If there are inequities, because of perhaps the shortness of the marriage, then there may be reason for judicial discretion, for going to court to have some different division of the assets. But to leave it all to judicial discretion is to leave women at the mercy of the court, to force them to the costs and the delays involved in courts, and also to leave them to the whims of judges.

I'm afraid there are still some judges who have 19th century ideas—or perhaps Stone Age ideas. There are still some judges who think even that the testimony of women at certain periods of their lives is untrustworthy. There are some judges who still believe that the commercial assets should not be shared unless the woman has contributed work or money towards those assets, that have not yet recognized the contribution that women do make through enabling the other partner to build up a career.

So to leave the division of any other assets, except the paltry few that are covered under section 3 right now, to judicial discretion is to really leave women at the mercy of courts, and their past experience has not been too good in that field.

I point out also that the Ontario Law Reform Commission, in its recommendations, said on page 119: "that the committee recommends that all property acquired during marriage by either spouse should be subject to the equalizing claims between the spouses." The Ontario Law Reform Commission recognized that any equal splitting of assets should include all property acquired during marriage. I submit that judicial discretion is not sufficient—that judges need more than guidelines as they would be given under the Liberal amendment if that is adopted.

In fact, the judges already have that guideline under section 8 of the bill which is really a re-enacting of the 1975 family law reform bill. That was the first timid step by this government towards family law reform, but it did at least say that a judge should be guided by the contribution of the spouses, notwithstanding the fact that they were acting simply as a normal spouse, in other words, fulfilling the role of running the household.

What is suggested in the Liberal amendment is already in there. I don't know that it needs very much more clarification to tell the judges that they should consider the wider contribution of the spouse who stayed in the home.

I would like to tell the House about a little incident that happened this week, I understand. A group of doctors in Toronto was meeting with one of their accountants who was giving them some instruction on the new family law bill. He was telling them that if this bill passes they would have to arrange their affairs thus and so if they wanted to keep their assets out of the hands of their wives. There happened to be one woman doctor in the group. She spoke up and asked was it not the objective of the law to share the assets between the two spouses. At that point, they decided to adjourn for coffee.

It seems to me that failure to adopt this amendment is a denial of the equal sharing and the recognition of partnership. I think if one could take the government to court, one could take them to court on a charge of fraud because without this amendment to section 3 we are not getting the objectives in the preamble. We are not getting half a loaf, though some people say let's pass the bill because it's got some good things in it and is getting rid of a lot of archaic laws. We are not even getting a quarter of a loaf for the women of Ontario.

What we are getting is a betrayal of the government's tentative objectives of providing equality for the sexes and a recognition of the marriage partnership. I submit that any person who does not support this amendment is perpetrating a fraud on the women of Ontario.

Mr. Reed: That sums it up.

Mrs. Campbell: I am glad we have a new definition of the term fraud. Coming from one who is so knowledgeable of the law, I don't suppose it is appropriate for me to go into the matter of what does and what does not constitute fraud. It interests me very much to have the kind of a threat held over this Legislature that if we don't agree with the member for Beaches-Woodbine, then we are indeed a fraudulent bunch of people. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I feel no sense of defrauding anybody. Rather I feel it is important that we view this legislation very seriously. When I think that the Manitoba legislation was lost because of posturing, I do not wish to be a party to posturing.

Mr. McClellan: That was because of the Conservatives.

Ms. Gigantes: The Liberals got wiped out.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I have earnestly tried to look at this legislation, calling, as I must upon whatever small ability I have in the field of law, so that what we shall wind up with is legislation which will be workable and which will, indeed, recognize the equality of the partners in a marriage.

I do go this far, however, and say that as a member of the legal fraternity, I blush—as every lawyer must blush—that the women of this province have such suspicions of judges, and that suspicion is due to their very real bad experiences before the courts. I think we have lent ourselves in no small measure to the process by which women have justifiably formed these suspicions, and I, as a member of the profession, take responsibility for that.

I hope the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) joins with me in his concern that so many people could have this kind of suspicion with a piece of legislation which, in my view, is certainly not perfect. If I thought it were perfect, I would feel I had rocks in my head. But it is a step forward. I would like to say that it was the member for Beaches-Woodbine who dragged in that old red herring about dower; and I'm sure she doesn't understand that. Yet I would have thought she might have consulted her very able colleagues, either from Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) or from Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor), to acquaint herself with the meaning and the viability of dower.

So, I suppose, when I listen to debate, I am inclined to review what is said on the basis of what I perceive to be the knowledge of a person on the subject. I have given to my friends in the third party, as well as members of my own party, an amendment which I shall be moving. It is virtually the same amendment I had moved for section 8, but quite appropriately it is moved in section 4.

Ms. Gigantes: Wrong place, Margaret.

Mrs. Campbell: This section does indeed delineate, at the breakdown of the marriage, the functions of spouses in the marriage, and it does provide for joint functions in all of the aspects of the marriage.

People have—I think, inadvertently—misled some of the women in our community into believing that all we are doing is to recommend through this bill and this amendment that we incorporate the economic partnership; but because we do not incorporate the commercial assets we somehow or other are denigrating the woman in that process. I'm a little saddened by that because I think women must have a view to their own position, but also to that which is in the best interests of the total family where children are involved. It is this concern that I have, when one blithely, and I use the term advisedly, incorporates everything into that disposition, because there will be a court decision in that event, make no mistake about that.

What we are saying is that the court may make a division of any property that is not a family asset, where the effect of the assumption by one spouse of any of the responsibilities is as set out in subsection 5 on the ability of the other spouse to acquire, manage, maintain, operate or improve property that is not a family asset.

We have had many representations that this should be included and that that should be included. I think we have to understand that if we resort to the sort of shopping list which is contemplated within the aegis of this, that we may desperately limit the ability of a spouse to establish a position.

Mr. Chairman, it is probably the easiest, most facile kind of emotion in the world to move that all of the assets just be lumped together and divided in half. It is desperately easy for me to want to support that, having fought as long as I have for equality of women before the law. But you know, we don't want to make the same mistakes here that we made in passing Bill 60, because now we are beginning to see some of the problems which have been created in not using this matter globally.

I want to say that I very much appreciate the fact that the Attorney General is prepared to give this House an undertaking that we will sit down and review that portion of that bill.

It seems to me that if we really want to work on an equal partnership basis—and I'm sorry that some of the members of the third party do not see the other side of the coin—we do want to look at women whose roles are not the stereotype roles. So, if we want to deal with a balance, then I must state quite frankly that I cannot support this amendment and for the reasons given.

I wish those who are speaking on this subject would, indeed, be concerned enough with the bill that they should not be rushing around this country stirring up women, misleading them as to what the bill, in fact, does say; and—

Ms. Bryden: Women are stirred up anyway.

Mrs. Campbell: They are, you know. When you start running around talking about this bill getting rid of dower—

Mr. Philip: If you had been present at the hearings you would realize they were already stirred up. Where were you when the hearings were on?

Mrs. Campbell: When you stand around talking about getting rid of dower and what a terrible thing that does for women—

Mr. Gregory: We know where you were. You were out stirring them up.

Mrs. Campbell: —you have to be guilty of misleading the people.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Ms. Gigantes: Is that parliamentary?

Mr. Lewis: What are you talking about, stirring people up?

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order. The member for St. George has the floor.

Mrs. Campbell: I am aware of that fact from the letters I have received—

Mr. Philip: At least the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) was there.

Mrs. Campbell: —and fortunately they are not from my riding; I am happy about that—which say, “Under no circumstances shall you vote for Bill 59.” It takes us back to the dark ages. Who has been saying that? With all its faults and shortcomings it does not, with respect, take women back to the dark ages; but who has been telling them that?

Ms. Gigantes: That is a straw woman you are setting up, Margaret; that is a straw woman you are setting up.

Mr. Reid: They are in the dark ages anyway. They can't—

Mrs. Campbell: Now wait a minute; don't you talk like that either.

Mr. Reid: I meant the NDP were in the dark.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, under the amendment which I will be proposing, for the first time in the law we are recognizing the stereotype role of woman in the home as having an economic and financial effect on the marriage. We are recognizing it in economic and financial terms, and that is not done on the basis of this sweeping thing about looping all the assets together. Of course, I wonder what we do if we divide commercial property in half and how we provide for the wife assuming all of half the liabilities of the business—out of what I wouldn't know.

I think that's something you have to think about, because if you truly believe, if those people who truly mouth these things believe in equality, they have to believe that a wife has to assume the liabilities of the assets that she gets in the proportion in which she gets them, but we don't talk about that when we talk about this amendment. We don't talk about the family either, and I think we are talking about a family law reform bill. We are not talking about a woman's reform bill or a man's reform bill, it's a family law bill. So you have to look at the whole aspect of the family and the availability of the assets for the protection of the children as well.

It seems to me that the only way you can deal adequately with a fair division is to give to the judges the right, the opportunity and the guidelines to take into consideration these functions and the responsibilities adopted in the marriage.

As I say, the one place on which I am in absolute agreement with those who have spoken on behalf of the third party is a very real suspicion of women about the way in which the administration of justice functions. They have a right to that suspicion. I would expect, as with other new legislation, that there would be an opportunity for the Attorney General to meet with all of those administering this Act in whatever form it finally comes out to make the thinking abundantly clear.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Carleton East.

Mr. Sterling: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I believe I wasn't given an opportunity to speak prior to the last speaker. I would appreciate a chance this time.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I'm sorry. The member was not in his seat at that time, I believe. I have recognized the member for Carleton East. I will recognize you after this member.

Ms. Gigantes: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lewis: You'll get a chance. For the moment we will have a little enlightenment instead of pre-palaeolithic man.

Ms. Gigantes: It seems I am among the group that is now being called those people who, it is implied by the previous speaker from St. George, have been misleading women around this province about the nature of this law, the changes that it brings to family relationships in Ontario and the way in which 50 per cent of our population—most women in this province get married—acquire a right to property and an interest in property.

I find it hard to accept the kind of implication that when I support an amendment, such as this one, that I am among a group called those people who are misleading women and that I am among the group whom the hon. member for St. George chooses to term Johnny-come-latelies.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Kerrio: That's not right.

Ms. Gigantes: We will leave that aside for the moment. I'd like to go back to the essence of this amendment, particularly for the benefit of those people who are joining us this evening for the first time in this debate. What we are talking about is a redefinition of what constitutes family assets in Bill 59. Family assets are those assets which are assumed to be shared until proven otherwise. Until contested in court, those assets are assumed to be shared on an equal partnership basis between the partners in a marriage.

It is true to say that this section has absolutely no application for a large proportion of the families who live in Ontario because there is a large proportion of Ontario families that have no assets whatsoever.

The principle involved in the definition here is one which is very important because it relates very directly to the essence of this bill or at least to the essence of this bill as it has been presented to us in the preamble. I will repeat it because I think that whenever we speak here in the third party—us people, us Johnny-come-latelies—to the clause in this bill, what we're talking about are those principles which are laid out in the preamble to the bill. It states: "Whereas it is desirable to encourage and strengthen the role of the family in society and whereas for that purpose it is necessary to recognize the equal position of the spouses as individuals within marriage and to recognize marriage as a form of partnership"—and the therefore follows.

It is those principles enunciated in the preamble to which we speak when we say that the family assets section of this bill must be redefined. When we talk about a redefinition, I think it's very important for us to recognize that in subsequent sections, following section 3, family assets are defined as something which can be contested. The equal division of those things called family assets can be contested under this legislation. So it should be; no two cases are ever the same.

What we're talking about is where we start—the beginning of the question of sharing. What assumptions do we make about what financial interests are shared in a marriage? After that we discuss whether they should or should not be divided on a 50-50 basis.

What this amendment attempts to do is to establish a base line where equality is assumed. After that one discusses whether equality on this financial interest or that financial interest should in this particular case be implied.

When we try to persuade other members of this Legislature to redefine where the 50-50 begins, what the assumptions are about the basic 50-50 in section 3, we must not only consider section 3, we must turn to section 4 which says, "Each spouse is entitled to half the family assets divided in equal shares." That is what family assets mean, that's why the definition is important.

Then we go to section 4(2), and let me read from this section, this is what happens after we establish the base line. Section 4(2) says: "The court may make a division of family assets resulting in shares that are not equal where the court is of the opinion that a division of the family assets in equal shares would be inequitable, having regard to: (a) any agreement other than a domestic contract; (b) the duration of the period of cohabitation under the marriage; (c) the duration of the period during which the spouses have lived separate and apart; (d) the date when the property was acquired; (e) the extent to which property was acquired by one spouse by inheritance or by gift; or (f) any other circumstance relating to the acquisition, disposition, preservation, maintenance, improvement or use of property, rendering it inequitable for the division of family assets to be in equal shares."

This is a section which follows immediately upon that section which we are now attempting to amend. We want to amend the definition of family assets in section 3 because that definition is subject to all the qualifications and all the applications that can be made under those qualifications outlined in section 4, which I have just read.

Obviously section 4, which enables a judge to decide that there shall not be in a particular case a 50-50 sharing, having regard to all the items which are contained in section 4(2), allows a wide amount of judicial discretion. Any reasonable judge—even any unreasonable judge—has plenty of room to decide that in a particular case, for any particular reason, family assets shall be inequitably divided.

All this amendment is asking for is that where we start our very definition of what we may vary, and what a judge may vary according to a particular case, the definition be wide enough to make the ultimate disposition of those interests reasonable. We ask only that that definition be wide enough to be reasonable to begin with.

The member for St. George has suggested that what we are doing is throwing in commercial assets; somehow it seems some kind of ultimate indiscretion to the member for St. George that we should be talking about commercial assets. But I put to you that given all the reasons for which a judge can decide that the division of family assets—perhaps including commercial assets, if our amendment carries—can be varied, I can't see why it should be such a horror to the member for St. George. How else are we to begin to talk of a base line of sharing between marriage partners? A base line of sharing of only those financial interests built up—as the amendment suggests—during the period of the marriage or the partnership.

The member for St. George has proposed first one amendment to section 8, and now a second amendment, which I assume she will mean to replace the previous amendment to section 8 and which would be an amendment to section 4. In both amendments what is being proposed is an enablement clause. I would like to give you my understanding of what those amendments might mean.

I have had several looks at those amendments because I have had a personal request from the member for St. George that I look at the amendment again and try to increase my understanding of what it would mean; and I have honestly tried to do that. I have gone back again, with goodwill, to look first at the proposed amendment to section 8 and now the proposed amendment to section 4. What has been suggested in these amendments is that somehow it is good enough to leave family assets as they are narrowly defined in the bill before us and to suggest in one section or another that the judge shall find that a woman or a man, a spouse, has enabled another spouse to acquire financial interests.

The problem with that proposal is this: To say to a judge he should assume that one partner may have enabled another to acquire a financial interest, and therefore may have a claim on those interests, is in a sense to ask the partner, who may have done the enabling for the financial benefit of the other partner, to prove that that enablement did in fact occur. It puts the shoe on one foot as opposed to the other. It requires the supplicant partner in whose name the financial interests are not held to prove to the judge that that partner has enabled the other in whose name the financial interests are held to acquire those financial interests.

I think that puts the onus in the wrong place. I don't think it is adequate.

As I have conscientiously met the request of the member for St. George, to rethink the significance of the amendment that she has put forward, I would ask her to rethink the significance of what we have proposed in this amendment. It is a very simple question of broadening the assumption of sharing, the assumption of those financial interests that are shared between partners. So whatever judgement a judge may make in his discretion on a particular case—about whether there may be an unequal division of those financial interests—that is where the discussion begins. I think it's most important that when the discussion begins, that's where it begins—with everything.

It's been suggested by the member for St. George that the amendments proposed by her, first to section 8 and now to section 4, are amendments which, for example, would mean that one partner had a right, as a matter of right, to share on a 50-50 basis on a pension plan acquired by another. I don't believe that is true. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that if you are talking about enablement, that one partner enables another to acquire a pension plan, and the partner who did the enabling is going to go and have to prove it, I don't think that is where the onus should be. I don't think these amendments meet that as a matter of right, as a matter of first point for discussion.

It certainly would not cover registered retirement savings plans—and that is a very big asset held in partnership in Ontario—to which supplicant partners, upon the break-up of a marriage or a partnership, would have no given assumption of a right to a share. Under existing legislation that partner would have to prove that he or she had enabled the other partner to acquire a registered retirement savings plan before having a right to share in that plan under these amendments proposed by the member for St. George.

I would also like to touch on some comments that have been made by the member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. G. Taylor). The member for Simcoe Centre talked a good deal about the meaning and reality of business partnership and the financial intricacies and obligations involved in business partnership. I won't go into the legalities of what he was talking about, because I expect that my colleague from Riverdale (Mr. Renwick), who has drawn up many partnership agreements during the course of his work as a corporate lawyer in his previous existences, will speak to that point in legal terms. I am no expert on the law, but there has got to be something wrong in a society which says that the business life of our economy is going to be upset if women have some kind of share in it.

Mr. McClellan: That's exactly the point.

Mr. Warner: That's the point.

Mr. Lewis: An amazing view of society.

Ms. Gigantes: It reminds me very much of a recent brief presented by the Ontario chamber of commerce to the Minister of Labour of Ontario. She had asked for comments on the possibility of bringing into legislation in the province of Ontario law which would implement that principle which says that one gets paid equal pay for work of equal value. The response of the chamber of commerce to that concept was to say our economy can't afford it.

Mrs. Campbell: And the Steelworkers.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Chairman, there has got to be something drastically wrong with a society which says that it has an economy which can only chug along if it hugs along on the backs of women, either because they are paid low wage rates or because they have no right to shares in the financial interests built up in business partnerships in this province.

The member for St. George spoke the other night about her vision of a future in which men and women in our society would operate individually and in partnerships in a kind of new world. She spoke of her idea of the new woman who has not been bound by tradition, who perhaps has had greater opportunity than most women in society are permitted, who has gone to university or inherited a bit of money and managed somehow to struggle to that cream level in our society where she is a professional. And she talked with feeling in her voice about how she did not want to see this new woman crippled, at the moment when she had got to the top of the heap, crippled by the need to share those financial interests she had acquired.

Mrs. Campbell: I didn't say that.

Ms. Gigantes: I think I'm correct in quoting the member for St. George when I say this amendment which is before us tonight "would knock women down," because presumably once they had got to the top of the heap, they would be asked to share.

Mrs. Campbell: No, that wasn't it.

Ms. Gigantes: The member for St. George has a dream of a new world, a dream of a new woman; and I guess a dream of a new man in that new world. I appreciate that vision. I appreciate the imagination and the experience and the understanding that drives her to say that she sees this new world. I admire her for that. But I too have this vision. I too dream of a new world in terms of the relationship between men and women operating and living in partnership in our society. My vision differs from the vision of the member for St. George, and I say it regretfully. I would like to be in accord with her in this vision.

My vision of the new world and the new woman in the new world, operating and living in partnership with the new man in the new world that we can dream of and work for, is not to see the new woman take on the same characteristics as the old man. The new woman in the new world that I dream about not only has rights but responsibilities. In my own inadequate way, when I raised my daughter and I tried to teach her about the rights I feel she should have—and I think she's learned some of that—I also want her to know what I consider to be the duties that go with those rights. They're not the old duties in the old marriage vows, "to cherish, honour and obey." But I want her to know also as one human being involved in an intimate, honourable and honest relationship with another that she needs to be committed to sharing.

Here I will go back to the old marriage vows. These are parts of the vows that I really like and that I still see in the new world: "For richer, for poorer, in sickness or in health." Now that's sharing. That part of the old world is what I want to preserve for the new world. I want to see it grow and flourish and I want to see it work 50-50. I don't want to see the new woman take on the characteristics of the old man.

If there's going to be sharing in this new world, then it should be sharing not only in emotional terms or physical terms but also in terms of those things one owns, in worldly terms, that very often determine what one's individual opportunity for independence and growth will be.

This bill gives us a chance to provide basically for women. Women have been the supplicants, women have been the dependants, women have been the people in whose name the financial interests were not held. This bill gives them an opportunity to take a very big step towards the creation of a new world.

What we are discussing in the amendment is the very principle of the bill. What we are proposing with this amendment is a redefinition of where we start the process of sharing. The limitations will follow. The cases are particular, judicial discretion will remain; but when we talk about sharing family assets, let's begin with a concept of family assets which is real. Let us begin talking about family assets as being all those assets acquired during the time of a partnership. Let us make them as broad as possible so that we can begin reasonable discussion of how they shall be shared on a reasonable basis.

This amendment says very simply that family assets mean all property and assets, including commercial assets, acquired during the marriage or in contemplation of the marriage, and the accrued appreciation of all property and assets owned by the spouses prior to the marriage. It does not include any damage award, insurance claim, insurance benefit, gift, inheritance or trust benefit conferred upon a spouse with the express or implied intention of benefiting that spouse exclusively or the accrued appreciation of the same.

I feel it is a very reasonable definition of family assets and that it is vital to the creation of an important step towards the new world spoken of by the member for St. George and the new woman spoken of by the member for St. George that we have such a definition of family assets.

Mr. Sterling: First of all, I would like to comment on the specific amendment proposed by the member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Bounsall). I believe that it not only widens the terms of the number of assets that would be included in family assets but it also lengthens the time for which assets would be included within the definition. I bring to the attention of the hon. member that he has included also assets that would be acquired after a separation of the spouses. I don't know whether he had intended to include those.

When this was going through the committee stage, the member for Windsor-Sandwich and myself appeared on a radio talk show. One of the people on the radio show had separated some period of years before and had acquired assets subsequently. This particular woman therefore felt that she alone should be entitled to those assets which were acquired after the separation.

The definition which is in the bill at this time includes family assets acquired only during the period of time the spouses are residing together. In other words, they would have to use the home, that's a technical part of this amendment.

Ms. Gigantes: Very technical and very wrong.

Mr. Sterling: I don't know—

Mr. Swart: You don't know; that's right.

Mr. Sterling:—whether the member for Windsor-Sandwich meant that or if he was trying to widen it to include assets acquired by a spouse after they separate.

Mr. Swart: You just don't know.

Mr. Sterling: I don't know what his intention was and I was just trying to find out.

[9:00]

Interjection.

Mr. Chairman: Order please; will the hon. member please disregard the interjection.

Mr. Sterling: I have no difficulty myself with the concept of dividing equally down the middle all the assets of the marriage. I don't think that the member for St. George has any difficulty with that concept either. I think we must look to the practical effects of what a deferred community of property regime really means. What it means to me, having had some experience as a practising lawyer, is that it virtually forces every married couple, through a lawyer, to enter into a marriage contract.

In the province of Quebec where they have a deferred property regime, 60 per cent of married couples enter into a marriage contract and contract out of the Act. If for no other reason than that, I could not support the deferred community property concept. Basically we would be defeating the purpose of the Act. The problem is in a lawyer drawing a contract, which is equitable at the time of the marriage, to take into account the circumstances which have arisen since that marriage has taken place. Quite often at the time people are entering into marriage, they cannot foresee what wealth or what lack of wealth the marriage may turn out on the date of separation.

There are serious practical problems with a community of property regime in law in dealing with business assets, as the member for Simcoe Centre pointed out. It is all very nice to say to this Legislature the principle must not stand in the way of the other, but my experience tells me that it is a hornet's nest that just cannot be untangled as easily as that.

Mr. Lewis: You have too much experience. Experience is the destroyer of good legislation.

Mr. Sterling: I don't think, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to enter into a marriage contract with my wife. If we had a deferred community of property regime, I would be forced to.

Mr. Foulds: Don't bare your personal problems in front of the legislature.

Mr. Lewis: Heaven forbid.

Mr. Sterling: The fact is that if I did enter into a marriage contract with my wife, she would probably be done out of much more than I would have been. But at any rate—

Mr. Lewis: That's a nice view of contractual equality.

Mr. Foulds: What a mean little person you are.

An hon. member: You probably have her for a client.

Mr. McClellan: I would ask to change lawyers if I were her.

Mr. Makarchuk: Or husbands.

Mr. Chairman: Order; the member for Carleton-Grenville has the floor.

Mr. Sterling: I see a real practical problem in drawing a marriage contract when you cannot foresee what the real circumstances are when the day comes when they are separated. It is almost impossible. What practically will happen is that people will contract out of all of the rights under the Act—

Mr. Bounsall: That is all right; eyes wide open.

Mr. Warner: The way Darcy did with the Edmonton commitment.

Mr. Sterling:—and in doing that, it is not going to happen as frequently if we stick to the family assets as defined in this Act. In fact you are wiping out discretionary sections later on in the Act; therefore you are not giving the court the right, as in the Murdoch case, to look at the wife's contribution to that farm. So therefore you are defeating, in a great sense—

Mr. Bounsall: They wouldn't have had to.

Mr. Sterling:—what we are trying to remedy in this bill.

Mr. Lewis: Listening to you I begin to believe that Trudeau was right in what he said about property—which I won't repeat.

Mr. Sterling: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I have no problem in the concept, as do the member for St. George and the member for Carleton East.

Mr. Warner: Then support the legislation.

Mr. Sterling:—that things should be divided equally. But the problem is with the mechanics of it.

Mr. Makarchuk: Except I want to hang on to what I have got and more.

Mr. Sterling: Therefore, I cannot support this amendment.

Mr. Warner: That is sad; a fiscal weasel.

Mr. Bolan: Before speaking about the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Carleton East, I would like to make some reference to the Dower Act. This word has been banded about somewhat by, I believe it was the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden).

Mr. Chairman: I would like to suggest to the hon. member that he keep his comments to the amendment before him.

Mr. Bolan: Yes, I will do that.

Mr. Warner: Address the chair.

Mr. Bolan: Mr. Chairman this was also commented upon by the member for St. George. There is reference to the fact that the dower rights of women would be lost by this particular Act.

Perhaps we should examine what will be lost.

Mr. Foulds: By this amendment?

Mr. Bolan: The Dower Act is a very interesting Act. It is a bit ancient.

Mr. Warner: Older than the Attorney General.

Mr. Bolan: I'd just like to read some sections if I may, so that you can see what the women of this province will be losing.

I'd first of all like to read parts of section 1: "A widow, on the death of her husband, may tarry in his chief house for forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned her . . ." Is this what you want to keep? Is this the kind of legislation that you want to keep?

Let's look at another section, a very interesting one, section 8.

Mr. Foulds: Not a bad idea either.

Mr. Bolan: The side note says: "Dower forfeited by elopement with adulterer." And it goes on to say: "Where a wife willingly leaves her husband and goes away and continues with her adulterer . . ." Is this the kind of legislation you want to keep? Surely, that is not the kind of legislation that we are trying to keep.

Mr. Foulds: What are you talking about?

Mr. Bolan: A further explanation of the Dower Act, and to try to explain to some members how it works, it works something like this, Mr. Chairman: The husband has property in his name.

Mr. Swart: What section are we on, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Bolan: The wife does not appear on title to the property. This is the matrimonial home. The husband and the wife separate. What the wife has, through her dower rights, is one-third life interest in that piece of property.

The husband wants to sell the property. He does not require the wife's signature to sell that piece of property if he applies to a court which determines the life interest of that particular woman. That life interest is then paid into the court and the wife can only get the life interest when the husband dies; so in the meantime, she has been done out of the house, the moneys have been paid into court and she can only get them when he dies.

That's the kind of legislation you want to keep on the books in the province of Ontario. This should have disappeared a long time ago. If anything will be accomplished by Bill 59, it's at least to remove this antiquated and ancient piece of legislation from our books.

Mr. Warner: Speak to the amendment.

Mr. Bolan: I wish that the hon. member for Carleton East were present now.

Mr. Warner: She is listening.

Mr. Bolan: I'm very pleased to hear that she is, because she delivered a wonderful speech, a speech that was well thought out; she had lots of feeling in it.

One can appreciate the sense of frustration which has built up in women over the years; but I can only say that the proposed amendment which will be introduced by the member for St. George really reflects the way the court has been dealing with the question of alimony orders and lump sum payments. Because what a court will do today—

Mr. Lewis: That is exactly what is wrong with it.

Mr. Bolan: —in spite of the remarks of the member for Carleton East about this fear that women have for judges and sometimes they are well founded.

Mr. Lewis: If the fears are well founded, why don't you give them the opportunity?

Mr. Bolan: When judges are making an order under the Divorce Act they will consider exactly the types of things which are in the amendment by the member for St. George. They will consider the contribution which the woman has made to the matrimonial home.

They will consider the contribution which she has made by babysitting the children, by looking after the home while the husband is out earning or running the family business. A court considers that today, and the court today constantly makes lump sum awards of money to compensate the wife for some of the many duties and work which she has done over a period of time. And that is justified.

Mr. Swart: As long as the considerations start from a 50-50 split.

Mr. Bolan: Then, on top of that, there is ample money supplied to the wife for the maintenance of herself and of her children.

So, I say that the amendment which will be proposed by the member for St. George fully covers the situation. As for the amendment made by the third party under section 3, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the majority of members of this House really, where would we be in the business world in the province of Ontario if their amendment were accepted?

Mr. Warner: Equality so long as it is not equal.

Mr. Bolan: They know exactly where we would be. Where would the husband go to borrow money to start up a business? He wouldn't be able to get it if it means that five years down the line or 10 years down the line the wife is going to run to the partner and say: "Oh just a minute now, I want a one-half interest in that business."

Mr. Lewis: Oh, boy; am I glad it is in Hansard. More, more.

Mr. Bolan: That's in the kind of legislation they propose.

Mr. Kerrio: That is going all the way. That is the way they want it.

Mr. Bolan: I say with the greatest of respect that kind of legislation is not proper and is not the type of legislation with which this House should be dealing at this time.

Mr. Warner: Sheer nonsense.

Mr. Bolan: I say that the amendments proposed by the member for Carleton East (Ms. Gigantes), or by the third party, to me do not deal with the real problem. What we are trying to do is to deal with it in an equitable fashion. The amendments to be proposed by the member for St. George will fully take into consideration the assets of the family and the position of a wife.

Mr. Foulds: The problem is lawyers like you becoming judges.

Mr. Warner: That's sad.

Mr. McClellan: I always think when a Liberal lawyer is speaking on matters pertaining to the law, he is once again applying to be a judge; that's what it sounded like.

Mr. Bolan: Not provincial court anyway.

Mr. McClellan: I have never heard such twaddle in my whole life as I have heard from the other two parties—

Mr. Lewis: And that dignifies it.

Mr. McClellan: —on the subject of this bill. I have never heard such a plethora of male chauvinist piggery. I have never heard so many blatant sexist arguments as have been pouring forth from the members across and the members to my right.

The issue is whether or not commercial assets shall be excluded from this bill. The arguments that have been put forward by the Conservatives and the Liberals for the exclusion of commercial assets are based solely on sexist arguments. They are arguing from the sheerest chauvinist piggery that commerce is men's business. It is something that ought to be preserved for men. The assumption somehow is that if it is included in the bill—

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Keep that up and you are going to be the fourth party.

Mr. Kerrio: Don't tell us women are not free.

Mr. Bolan: You want to bankrupt commerce and industry.

Mr. Lewis: Since when is commerce the right of the male? What kind of nonsense is that?

Mr. Chairman: Order.

[9:15]

Mr. McClellan: The interjection proves my point. The assumption that commerce is the preserve of the male was uttered again in the heckling interjections. The assumption is that if commercial assets were included in the bill, the economic apocalypse would descend on us. There would be chaos and catastrophe, the roof would fall in. They just said it would; the member from North Bay just said it would, the member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. G. Taylor) said it would; the member for Carleton-Grenville (Mr.

Sterling) implied some kind of economic catastrophe if we ever dared to bring in full equality in the family assets bill. What a lot of bunk, what a lot of rubbish; what a sleazy world view it is—

Mr. Warner: Stop being subtle.

Mr. McClellan: —that the very notion of equality can be associated with economic catastrophe. What kind of people are they, what kind of puny little vision do they have? It really is a lousy debate from the other two.

Mr. Kerrio: You're not adding anything to it.

Mr. Sterling: You're not adding a damn thing to it either.

Mr. Warner: You abandon the women in this province.

Mr. McClellan: I had hopped for some serious discussion of that issue—

Mr. Kerrio: When are you going to start?

Mr. McClellan: —not this kind of economic rubbish, this kind of free enterprise ideology that seems to need sexism to prop it up.

The issue, I think, is relatively simple. Those women who are in need of the protection of our amendment are women who find themselves trapped in the traditional stereotype of today. Women who have managed to emerge from the bonds of traditional stereotyping are not particularly in need of our amendment; it is women who have failed to escape from those bonds who do need the protection of this amendment, because they are the ones who are victimized economically; they are the ones who will not have redress unless the bill is amended according to the amendment before us.

The issue before us is very simple; whether we go with the kind of partial equality that an unamended bill would give us, or whether we go all the way into the modern world, all the way towards full equality with this amendment. Thank you.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of points that I would like to make. I've talked to this amendment before. I would suggest that, as far as the laws of the land go, those of you over there who are concerned always have the option of entering into an agreement; in this way the two partners know from the start what they are going into.

I can't agree that what the previous speaker has suggested was all that meaningful, because I would like to bring into this debate another aspect that hasn't been discussed to any great degree. When we talk about families, certainly we don't talk about just the two spouses; we must, in fact, talk about the siblings, the children of that relationship. I would suggest to those assembled here that we should address ourselves to the responsibility of that particular part of a family relationship. I draw to your attention that if, in fact, there is a breakdown of a relationship, and that we talk in terms of the amendment for a 50-50 arrangement, put forth by the socialists, I would suggest that the family isn't being thought of at all. In my particular circumstances, I would like to think that if there were some kind of a breakdown the children of that original relationship had some rights in the family picture and structure; that when people get a little older and for want of companionship come to a convenience arrangement, we wouldn't lose the complete family structure; that we would be able to pass on to the children some of the worthwhile things that were attained by the original marriage and the children of that marriage. I think those aspects of it, as it applies to the family relationship, certainly move beyond the immediate husband and wife relationship.

I say with respect that many of the laws of the nation are made by people who sit here and relate them to their own circumstances. I don't have to stand here and say that my wife happens to be very pleased about the type of relationship that we have and that we built together for our family. Under the rules as they exist, under the rules we're going to change to make a better relationship maybe it was inadequate before, maybe we're going to be able to carry that responsibility on. I think that's very important in my relationship, and maybe to many more people in this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to respond briefly if I might at this point in respect to the proposed amendment. I suppose it's more in sorrow than in anger, as someone said, that I have to state that I am very distressed by some of the remarks that have been made about this legislation, both inside and outside the House—remarks to the effect that this is going to put women back into the dark ages; remarks such as those made only a few moments ago that this is sexist legislation.

Mr. Foulds: No, a sexist debate.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The truth of the matter is that a number of us in this Legislature, I know, have responsibilities that take us about the province, and women about the province have been consulted in this legislation in a very significant and comprehensive way. As a matter of fact, there are a number of women who have been very involved in the creation of this legislation. I think some of the remarks are just silly and depreciate the efforts of many people who have spent many months in bringing to this Legislature what is, quite frankly, very good legislation.

No one would be presumptuous enough to suggest that any legislation is going to be the last word, but it's a remarkable and very important reform of the family law of this province and a very major step forward.

As I keep hearing this red herring about women being excluded from sharing in commercial assets, I would like to make two or three comments. First of all, women are not excluded from sharing commercial assets. We have debated this in committee, and members who continue to repeat that statement for some reason known best to themselves simply don't seem to want the public to be properly informed about the effects of this legislation.

The truth of the matter, of course, is that a judge in any particular case can attach any asset—commercial, family or otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, I've travelled about this province and, I expect, consulted with far more women's groups than some of the members opposite who are speaking so knowledgeably on this bill. I can tell you, I've spoken to many women who are very active in commerce of one kind and another and who don't want to be placed in the sort of strait-jacket that the member of the third party would seek to accomplish by this amendment.

Mr. Foulds: What strait-jacket?

Mr. McClellan: Equality is his strait-jacket.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: We hear about allegations that the women of this province are not going to be well served by this legislation. That certainly has not been my experience in consulting women of this province and in the thousands of letters, literally, that have come into my ministry over the past two years.

Mr. Foulds: With the legislation not in place, how do you know how they're going to be served?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Maybe it's about time the members opposite listened to the irresponsible fringe on the other side. I think all of us in this Legislature were the recipients of an open letter to the MPPs of Ontario, dated March 6 of this year, from a gentleman in Oakville.

Mr. Lewis: Please, spare us.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: No, I would like to put this quote in Hansard from the irresponsible fringe.

Ms. Gigantes: You're desperate. You're grasping at straws.

Mr. Foulds: What other irresponsible fringe?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: This is one male viewpoint of the legislation, but it has been echoed in a lot of other letters. I think it should be put in Hansard.

Ms. Gigantes: Put it on the record.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: It states as follows: "Look, you males, have you not got the guts to say no to women? It has always been the men who in the end have had to bring the country through war, economic depression—"

Mr. Mackenzie: What are you accomplishing with this?

Ms. Gigantes: Shame on you.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: "—or catastrophic acts of God. Nothing has changed in that respect in your lifetime. Bill 59 ought to have been completely rewritten or thrown out by the standing administration of justice committee."

Mr. Lewis: You suddenly have added the ramblings of a lunatic to your side to make a case. You can do better than that.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Just listen to this.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, I don't expect any courtesy from that direction.

Mr. Mackenzie: With that you don't deserve it.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lewis: Don't use that arsenal.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The letter to all of us goes on: "Were your committee members afraid of McMurtry or did Karen Weiler flutter her eyelashes at you, and you all go limp in fawning agreement?"

Ms. Gigantes: Shame.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: "For God's sake, you men, buck up."

Mr. Lewis: Of whom was that representative?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Sure, that is a very irresponsible letter. But I am just going to say that some of the nonsense I have heard on the other side of the fence is no more ridiculous than this letter.

Mr. Foulds: No more.

Mr. Mackenzie: You have sunk pretty low.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The truth is you are not going to satisfy irresponsible people on either side of the fence who simply choose not to understand this legislation and what it did attempt to accomplish.

Mr. Swart: Deal with the principle.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I really wonder, judging by some of the remarks that I have heard—not so much in this House but by people who should know better in the press—

Mr. Foulds: Let's pay attention to this debate.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: —whether or not some of the commentators on this legislation have even chosen to read it.

As this legislation proceeded through committee I detected a willingness on all sides to create legislation that would serve the best interests of the community.

Ms. Gigantes: As defined by whom?

Mr. Mackenzie: What do you feel so guilty about?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: And I regret, in that context, some of the silly allegations that have been made during this particular debate. It is true our friends in the New Democratic Party would like to provide a very rigid framework—

Mr. Foulds: Nonsense.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: —rather than recognizing the fact that each family has its own special needs and its own special problems.

Mr. Foulds: No one could be more rigid than you.

Ms. Gigantes: Read section 4.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I know that to recognize people as individuals, or families as individual families, is very difficult for a party that seems to be completely sold on a very rigid approach to society as a whole.

Mr. Foulds: That's a pile of crap and you know it.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: What we have attempted to do in this legislation—

Mr. Foulds: That's a complete distortion and fabrication and you know it. The Attorney General should serve this House better than to create distortions like that.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: —is create a framework whereby the individual judge—

Mr. Makarchuk: Read section 4.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry:—in the individual case will have an opportunity to reach a just result.

Mr. Kerrio: I bet you don't have a contract.

Mr. Lewis: Have you read the bill?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The judicial discretion is obviously very wide in this legislation—

Ms. Gigantes: Read section 4.

Mr. Foulds: Is there any amendment to delete section 4?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I know the member for St. George and I don't entirely agree on the role of the judiciary in this province, but I can say that having had some many years of experience in the courts of this province that for every complaint following a matrimonial case from women we have had an equal number, if not a greater number, of complaints by men who believe that they have not been fairly treated.

Mr. Lewis: Where have you been practising law?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The simple truth of the matter is that lawsuits, particularly in family matters, are not very friendly matters.

Mr. Foulds: Lawsuits generally aren't.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: All the efforts that have been poured into this bill were with a view to assisting people to know what their responsibilities are, to know what their rights and obligations are, to be encouraged to resolve their disputes outside the courtroom. Certainly that has been the thrust of all our family law proposals during the past two years.

[9:30]

To suggest that this party or that party is unhappy with the result of a particular lawsuit, in my respectful opinion, should not be interpreted as some inability on the part of the judiciary to arrive at just results in the individual case; it simply is a very difficult matter for any judge in resolving a family dispute to make both sides content. With the legislation as it is framed and with amendments that we are going to consider—and we have heard about the amendment that is going to be proposed by the member for St. George, which I am prepared to accept as a good, well-thought-out amendment—

(Applause.)

Hon. Mr. McMurtry:—the simple truth is that this legislation gives the judiciary—and I am satisfied that the judiciary in this province is totally committed to arriving at just results in the individual case—

Mr. Foulds: Give them just laws to work from. It's our job to give them just laws to work from.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: This legislation provides the judges with guidance, with the tools to provide for more just results than they have been able to accomplish in the past, on some occasions hamstrung by some of the old fault-finding concepts in the common law. As legislators it is up to us, by legislation, to overrule some of the outworn and unfair concepts of the common law.

Mr. Foulds: Only some of the outworn and unfair concepts?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: This is what this legislation is going to accomplish. Members from all three parties in this Legislature have made a significant contribution to the development of this very important legislation. For that reason I should like to think that there could be perhaps a greater degree of pride shared by all members of the Legislature with respect to the legislation, Bill 59, and without so much emphasis on what are considered to be the negative aspects of the bill.

I realize there are areas which reasonable people will disagree on reasonably, but let us not lose sight of the fact that this is good legislation—

Mr. Foulds: Let's make it better.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry—no legislation is perfect legislation—and very major reform legislation and much more, it's fair legislation.

Mr. Foulds: What about the amendments?

Mr. Bounsell: Mr. Chairman, I hadn't intended to enter this debate again, but let me say this is one member in this House who will not feel any pride about the passage of the assets section of this bill. This is where it is flawed. It is flawed seriously and makes no advance in the equality between spouses in this province. Neither myself nor my colleagues in the New Democratic Party will ever feel any pride as long as this type of division remains in this bill. We need that 50-50 split, ensuring that equality takes place, before one can talk about marriage being in any way, shape or form a partnership.

I voted against this bill on second reading on its introduction because of this family assets split and I am tempted to do so again on third reading. That's how strongly I feel about it and I will never take any pride in this section of this bill. The Attorney General has shown his true colours and his true feelings by not just having in hand but deliberately bringing into this House to read into Hansard that piece of garbage which he read. Those are the Attorney General's true feelings and his true colours.

The member for St. George tonight, and the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) on Tuesday afternoon, both accused the mover of this motion and this party of posturing by moving this 50-50 amendment—there is some excuse for the member for St. George, because she was not a member of the committee that sat most recently on this bill—because the further sections of the assets did not make entirely clear several concepts which should be made clear.

Let me make it very clear. Perhaps the member for St. George will think back to the private member's bill debate in which she participated in the spring of 1975, in which this was the basic thrust. I went further in that bill and outlined several of the points which the member for St. George mentioned, one of them being that if it's fair to split property and assets, it's fair to split liability. That was in the private member's bill.

I will confess to the member for St. George that I had the feeling—perhaps not quite true in her case; one would always hope that the member for St. George would join us on this if her other colleagues in that party couldn't—but I had the really strong feeling in my mind, based in their performance in the committee in the month of January, that there would not be any likelihood of their accepting this general concept. This is the reason I did not go to all the trouble of making further amendments to the asset section of the bill and making deletions to make it clear that liability would also be shared.

In addition, I did not go on to make it clear—again for those very same reasons—that the reason that I would leave judicial discretion to the judges would be if it were argued the equalizing payment in one lump sum required to be made in that 50-50 split would endanger the ongoing success of the business or the farm, the judge in his discretion could make that payment take place over some period of years. If you'll recall, my private member's bill had up to three years. The member for St. George spoke to me privately afterwards and said, "Five years," and I was quite prepared to put "up to five years" into that section.

I'm sorry that the member for St. George didn't quite recall that debate. However, there is no excuse—and I wish he were here tonight—for the member for Ottawa East saying we were posturing in terms of this amendment and mentioning other portions which were left out, because he at least was present at the early stages of the committee meetings in January outside this House with respect to the same amendment moved under this section in which the attitude of our party was made clear on both the equalizing payment and when it could be made. We also made clear the concept that liability would also be shared, as provided for in the Manitoba legislation.

This may well be the appropriate time to call to the attention of this House that the province of Nova Scotia has just introduced their family law reform legislation—no doubt the Attorney General has seen it. It follows exactly the recommendations of the Ontario Law Reform Commission with respect to the asset split. It therefore follows exactly the principle and intent of this asset split section I have moved. I must say, as in various other things such as employment standards and minimum wage, this is yet again another example of the province of Nova Scotia being much more progressive than the province of Ontario.

Mr. Mancini: Liberal government in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Bounsaal: Yes.

I might just make two comments on the comments of other members who have spoken. The member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) didn't have the advantage of being a member of the committee, but his remarks dwelt heavily upon the theme. "Why weren't the children included in this amendment?"

I would just point out that that was the whole purpose of the support section of this Act. They are covered fully under and provision is made entirely for them in the support section, a later part of this particular bill. They are not, and will not need to be considered—and the Attorney General would agree with me on this—nor would it be appropriate to consider them, under this asset split section in this part of the Act. It's covered entirely later in this same Act, if the member would take the time to read it.

I might say that I am rather sympathetic to virtually all of the speech except with maybe a remark or two, maybe by the member for Carleton-Grenville. I would say to the House that I think the member for Carleton-Grenville (Mr. Sterling) did a more than adequate job as the acting parliamentary assistant to the Attorney General in the last week of the committee stages of this bill.

Ms. Gigantes: We'd never catch you reading that kind of letter into the record, would we?

Mr. Bounsall: I hope it doesn't prejudice his future when I say he should have a bright future in this House. I, therefore, in that regard thank him for pointing out a way in which perhaps my amendment could have been improved. I thank him for it and say quite seriously to him, would he care to move it I would quite gladly accept this as part of my amendment.

I heard on the speaker outside—I was temporarily absent at that time in his remarks—I heard clearly that he indicated the wording in this section of mine, where it says "family assets means all property and assets including commercial assets acquired during the marriage or in contemplation of the marriage and the accrued appreciation of property owned before marriage," may create a loophole there in that it may mean that after the separation has occurred but before the divorce takes place there may be a period of time in which assets acquired by either during that period may well be required to be shared as well.

I thought that "during the marriage" took care of that, but his suggestion that after "during the marriage" we should add the words "while the spouses are residing together" certainly does close that loophole. I say to him, follow your good intentions, follow your impulses, follow the good feelings of your heart and move that amendment of ours and we will gladly incorporate it.

I know the member for Carleton-Grenville's major argument against this whole concept of ensuring equality of family assets splits is because he fears the expansion across Ontario of marriage contracts. I say to him that I don't fear that. Being a lawyer, he may well fear the costs that might fall to the people of Ontario to have marriage contracts. He would have more experience, of course, in the costs that would befall a couple in the drawing up of a marriage contract than I would, so perhaps my lack of experience in this regard does not lead me to have that same fear which he has.

However, let me tell him this, that within a few weeks of the passage of this bill, if this section is not amended, I will most certainly have in my constituency office in Windsor and in my office here in Toronto a standard marriage contract—which, of course, can have appendices to it to vary it—for use by all married couples, and in my capacity as an MPP I am able to notarize that document. Therefore, at no cost at all to my constituents, I will have a marriage contract which stipulates as a reasonable agreement between couples in a marriage the 50-50 asset split which I feel should be in law across this province, and there certainly will be marriage contracts in the city of Windsor if I have anything to do with it which, in fact, create this split.

Mr. G. Taylor: Don't tell the Law Society.

Mr. Bounsall: We'll deal with the Law Society. Let them do something. I will serve notice now that this is what I am doing.

Mr. G. Taylor: They might deal with you.

Mr. Bounsall: In fact, provide them with standard copies for their offices for free. I won't even charge them for the paper.

Mr. Lewis: If there is a little problem about notarizing we'll solve that.

Mr. Bounsall: There will be no problem with the notarizing.

I still continue to feel exceedingly strongly about this section and I think you, Mr. Chairman, with your great experience in public service and meeting many people coming to see you over the years in your municipal experience, will realize—you can comment if you wish; I might invite you to—that is not a posturing position on the part of myself or my colleagues in this party but a very heartfelt position, that anything else is unfair and unequal; and I will say what my colleagues may not say, or say in the same way—I do not want any discretion, wherever it can be reduced, left to the judiciary in the province of Ontario with respect to asset splits between a husband and a wife in marriage.

I said before, and I will say it again, I would accept it if half of them were women and all of them were children of the fifties, but I won't accept it in the present situation of the judiciary in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak again on this bill, until about 10 or 15 minutes ago when the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) spoke on it—

Mr. Lewis: He stooped to politics.

Mr. Swart: —and then the Attorney General made certain additional comments, and he confirmed that I must say something further on this bill.

Mr. Lewis: Even I'm getting agitated by what the Attorney General did.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Swart: I think I have to say to the member for Windsor-Sandwich that perhaps he misread or did an injustice to the member for Niagara Falls. I suspect the member for Niagara Falls had read the support sections of this bill. That would be right, would it not?

Mr. Kerrio: Yes, but it doesn't guarantee the children are being—

Mr. Swart: I thought he had read the support sections and therefore it confirms my interpretation of what he really said. What he really said—and I think the member for St. George (Mrs. Campbell) had inferred this—was that the children are not really looked after in this section of the bill, because if you divide the assets up equally then there won't be enough left to the man to be able to support the children, and I suggest—

Ms. Gigantes: The eldest son.

Mr. Swart:—that here is male chauvinism almost to the extreme when you—

Mrs. Campbell: On a point of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: There is a point of privilege to be raised. The member for St. George.

Mrs. Campbell: When I discussed the matter of children, I did not refer to enough assets left to the man. It was not the inference and I certainly ask that if I am to be quoted, I be quoted accurately. Thank you.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Welland-Thorold may continue.

Mr. Lewis: That is a presumptuous request of this House—to be quoted accurately.

Mr. Swart: I think there can be different interpretations put on that and of course the member for Niagara Falls did confirm using his interpretation of that.

Mr. Ruston: Take care of the front row.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Swart: It is my view that the female spouse is just as able and exercises just as much responsibility in the financial care of the children as does the male spouse and sometimes more.

Mr. Kerrio: Have you got a marriage contract, Mel?

Mr. Swart: And a real bearing on this issue is that if we divide the assets equally, the bill specifically provides under section 16 that every parent has an obligation, to the extent that the parent is capable, to provide education and support in accordance with need for his or her child who is unmarried and under the age of 18 years. I just say to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Attorney General, that the children will be as well looked after if there is an equal division of assets as if the male partner gets a lot more.

Mr. Kerrio: Well, there's no dispute about that, Mel.

Mr. Swart: The second point I want to raise is something I recall being raised in the committee—and I'm sure our Attorney General wasn't there at that time. We were discussing the preamble to the bill and discussing some of the other sections in principle—and that's what we were talking about in this amendment: the principle of the division of the assets on an equal basis between spouses. And as stressed over and over by my colleagues here, it can be varied in almost any way by the judge; but we're discussing a principle.

I remember the member for Ottawa West (Mr. Baetz), who now is the Minister of Energy saying that the preamble is important because a judge will always refer back to that to get the principle of the bill. That was agreed to. I think our colleagues on the right, any of them in the committee meetings—and too many of them weren't there too much of the time—would agree that the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) also agreed with the importance of the preamble, the importance of principle.

Mr. Bounsall: That was the only time he was right.

Mr. Swart: I say that this amendment is important, therefore, because it establishes the principle of equal division.

The third point I want to make—and I guess I'll say it very bluntly to the Attorney General after his comment—is that I can understand now how the province of Ontario lost the court case relative to putting its employees under the AIB.

Mr. Kerrio: Oh, that's not fair.

Mr. Swart: I think it's fair. A few moments ago—and I would be glad to have the Attorney General's attention—he stated twice that our amendment would put the division of assets more in a strait-jacket. He used the word twice. It would make it more rigid, put it more in a strait-jacket, he said.

I don't know how the Attorney General, as a lawyer, can make a statement like that. All the qualifications and all the variations from that are in sections 4 to 13. We're not proposing to change those sections. The bill has a rigid section 3 now which includes a limited amount of assets. We will have a rigid section 3 which will say the assets should be divided on a 50-50 basis, but all the qualifications of changing that in any way still remain in the bill. There's no more of a strait-jacket in our amendment than there is in the bill at this time. It simply establishes the principle of a 50-50 split.

One other thing that hasn't been said during this debate, to the best of my knowledge—and I think it should be said—is that section 3 as it exists is going to create, by the very nature of it, tremendous inequalities.

Our amendment says there shall be in principle a 50-50 split between the spouses. In some cases, under section 3 as it exists, there will be a 50-50 split because that's all the assets they will have. In other cases, where they may not have a matrimonial home—40 or 50 per cent of our people now live in apartments, and they have all kinds of other assets—the split may be 10-90. This section as it exists provides no basis in equality at all; it is our amendment which provides that equality.

Even if the government doesn't want to give as much to the female spouse, even if it only said it should be divided on one-third, that would be more equitable than the present section, because in some instances it's going to mean that one spouse—usually the wife—will be entitled to nothing or very little.

After listening to the Attorney General and after listening to members on my right, who will not even deal with the issue of the 50-50 split—they say they agree with it in principle but they turn right around and say they can't vote for it; all it is, is a statement in principle—I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the posturing here is being done by those people over there and those on my right.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I am rather concerned that the rhetoric of the debate has escalated since the intervention by the Attorney General. Perhaps we're engaged in driving each other further apart than is necessary. I think it's quite possible for reasonable people to reasonably agree as well. I think the point that has been made about this particular amendment is one on which I would like to have a few minutes to try to see whether or not I could persuade the Attorney General that it is essential that the amendment be accepted. In order to persuade the Attorney General I must obviously persuade the member for St. George. My remarks really are addressed to her and I trust that wherever she may be, she can hear the sound of my voice, because—

Mr. Eakins: You're coming through fine.

Mr. Mancini: I am sure she can. Clear as day.

Mr. Renwick: —the Attorney General and the member for St. George have agreed upon a subsequent amendment to section 4, I take it from what the Attorney General has said. I do want to therefore for all practical purposes address myself to the place in the assembly where the power on this matter resides. That's the member for St. George.

Mrs. Campbell: Thank you.

Mr. Renwick: If I can persuade her to take that small step to recognize that there is no inherent flaw in the amendment by the member for Windsor-Sandwich, that the amendment is quite consistent with the purposes that the member for St. George for many years has espoused. Whatever this insurmountable block which prevents the member for St. George from coming that small step closer to us, I would like to search it out and I would like to see if we cannot dissolve it during the course of this debate.

Incidentally, I would also like to persuade the member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. G. Taylor) and the member for Carleton-Grenville (Mr. Sterling)—I have some chance with them; I have little, if any, with the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) who unfortunately is not here tonight. I gather that for practical purposes the member for Nipissing (Mr. Bolan) falls in the same general category and I do sympathize with the member for St. George. She has this terrible burden of being surrounded by men in that caucus who have been upset from the day the family law bill was first introduced into the assembly.

Mr. Lewis: That's right.

Mr. Renwick: I think it's fair to say that the member for Ottawa East thinks it was the work of the devil and he doesn't want it. He doesn't want to have anything to do with it. He becomes extremely irritated if anybody—all he wants to do now is to get it passed and get it over with.

I can understand that feeling. I fortunately come back to the task somewhat refreshed. I had a relief from the family law bill for a short period of time. That was one of the few minor blessings of being away at my own home for the 100 days, so I didn't have to go through the anguish of the debate.

I say to the Attorney General the reason why I want to try his patience—and I particularly want to persuade the member for St. George about the merit of this—is that I happen to believe that when this bill is passed, we can't monkey with it. We can't tinker with it. We can't start bringing in amendments the way we do to the Municipal Act every session in order to clear up some abstruse point. It has to be laid to rest along with the other group of family law statutes and let the jurisprudence take its course.

It's for that reason that I think we are quite justified in trying, again and again, to see if we could perhaps dissolve the small hurdle that permits the member for St. George to say that she really agrees with it but she can't agree with it, and permits the member for Carleton-Grenville to say he really wants to agree with it but he can't. I have listened as attentively as I can to the discussion to see whether or not it is possible in some way or other to dissolve that kind of problem and I want to speak very, very simply, if I may, to the member for St. George with whom I have always been able to find a basis of agreement.

I think the member for St. George would agree with me 100 per cent that in our society at the present time a support obligation is not the equivalent of the ownership of property; that if you want security in our society, the way to have security is to have property, not to have somebody's obligation to pay support. Therefore to the extent that we can shift from the support obligations to property interests for the spouses who have terminated their relationship, then we have strengthened the independence of each one of them and not made them dependent upon the other. To the extent that one can do that, one has achieved a remarkable step forward in the relationships between people because secure people and people who know that they are going to be secure, even if they have the misfortune to come to the termination of their relationship, are much more likely to be able to deal with each other in a very civilized manner. There won't be the necessity for the application to the court and the long drawn-out discussions.

I say very carefully and clearly to the member for St. George, and through her to the Attorney General, that sharing as I do the sense that the judges in the province of Ontario are dedicated to doing the very best they can in interpreting what we in this Legislature pass, we have created—and it has nothing to do with the amendment made by my colleague, the member for Windsor-Sandwich—a labyrinth through which the judges are going to have to plod their way in order to try to arrive at what this assembly was saying. What was it saying? What was it saying in a clear way so that the courts will understand it? That labyrinth, in my view, puts the historic maze on the island of Crete to shame.

It is an impossible task that you are asking the judges to do, namely, to read the basic section which we are now dealing with and then try to apply all of the factors which are set out in subsequent clauses and proceedings in the bill. Regardless of the amendments of my colleagues, the labyrinth is an extremely difficult one. My friend, the member for St. George, will understand that part of it better than anybody else because she sat in that court. She has had some experience with the existing law and she knows what the problems are.

I think it is essential that we do what we can to clearly indicate and signal in a way which is unmistakably clear what the intention of this assembly was. The moment we start fooling around with the definition of family assets which is presently in the bill and which my colleague is trying to amend, we immediately create very shaky ground. The very words which the bill uses calls upon a judge to engage in the minutiae of determining the pieces of tangible property scattered around the family home and scattered around the family cottage or out in the trailer or in some other camperette or item which is used, and create a problem which I don't think we should be asking judges to start right in to have to make that kind of decision.

I think you would agree with me when I say that the language which is: "the property owned by one spouse or both spouses and ordinarily used or enjoyed by both spouses or one or more of their children while the spouses are residing together for shelter or transportation, for household, educational, recreational, social or aesthetic purposes," et cetera, means that for practical purposes you are asking the judges to do what Ward-Price do, to make an inventory. Are these things for the social, recreational or aesthetic use of the members of the family? It is very easy for somebody whom you can call in to inventory the contents of a house or summer cottage. But that's not what we are asking judges to do. We are asking judges to do equity and justice between two people in a situation which is extremely difficult.

It is extremely important, and I go back to my fundamental point, that the independence of people in our society is based upon their property. That's where you get your independence. What we should be saying to the courts is what the preamble says. So far as the property acquired by people during their marriage while they are residing together—and I thank the member for Carleton-Grenville for raising the question of the minor amendment which should be made to the bill in order to preclude the point of draughtsmanship which was overlooked in it and which I have discussed with my colleague the member for Windsor-Sandwich and which can be cleared up—it seems to me we've got to be able to say to the courts that our intention was that the starting point should be all property acquired during marriage. That would be subject to the exception of language about gifts, inheritances, trust benefits and all of that, but that is not difficult for judges to deal with, because they are used to dealing with that kind of language and those kinds of legal concepts. We're saying to them: "That's the place where you start from, and you take everything in. You take everything in and you say to the people that are involved, 'All right, that's the way you start.'"

I want to emphasize the point that has been made and perhaps has been overlooked, and certainly appeared to have been overlooked by the Attorney General in his comments; that is, we are not proposing any amendments to section 4. We are not altering it, as I understand it, in any way—

Mrs. Campbell: Yes, you have.

Mr. Renwick:—except for the one point, which is an entirely different issue and which is included in an amendment to be proposed by my colleague the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden).

Mr. Nixon: Two parts.

Mr. Renwick: We say that the discretions in the court are all still left there, but what we have tried to say is: Let's give the judges a judicial start—not a household inventorying start—in order to solve this problem. Let's give them a place where they can clearly start. If they feel there are valid arguments made before them under which some of the discretions and balancing and judgemental factors should be taken in under section 4, fine; we can do that, there's no problem.

I think it is important that we signal to the judges called upon to look at this Act that we have clearly understood what we want to accomplish. I can see that with our amendment accepted as the signal, and in a difficult situation, the very conclusions that could be come to by a court would be acceptable to the member for Carleton-Grenville, as I think they would be to the member for Nipissing. I don't see that the starting point is other than for the sake of clarity and for the sake of principle. Then you let all of the discretions which the judges can balance work from that point.

I draw your attention to what was said by the former Chief Justice of Ontario, who is now Mr. Justice Estey, sitting on the Supreme Court of Canada. When he was Chief Justice of Ontario, if I recall correctly, he drew the attention of this assembly to the immense problem that we are creating for judges by not being clear about what we're saying, by leaving them to make the interpretations about what we supposedly intended to do because we haven't got clear, unmistakably principled legislation from which they can, as a starting point, begin to make the decisions as to what we intended and, in cases such as this, begin to deal, as we say in the Workmen's Compensation Act, on the justice and merit of the cases and not on intricate rules about which piece of furniture falls on which side of the line so far as family assets are concerned.

That is my main and principal point and that's why I say to my friend the member for St. George to see, in the course of the time which is available—and the importance of it would mean that if I'm finished before 10:30 and nobody else wishes to speak on it, I'm quite certain that we could get agreement to stand it down until tomorrow morning—whether we cannot bridge this very narrow gap.

I think what was bothering me—and I say with the greatest respect that my colleague the member for Bellwoods (Mr. McClellan) threw the lighted faggot into the fire—was that from that point on I think everybody was about to give up and beginning to be driven by a rhetoric into opposing positions. The Attorney General was carving out for himself on the extreme right and on the extreme left, he was carving out for himself the middle road.

Mr. Reid: The extreme middle. The radical middle.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The radical centre.

Mr. Renwick: Yes, the radical middle, right down the centre. He was trying to say that people were decrying his legislation and casting aspersions upon the bill, and being rather unclear as to just who was doing it, but somebody called "they" was engaged in destroying this remarkable piece of legislation which has come before the assembly.

Mr. Reid: They are always very handy to have around.

Mr. Lewis: The faces in the crowd.

Mr. Renwick: Speaking again to my friend, the member for St. George, the point of departure of the member for St. George which appeared to raise this unsurmountable block was the words "commercial property." It was almost as if she was saying—and I know it isn't so—"If you take those words out I'll go along with it." I know it wasn't and I quite understand that, but the red flag on which the argument was hung was this question of commercial property. I think that triggered off the member for Simcoe Centre and led the member for Carleton-Grenville to get in. They all got terribly upset about this business of one of the spouses being involved in commercial property which they had no business to become involved in. It would almost be like Mrs. McKeough daring to enter into the plumbing business in Chatham.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Never, never.

Mr. Renwick: Never. No. You couldn't possibly do that.

Mr. Reid: She may need a job after the next election.

Mr. Lewis: It is enough that she has disavowed the budget, never mind the plumbing.

Mr. Renwick: I sometimes think she would make a better Treasurer.

Mr. Lewis: Believe me.

Mr. Renwick: I want to talk a little bit about commercial property and commercial interests, because there are very few people in the province of Ontario who have that kind of problem. Sure, there are a lot of law partnerships and a lot of medical practice partnerships of one kind or another. There are all sorts of family companies of one kind or another. There are all sorts of partnerships disguised as corporations and so on.

We all must understand—and it has nothing to do with the amendment proposed by my colleague the member for Windsor-Sandwich about the entrance into the province of Ontario of this domestic contract—there are going to be a lot of those domestic contracts regardless of whether we change one word in the existing provision of the bill, because we introduced that into the bill, and there are going to be domestic contracts entered into by all partners in marriage relationships where there are any substantial property interests, “shares in private companies,” “interests in partnerships” whatever they are.

That will exist to a greater extent because of the introduction of this legislation, but we have accepted that as a necessary corollary to trying to even out the relationship that yes, you have to permit people to contract out. There may be people who don't think that the contracting out provisions should be quite as wide, but they are extremely wide. As I read the bill, they can contract out on everything except the matrimonial home should they choose to do so.

Therefore, it seems to me that all proper people—it is a significant number of people, but it is not a large number in the province of Ontario who have that kind of problem—will in any event, if they haven't already done it, go to a lawyer in order to have agreements drawn about it.

My friend, the member for St. George, has as much knowledge about commercial practice matters as I do, and you know as well as I do that every time a partnership is entered into there is always provision about what to do for the widow of the deceased partner. There is always that provision, always an arrangement made by which, regardless of the fact that the widow is not a member of the profession which might be involved, such as a law partnership, the partnership is drawn in such a way that the partners try to say: “We are going to find a way, without dissolving this partnership, of paying to the spouse of the deceased partner X number of dollars.” Whether they do it by buying reciprocal life insurance on each other's lives in order to have the funds actually available within the partnership in order to make the payments, those are very common, dime-a-dozen arrangements.

You know as well as I do that it is for tax or other convenient reasons if, instead of a partnership arrangement they incorporate a private company and two partners own 50 per cent of the shares or four partners own 25 per cent of the shares. Just a normal, everyday concomitant of that kind of legal transaction means that you also enter into—if I could use the jargon of the trade—a buy/sell agreement with respect of the share interests of the four persons, so that the same problems—that is the death of one of the persons or a desire on the part of one of the persons to get out—can be covered.

There are any number of variations on that theme. There are so many variations that in some partnerships you come to the other way where they want to create the fiction that the widow of the deceased partner is in fact a partner for all purposes except having anything to say about the business. Because it may be for tax reasons that that's a wise arrangement of the affairs. They bring the widow in as a partner and carefully exclude her from having anything to do with the business which is being run. It seems to fool the tax department and make everybody happy.

So there are those kinds of arrangements today—nothing to do with this legislation, nothing whatsoever to do with it. There are all sorts of agreements that are entered into in which the spouse, usually the wife of the participant in that commercial venture, is something called a silent partner, a silent person who has an interest. She may not sign any documents but her interest has been recognized because of the commercial pressures of exactly what has to happen in any event. They've got to find the money in the continuing organization to pay the interest of the deceased partner or the deceased shareholder, whoever he may be. They've got to do all those things. Whether it's for love of each other or whether it's normal business practice they've got to settle those matters.

So I'm saying that there are lots of agreements now designed to protect the deceased spouse, usually the widow in our kind of a world, and those will continue to exist. I am inclined to agree that for other reasons there are going to be more of these so-called domestic contracts.

So I don't think that there is any particular magic in trying as I am to dissolve this barrier that prevents the member for St. George and myself reaching agreement on this matter. I don't really think there is a very great deal of validity in the hysterical response made in an escalating sense by the member for Simcoe Centre and the member for Carleton-Grenville that everything was going to fall apart—that the whole fabric of the commercial society and Bay Street was going to suddenly collapse and just disintegrate as the Canadian dollar is disintegrating now on the foreign exchange markets of the world.

So I say that that kind of situation can be dealt with and dealt with quite adequately, simply because it has had to be dealt with in any event in most commercial transactions of any significance in commercial ventures which are undertaken.

Secondly, they will be able to be dealt with much more clearly by contracting out under the domestic contracts provision in any event, and there are going to be more of those. So you say to me why shouldn't we start with an omnibus provision bringing everything in and recognizing what the preamble to the Act says; that it is in fact a partnership and the property aspect of it which has bedevilled the marriage institution for so long. Let's try to make it right once and for all.

Then I think you get the kind of situation into which the great bulk of the families in the province of Ontario fall—they don't have any commercial properties in the sense that is intended to be meant by the amendment proposed by my colleague. But they do have things far over and above the so-called narrow definition of family assets. It's all of those matters which should be brought together and brought into play.

In my riding, for example, my guess is that most situations are ones where they will not be consulting lawyers and, even if they could afford it, they won't be terribly interested in entering into domestic contracts. All they would like to have, I think, is a law which permitted them to say: "What we in our marriage put together is to be divided in half." If that's fine and that's the way it works out at the termination of the marriage, well and good. It's very simple and very straightforward and there is no need for anybody to go and make an application to the court. If there's a dispute about it, then section 4 is still available.

It does seem to me that we are likely to remove the burden from the courts of a large number of cases, if we go the principal route of having a clear signal to the courts that that's the starting point because there's no point in going to a court if the total mass of assets which are to be divided are clearly defined and you get half. You can then only go to the court because you're asking for more than half, or someone is objecting that the person should not get half.

I think in a funny way that creates a barrier to misusing the courts because you start right out at that 50-50 point. You're not into a mad scramble about whether or not you can get more under section 4. There's a kind of a clear starting point. Because there's such a clear starting point I think we will probably relieve the burden on the courts. I think because of the real cases where the equitable provisions of section 4 and other provisions come into play, you're likely to get jurisprudence of much higher quality and much more important jurisprudence about exactly what these divisions of family properties can or should mean.

I would ask my friend, the member for St. George, to respond either tonight or tomorrow to what I've said, to reflect upon it and to think upon it because, as I said at the beginning, never have I in the time I've been in the House seen so much power reside in one place in this assembly. If she comes, I assume her colleagues will come, and if she and her colleagues come, the Attorney General, who has suffered one defeat at her hands and won't want to suffer another one, will also come along. We will then have an opportunity to have a bill of which we can all be proud and one in which we have resolved this vexed problem. This has bedevilled the discussion of this bill from day one because of the failure to accept the Law Reform Commission's recommendation which led to the kind of amendments proposed by my colleague. For reasons which I have never understood, the Attorney General and his drafting advisers chose to introduce this ridiculously limited definition of family assets.

From any number of points of view, which I hope I've been reasonably clear about, I can say to the member for St. George, please see if we can't dissolve what to me appears to be a tough but minor obstacle and, finally, in a reasonable way, reach a reasonable agreement on a matter of such fundamental importance. Then I know that the Attorney General will fall into place and we will have a bill on which the whole of this assembly can complete the long and arduous work on which all parties have worked for so long.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore.

Hon. W. Newman: There is the evening shot.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, in the very brief time that we have before we adjourn this evening, I wish to tell you in very personal and intimate terms that I've changed my mind. Throughout the evening I was not in the House but I was listening to every word of the debate and have done so. I am now convinced by my colleagues that their position is quite right. If that should add any strength to the member for St. George, so be it, because I think she knew my basic disposition with respect to this bill from its inception.

My basic position with respect to all legislation, just let me say, is that legislation can be approached from two directions. Either it can be approached wholly—you want a complete and global acceptance of a particular proposition—or you take the half loaf or quarter, whatever people want to talk about; you take what you can get. The government proposes—they used to dispose, too, like Almighty God but up to a point these days we do a little disposing too; and with that in mind, over many years here, I think of it as part of the responsibility of a member of the Legislature to amend, twist and turn; you try to improve what you've got and you save the rest for the glorious day when you may be able to bring it into being.

This particular piece of legislation is quite unique. It is not the common run of the mill stuff and probably has a kind of permanency and, certainly, in terms of human destinies and human lives it has a far more searching and reaching effect than the ordinary piece of legislation that comes before us. The Law Reform Commission of Ontario has proposed a virtual community property concept albeit deferred and while I disagree with my colleague as to the particular mathematics involved in that, the weird business of the balancing claims and equalization claims wouldn't be very much disposed to accept that methodology or particular disposition of the matter. It's all right if you happen to be an engineer and live your whole life with stresses, measuring the peculiar dimensions of bridges, but in human affairs it is not.

But I have argued with him enough. I concede many things to him tonight, many more than I have ever dreamed of doing, and I do it with a certain amount of grace. The only thing I see arising out of this that causes me pause, and has caused me substantial pause is the pragmatic difficulties. We can be frank about it. The proposals made by my colleagues, and with which I now agree, are a fairly searching revamping of the basic principle of the bill.

Mr. Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member could take a glance at the clock.

Mr. Lawlor: All right, I'll tell you about the basic principle tomorrow.

On motion by Hon. Mr. McMurtry, the committee of the whole reported progress.

On motion by Hon. B. Stephenson, the House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, MARCH 10, 1978

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers.

OPP ROLE IN STRIKE

Mr. Deans: I rise on a point of order relating to yesterday's business, if I may, Mr. Speaker. I want to put before you what I consider to be facts with regard to a statement made yesterday. You will recall during the question period I raised with the Solicitor General (Mr. Kerr) a statement which was reported in the press and which was attributed to him. I asked the Solicitor General the following question: "And, further, let me ask you a supplementary question so you can answer both while you are on your feet. Is it true that you said that it was justified because a lot of the employees really didn't want the union anyway?"

The Solicitor General responded as follows: "Mr. Speaker, I should have probably on a point of privilege while answering the hon. member's question. I didn't say that which was attributed to me in this morning's Globe—the words, 'he added that only half the workers of the plant want the union.' What I said to the reporters was that there was a division of opinion there, that there were some exception by a number of employees whether or not they wanted that strike. That's what I said."

As an aside, sir, you'll appreciate that the English in it is not particularly easy to understand, but that the intent is easy to understand.

I want to draw to your attention, and to the minister's attention, the fact that there is a tape recording of the conversation that he had and which was reported in the Globe and Mail and by other media. I have here a direct, unedited transcript of what that tape says, and the tape is available for either you or the minister to hear; for the minister to hear and for you to hear. I quote:

"This is a plant that the union is attempting to organize, and apparently there is a split in the feeling of the employees. About half of them are not interested in joining the union, and about half want to join the union."

Mr. Lewis: Unbelievable.

Mr. Deans: That is, to the best of my knowledge, a complete and accurate quote taken directly from the tape which was used for the purpose of the story which appeared in the Globe and Mail.

It is entirely possible that the minister may not remember exactly what he said; therefore, when he answered the question yesterday perhaps he answered it in all honesty; and I am prepared to accept that. It is entirely possible that the tape recording machine picked up something the minister didn't say—although it is very difficult to understand that this might have happened.

But if you would be kind enough, in the interest of making sure that information given to this House is accurate information and is truly reflective of what is being said in incidents and situations as sensitive as the one we are currently dealing with, I would ask either you and the minister, the minister alone or you alone, to listen to the tape and hear for yourself what was said and then deal directly with the answer which was given and which was in direct contradiction, as I understand it, to the facts of the case.

On the same point of order, dealing with the same question, I want to bring to your attention the minister's statement on page 1510-3 of the draft transcript for March 9, 1978, in which the minister says—he is speaking to me:

"Dealing with the second question, which I feel is much more relevant, I think the hon. member should realize that some days before the strike took place that a representative of the union attended at the police detachment headquarters . . . and asked certain questions regarding picket lines and the conduct of the employees and questions of that nature, very valid questions."

The member for Carleton East (Ms. Gigantes) said: "Very responsible."

The minister went on to say: "Those same questions were also wanted to be known by management, and as a result of this the sergeant of the detachment decided that everybody should know what the situation would be . . . what their rights would be and what their obligations would be in a situation of that kind."

It is reported to us, sir—and I want to ask you to ask the minister with regard to this—that in fact Mr. Grant Turner, the vice-president of the company, on that same Friday called the workers together while their representatives were bargaining in London. He said to them that he had decided to put an end to rumours about the difficulties which may be encountered and that he had called and asked that the OPP attend at the plant—

Mr. Lewis: That's right.

Mr. Deans:—and that he had requested that the lecture which was subsequently given, should be given to the employees.

I raise this matter with you because the information which is being given to this House, perhaps inadvertently, is very inaccurate and misleading and does not reflect in any way the situation as it was or as it is at that plant with regard to the OPP's involvement.

Mr. Speaker: The Solicitor General has not had the opportunity to hear the alleged point of order raised by the member for Wentworth, and I don't know whether he is in a position to respond at this time. If the Solicitor General would like to reflect upon it over the weekend and perhaps give his version of what happened on Monday, perhaps that would be appropriate and agreeable to all members of the House.

Mr. Renwick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: Would you just clarify for me what you meant when you said "alleged point of order"?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that anything that has transpired here, either this morning or on Thursday, constitutes a point of order; that being something in this House that can be construed or seen as a point of order. There is obviously a difference of opinion as to what was said or what was quoted. That is probably more appropriately a point of privilege. Unless I hear both sides, I am not in a position to say whether it's a valid point of order. That's what I meant.

WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Mr. Peterson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. On February 23 I tabled a question on the order paper, question No. 10; an interim answer was tabled yesterday, March 9, 1978. That interim answer said that there was no answer, that they want more time. I would like your advice on the rules applying to this situation. How much time do they have? Under what obligation is the ministry—in this case the Chairman of Management Board (Mr. Auld)—to provide a response to this question? Is this type of response not in defiance of the rules of this House?

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, the standing orders indicate that there are up to two weeks for a reply to something that is on the order paper.

Mr. Peterson: The minister was given two weeks, and the only response—given yesterday—after two weeks was that there was no answer and that he needed more time. I would like to know the rules of this House pertaining to how much time he has got. Can he go on doing this indefinitely? Does he have another two weeks? What is the status?

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding that an answer should be forthcoming within the time specified in the standing orders, and if it is impossible to do so I think the House—and in particular the member—is entitled to some kind of explanation as to why it is taking longer than that.

Mr. Peterson: I'm sorry to pursue this, but what, then, are my rights as a member, not having that answer after two weeks? How much longer should I be expected to wait in the circumstances?

Mr. Speaker: If there is some reason why the minister in his own judgement should decline to answer, he need only say that; but if he needs more time, if it is a very detailed answer that requires a lot of research, perhaps the hon. minister responsible could indicate why it is necessary to take in excess of the time allocated. He does have the right to decline to answer if he chooses to do so; but I don't think that is the case in this instance.

PAPER MILL CONTROL ORDERS

Hon. Mr. McCague: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Last Tuesday, March 7, I gave an answer in the House to the member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt) regarding the status of the ministry's order on the pulp and paper mills of Domtar of Red Lake and Great Lakes Paper Company of Thunder Bay. An error has appeared in Hansard regarding the date by which time two minor lateral connections are to be completed at the Domtar Plant. The company is being required to complete these two connections not later than June 15, 1978, not January 15, 1978 as was recorded in Hansard.

STUDENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, following my supplementary question yesterday to the Minister of Colleges and Universities, it was suggested that because I had the information only in the morning I didn't know what I was talking about. I would draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that I had indicated that last year the parental contribution table kicked in at $7,300. This year it kicks in at $6,601, and therefore that was reduced. I have those figures in front of me to corroborate what I am saying. I had also calculated that that meant that a family with a net weekly income of $127 was expected to make a contribution. I'll change that; it actually works out to $126.94. There are the figures.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: The member has missed one significant point in that observation. Last year that would have required the student, part of that family, to make a contribution of $1,000. It was called a loan. Nevertheless the student, a member of the family, was obligated to take a $1,000 loan first, and I think that would logically be considered as a contribution from the family unit.

Mr. Sweeney: That's not what we're talking about.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: It's a deferred payment, but that was required first last year. This year, agreed, the family contribution in that area is lower, the grant kicks in at the beginning, at the very start. Therefore if one views the family, parents and child together, the contribution from that family in that instance is less. I think one has to look at it that way.

Secondly, if one looks at Canada student loans this year and our Ontario student loans this year and compares those, they are indeed at a higher rate. They kick in—and I don't have those figures in front of me this morning—I think it's $7,600; therefore they are higher this year than they were last. If the hon. member puts those two things together, he will find that the table and the contribution are fairer.

Mr. Speaker: I think we can get into this either in question period or during the estimates.

Mr. Sweeney: You're comparing apples and oranges.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: They're all part of the same thing. They come from this place, your and my pocketbook.

Mr. Kerrio: I think the tables are turned. I don't think the minister knows what he is talking about.

Mr. Lewis: We have lots more points of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Warner: Point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

SOFT DRINK CONTAINERS

Hon. Mr. McCague: Since my appointment as Minister of the Environment, I have been reviewing the government's policy with respect to the control of carbonated soft drink containers. As part of this review, I have held meetings with representatives of all segments of the soft drink industry with the result that the regulations affecting this industry have been carefully scrutinized in the light of current conditions.

During the past two years, the government has announced a comprehensive program designed to restore the general availability and use of refillable, money-back containers in the soft drink market. The refillable, money-back bottle is acknowledged as the most environmentally acceptable container for soft drinks. For many people concerned about waste and the overuse of throw-away packaging in our society, it stands as a symbol for the whole issue of good waste management.

The government has met many of its objectives in protecting and restoring the refillable bottle and in reducing the waste inherent in the alternative, non-refillable container. As compared with the situation two years ago, we have made this progress:

The consumer can now be confident that the soft drink of his choice is readily available in the container of his choice in most stores which he patronizes. The consumer can now be assured of a full cash refund on every refillable bottle returned to the store where he bought it and in stores which sell the same brands and sizes. The consumer can also make a direct, simple comparison between the cost of a soft drink in a throw-away container and the cost of the same drink and deposit on its refillable bottle. This compulsory price display indicates the economic advantage to the consumer of the refillable bottle.

A major result of this program to date has been a significant increase in the popularity and use of the refillable bottle. It earned an estimated 60 per cent share of the market during the last months of 1977, as compared to about 35 per cent during the same period in 1975.

Members will recall that these measures which we considered essential to a comprehensive program have not yet been undertaken: The proposed five-cent tax on cans was introduced to the Legislature last year. It was not pursued further because both opposition parties made it clear they would not support this measure. Not only would they not support the government's proposal, they could not even agree among themselves on any practical alternative measure.

Mr. S. Smith: Are we now a coalition government over here? Do we have to agree on all measures?

Mr. Kerrio: Come on; clean up your act.

Hon. Mr. McCague: That's where we stand as April 1 approaches, the date on which a ban on non-refillable bottles is scheduled to go into effect.

Mr. Cunningham: What about that speech in Dundas? It was a beauty.

Hon. Mr. McCague: Because the tax on cans has not been implemented—

Mr. S. Smith: You can't govern unless the NDP and our party tell you what to do.

Hon. Mr. McCague:—this ban could create an unfair disadvantage to a competitive segment of the soft drink industry, the glass container industry. Therefore, we have developed a modified program which is fair and equitable to all segments of the industry and will meet the government's objectives. The following program will reduce the volume of waste generated by soft drink containers by increasing the availability and use of refillable, money-back bottles. I am amending the current regulation banning non-refillable glass containers, which would take effect April 1, 1978. Under the amended regulation, the industry will be allowed to continue to make and sell non-refillable bottles in these sizes: the 200 millilitre bar-size split; the 750 millilitre and 1.5 litre family sizes.

Where the family-size non-refillables are sold, the same brands and flavours in refillable bottles must be given equal display space. Under this amendment, effective April 1, the previously-announced ban on non-refillable bottles in the 300 millilitre size will be retained. This individual size non-refillable bottle is considered to be a major polluter among containers.

Effective December 1, 1978, retailers must provide display space for 300 millilitre refillable bottles at least equal to the space provided for cans.

I have accepted a voluntary program of self-restraint proposed by the industry. Its representatives have committed themselves to restricting the use of non-refillables to a maximum of 25 per cent of gross gallonage sales by December 31, 1979. My ministry will monitor industry records and performance to ensure that the 75-25 per cent ratio in favour of refillable bottles is met and maintained. As part of the voluntary program, the industry will discontinue all sales promotion activity for carbonated soft drinks in non-refillable containers.

Finally, the industry has recently undertaken extensive programs in support of the collection and recycling of glass and promoting the purchase of soft drinks in refillable containers. A public education campaign based on the theme Many Happy Returns, promoting the refillable money-back bottle, got under way with extensive advertising last week and will continue throughout Ontario.

I also endorse the glass gobbler program, which involves the collection and recycling of discarded glass from licensed premises in major urban centres. I am informed this program will be expanded shortly in conjunction with the Variety Club of Ontario which will support and promote 30 collection depots in Toronto as a fund-raising project on behalf of Variety Village. I hope members will support this excellent project when it is introduced.

To make these new ground rules clear, I'd like to summarize for the hon. members what consumers can expect when they go to the store to buy soft drinks. They can expect that in the small, individual-size containers, they will have at least an equal choice between refillable bottles and cans. In family-size containers, they will have at least an equal choice between refillable and non-refillable bottles. Finally, they will not be subjected to advertising or promotion urging them to buy soft drinks in throwaway containers.

I expect the result to be a marked reduction of waste caused by the use of non-refillable containers and a steady increase in the use of refillable bottles. At the same time, this progress in the battle to curb waste will be achieved without further loss of employment in this industry.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Warner: Yesterday I rose on a point of privilege to draw the Speaker's attention to a comparison between the statement made by the Treasurer (Mr. McCough) contained in the first section on page 15 of his budget paper, and section 54 of the British North America Act and section 18 of our standing orders for this House.

I know that you will be considering the matter, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you to take one further extremely important document into your consideration. That document reads in part that, "No scutage or aid shall be imposed in our kingdom unless by common counsel thereof, except to ransom our person, make our eldest son a knight"—I don't suppose the Treasurer intends to do that—"and once to marry our eldest daughter, and for this a reasonable aid only shall be paid."

That section is contained in the Magna Carta of King John, A.D. 1215, and obviously is the forerunner of the British North America Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am glad the hon. member has brought that to my attention because I didn't think it was a part of our standing orders.

Mr. Makarchuk: No, but it is the basis of responsible government.

Mr. Speaker: I will be reflecting on the member's alleged point of privilege and I will have something to say about it on Monday.

Mr. Cassidy: Scutage is a feudal due and that's all the OHIP premiums are.

Mr. Lewis: It's what the feudal barons extracted from working people in 1215. You have made no progress in 700 years.

Mr. Cassidy: You have gone back to the Dark Ages, in fact.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

OMB HEARINGS

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, I would like to respond to a question raised by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Epp). The original question actually was directed to the Deputy Premier and government House leader, who indicated that I would be responding to same.

The hon. member, on February 23, asked certain questions relating to expediting hearings of the Ontario Municipal Board. As all hon. members are aware, the Minister of Housing tabled a report of the Planning Act review committee on June 28, 1977, and requested public comment on the recommendations made by the committee. The report contains a complete chapter, namely chapter 10, on the role of the Ontario Municipal Board. The Minister of Housing has received numerous briefs commenting on the committee's report.

My staff and staff of the Ministry of Housing have met on two occasions with the Ontario Municipal Board to discuss the recommendations of the Planning Act review committee and the briefs received relating to the OMB, with a view to developing recommendations which will improve the procedures of the board to better serve the interests of the public.

I understand that a further meeting is scheduled with the board in April to pursue the search for the appropriate mechanisms to try to speed up the planning processes which flow through the OMB.

As the minister responsible for the administration of the OMB, I am concerned with some of the delays experienced in our planning process and I am anxious to find ways and means by which the planning process function of the OMB can be improved. I would therefore urge the hon. member for Waterloo North to submit any comments he has on the Planning Act review committee report on the OMB or any suggestions he has for improvement of the procedures of the OMB to the Minister of Housing so that they can be considered in the current review.

Mr. S. Smith: Eight-hour days, reasonable lunch hours, meeting in the summer time—they are a few.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I appreciate that the hon. member for Waterloo North could not be here today, but I gave him a copy of this statement yesterday.

Mr. S. Smith: Five-day weeks perhaps.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Realizing that we could not wait until the government finalizes its response to the Planning Act review committee report to try to expedite hearings before the board, I wrote to the board in April 1977 to request the board's co-operation in expediting hearings. In particular, I reflected the concern of all of us over the rising rate of unemployment and especially the increase in unemployment in the construction industry. I requested the board to do everything possible to ensure that construction projects are not being delayed by our inability to process the OMB applications within a reasonable time.

It has been my practice in the succeeding months, when I have been made aware of a particular delay, to have my staff contact the chairman of the board to determine the cause of the delay and to request the board to do all in its ability to expedite hearings in the appropriate cases. I am not aware whether the hon. member in his question was referring to any particular matter before the board but I can only suggest that if he has a specific complaint of a delay, that he bring it to my attention and I will attempt to find the cause for the delay and request that everything possible be done to expedite the matter.

I would like to indicate that in my view I believe we are fortunate in Ontario to have a board such as the Ontario Municipal Board, with dedicated members who have considerable experience in planning matters and who in most cases dispense their function in an admirable manner. As in most areas of decision-making, the board is being faced with more complex planning matters, members of the public are objecting more frequently to planning decisions and, as a result, the hearings are becoming more lengthy and complex.

In view of these circumstances it is necessary to wrestle with a methodology to improve the service of the board to the public and our aim, as members of this House, should be to make recommendations which we feel would improve the procedures of the board to the ultimate benefit of the public.

Mr. S. Smith: I guess wrestling with it is better than eating it.

ORAL QUESTIONS

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. S. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Treasurer which basically goes over some of the ground of yesterday; but in view of the fact that the committee on social development of this Legislature now will have an opportunity seriously to consider alternatives to the funding of our health care system, alternatives to the rather drastic and, in my opinion, unfair OHIP increases that he has introduced, is he now prepared to delay implementation of these increases until he has heard from the committee? And would he accept that if the committee can agree on an alternative that is fairer and more equitable, that he would be willing to implement the alternative, instead of the OHIP premium increase that he has already put before us?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Certainly, if the committee, the House or the government agreed on some alternative method I too would be prepared to consider implementing some alternative method.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary: Given the fact that I realize that time may be of some importance in this regard, can the Treasurer give the committee some indication of what a reasonable time limit would be to come up with an alternative proposal that would still allow him to rescind, in part or in full, the premium increase that he has already suggested to this House?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would want to talk to the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) about that; he looks after OHIP. But I would think that the order in council raising the premiums would go into effect, and my own judgement would be that the committee would take a period of time and then there might have to be changes after May 1. But if May 1 is to be met, I doubt that there is any time left.

Mr. McClellan: In time for the next election.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Reasonably, I would think the committee is going to take some weeks. If new billing is to go out on May 1, I would suspect we've passed that time already.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Cassidy: A supplementary: Given the anger about the OHIP premium increase which has come from every section of this province, from employers as well as individuals who have to pay this OHIP premium increase, does the Treasurer not think it is presumptuous for the government to pass the order in council bringing those premium increases into force before the budget has even been debated and before any legislation surrounding the budget has been presented to this parliament?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would like to say that this is the only part of my budget of Tuesday night which has aroused some interest from various parts of the province—

Mr. Lewis: I should say; it is the only part, there's nothing else.

Mr. Reid: There's nothing else in it.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Oh, no, there are other comments from other parts of the province, including here.

Mr. Lewis: Except your giveaways, there is nothing of consequence.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: One expects a certain amount of debate and I look forward to it, of course. It begins on Monday and will continue for some time.

Mr. McClellan: Shades of Walter Gordon.

Mr. MacDonald: Or John White.

Mr. Breihaupt: While the Treasurer is discussing this matter with the Minister of Health, could he also discuss with the chairman of the social development committee the timing as to when this discussion on the statement may be held by that committee, with the possibility that the change in dates could be put over to June 1, with ample time yet to get the machinery in operation, in order that the committee would have the alternative available to it and may suggest something that the Treasurer may find of value?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't really think that's practical.

Mr. Cassidy: A supplementary: given the fact that the tax burden on families of modest income in the province, taking income tax and OHIP premiums together, will be as much as $500 per family more in this province than in other parts of Canada; and given the fact that the effective tax rate increase could be as high as 80 per cent for people in certain brackets in the $8,000 or $9,000 level, and could be more than 100 per cent in certain cases where people are also in rent-to-income housing, does the Treasurer not think that it was presumptuous of this government to act by order in council before the people of this province could even get a letter delivered to their elected representatives protesting this OHIP premium increase?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, I don't think it was presumptuous. And in response to the preamble to the member's question I would simply say this.

Mr. Warner: You have a heavy hand.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We have recognized for some time that there is a problem—and there has been a problem since the beginning of OHIP—at whatever level we put the cut-off for full premium or partial premium. It relates to the notch provision, and there are always problems with the notch provision. The member quotes examples; we can give chapter and verse of other kinds of examples.

The fact is that roughly at $9,000 a person pays nothing. For a family at $10,000, depending on the family's circumstances and a whole host of other things, there is a jump. But at some point there must be a cutoff point. We originally had, as I recall, a quarter, half, three-quarters and full assistance premiums; and that, I think, caused more problems than it was worth. We subsequently went to full premium assistance, which some 1,820,000 people receive. A relatively small number, 60,000, are in the half-premium category.

I am quite willing to examine that again, but I would point out that there are misleading tables which can be developed quite easily. My friend the Minister of Health points out that in British Columbia, for example, which appeared more favourably in some tables at the $10,000 level than we did, there is a $5-a-day hospital charge. I am sure the member would not support that, but I think one has to take that into consideration in making a comparison between our premium schedule and the arrangements in some other province.

Mr. Cassidy: There were no premiums in seven provinces.

Mr. Conway: I wonder if the Treasurer can explain how it is that he says on page 15 in his budget that "premiums retain a visible link with the cost of services," and then on page 33 he says that "almost three-quarters of the increase will be paid for by employers, a reflection of the fact that employers' subsidization of OHIP is a common fringe benefit in Ontario." What kind of a visible link is it, insofar as premiums are concerned, when 75 per cent of premium revenue is paid by employers?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is another point I would make with respect to the story which appeared in the Globe and Mail. The Globe and Mail obviously found a couple of people this morning whose premiums were not paid by employers. At that level that's a relatively small—

Mr. Cassidy: There are a lot more than a couple of people. You fellows are so complacent over there, so self-righteous.

Mr. Lewis: Are you ready to be triggered? Are you ready for your morning spam? Are you exercising enormous self control?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would simply point out to my friend that in terms of the visible link, I think it is fair to say that the people of this province are much more aware than they were before Tuesday night of the problems in health costs.

Mr. Breithaupt: I think it is close to the missing link.

Mr. S. Smith: You sure taught them a lesson and you are proud of yourself.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Regardless of who is paying the premium or how the money is raised, they are much more aware today of the fact that $3,951,000,000 of the moneys which will ultimately be voted by this Legislature are going into health care. That's a very large amount.

Mr. Warner: You can't run the system, that's the problem.

Mr. Conway: It is not a visible link for you and I because we don't pay it.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Then if it isn't a visible link, I doubt the member would have raised quite the fuss he has raised today and yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition with his second question.

Mr. Sargent: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: We have had enough supplementaries.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: There will be ample opportunity during the budget debate, during the estimates and during the referrals of the annual report of the Minister of Health to the committee for social development or wherever, to get into the measure contained in the budget during the course of this session.

Mr. Sargent: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: What is it?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, on a matter of $250 million additional tax for people—now Speakers in the House of Commons allow 10 or 15 minutes of supplementaries on an important matter. I don't think it's up to you to rule what should be discussed in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order; I think it is.

Mr. Sargent: It's the importance of the matter—

Mr. Speaker: If it's not my responsibility to operate this House in an orderly fashion, whose is it?

Mr. Sargent: Sometimes you are biased.

Mr. Speaker: The member has said other Speakers have allowed 10 or 15 minutes. We have allowed 11 minutes now. The hon. Leader of the Opposition with his second question.

Mr. S. Smith: Just to be sure I understood, I take it then that there was an agreement that if the committee comes up with a rational alternative the Treasurer would be willing to implement that—

Mr. Lewis: How can he implement it?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We will consider it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cassidy: It's a sham. The order in council was passed within hours.

ONTARIO ECONOMIC STRATEGY

Mr. S. Smith: My second question to the Treasurer has to do with his program, which is fancifully titled Towards a Balanced Budget. I would ask him to reconcile something here for me. In the budget of 1977, he speaks of his five-year deficit reduction plan and so on, and says that the strategy "assumes that eventual elimination of the budgetary deficit will be realized via expenditure restraint, not via tax increases." Yet in the 1978 budget on page 7, in the part called Reaffirming the Balanced Budget Plan, it says: "The discretionary revenue increases in this budget, together with continued expenditure constraint, have put the fiscal plan back on target."

I wonder if the Treasurer can reconcile the difference between a plan that did not envisage tax increases in 1977 and one that has included them in 1978. Can he tell us whether he has simply changed his mind on this matter or whether his flip comment of 1977 has become a flop in 1978?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't have last year's budget here in front of me but the figures were in a comparable table and are repeated in table 6 on page 6 of budget paper C. They showed what the original targets were going to be. No, I'm sorry, it doesn't show the original target in terms of revenue, but as I recall it was something like eight or nine per cent. It was obviously a higher figure in 1977-78 than the 7.5 per cent we achieved in revenues, and it was something less in 1978-79 than the 12.6 per cent that we now forecast.

I don't remember whether the figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 have changed, but those two figures, 9.4 per cent and 10.1 per cent, do not envisage further tax increases. On the other hand, if the expenditure levels are higher or if the revenue projections come in lower—and there is still a determination to achieve the figure by 1980-81—then any one of those percentages or variables could change.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary, just to make sure I understand the Treasurer, what he is saying then is that when he presented his budget paper in 1977 he thought he would be able to get on a balanced budget target plan without any tax increases. It didn't work out that way for this year but he is still hoping that in the future it might work out that way and he continues to make the same type of assertion.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would point out one other thing, just to set the record completely straight. I think the tables last year in the budget, comparable to table 6, envisaged expenditures in the year beginning April 1 next rising at 6.3 per cent. We were hopeful that there would be a somewhat lower rate of inflation during 1977-78 and beyond than we have now experienced or that we now envisage. Part of that difference certainly is the difference between 6.3 per cent and seven per cent.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: In view of the substantial amounts being spent by the province for capital expenditures on things like schools, hospitals and roads, and for capital loans to municipalities et cetera, can the Treasurer tell this House what proportion of this year's cash requirements, if any, will be necessary to cover current operating deficits?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: None. I think tables C7 and C8 on page 22 of budget paper C show investments of $1.404 billion and cash requirements of $1.055 billion.

Mr. Peterson: Supplementary: When the Treasurer announced in 1977 that it was his plan to balance the budget by 1981, was it his intention then to sell off the assets of the province in order to meet that goal, or was he trying at that time to reach some kind of meeting between revenues and expenditures; or was he at that time contemplating dipping into his asset pool, putting it into current revenues in order to minimize the size of current cash requirements?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't know whether I can remember all those questions. No, I wasn't contemplating it at that point particularly. That is not part of reaching a balanced budget target. As the leader of the third party pointed out, that figure only affects the cash requirements. The sale of a certain part of the mortgage portfolio does not affect the budgetary figures.

By the same token, I wasn't contemplating a year ago making the switch to front-end financing, which we have done in several areas, the full impact of which will be in the next year rather than in the year beginning April 1. That too changes the figures and increases the budgetary deficit, by I think $66 million in this year, and leaves the cash requirements exactly the same. That figure presumably would go in a subsequent year. So there are changes between the thinking of a year ago and of the thinking now, but the end result is the same.

Mr. Cassidy: Final supplementary: Can the Treasurer say whether the comments given to reporters about possibly not achieving his balanced budget target until 1983 or so were inspired by the Treasurer in case he needed to get off the hook with the 1981 target?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would be glad to look at the quote. I don't recall saying that.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, you are gentle as a lamb; you are. You know, if you bottle it all up this way when it explodes one day the shrapnel will fall everywhere.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You know, Stephen, that's not true.

Mr. Makarchuk: You're grooming yourself well, Premier McKeough.

Mr. Cassidy: You're trying to get approval—

Mr. Lewis: How long, O Lord, how long?

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Peterson: That grey-headed man is interjecting, Mr. Speaker.

Supplementary: In the Treasurer's defence of these very substantial net cash requirements that we have had over the past seven years his principal argument has been that it has all gone into capital goods. One could argue the definition of some of those capital items that he talks about, but is it not a fact that in the days before the Davis-McKeough regime there were balanced budgets and even then they had capital expenditures, and in the future we are going to have to have capital expenditures, and he is anticipating reaching a balanced budget by 1981, therefore he is using sleight-of-hand definitions to justify the very large deficits of the past six or seven years.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I think we are into the leader's speech on Monday.

Mr. Peterson: The financial critic.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The financial critic—we wonder over here at times.

Mr. Cassidy: So do we.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would simply say this, that I do hope on Monday he will talk about this year's budget and not what may have happened 10 years ago. That's what he did last year, but I hope he might come into the twentieth century this year and not be quite as reactionary as he was last year.

Mr. Foulds: Supplementary: I'd like to ask the Treasurer if he took into consideration in his projected revenue for this budget, and presumably his projected revenue for subsequent budgets in meeting his balanced budget target in 1981, the possible reduction of revenue that will arise because of the contemplated changes by his colleague, the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller), in the Crown Timber Act and the resultant changes in the regulations under that Act having to do with stumpage fees?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The estimates which are in this budget, and presumably in subsequent budgets, for Crown timber fees have the approval of the Minister of Natural Resources and would conform to the—

Mr. Foulds: The present pattern and the projected changes?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The changes, yes.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Cassidy: A question to the Treasurer: Has the Treasurer computed figures on the overall impact of income tax plus OHIP premiums on taxpayers at different income levels in Ontario, comparing those with the same incidence of income tax plus premiums, if any, in other provinces of Canada, and will he table them in the House? Do they show, as we suspect, that the tax plus OHIP level or load in this province is much higher than for families in the rest of Canada at almost every income level?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't think that's correct. I don't know that we have tables showing that. We'll be glad to table what we do have at the appropriate time.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Up to an income of $20,000, will the Treasurer confirm that the tax plus OHIP premium level in this province is much higher than in any other province of the country?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to take that under advisement.

Mr. Warner: Take the whole budget under advisement.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Has the Treasurer made any studies of the effect of the OHIP premium increases on small businessmen who are struggling to get by now—

Mr. Breithaupt: How do you know that?

Mr. Cassidy:—and who will have to pay an additional cost, both as individual self-payers and through the premiums they pay for their employees?

An hon. member: It won't hurt as much as the $4 minimum wage.

Mr. S. Smith: Is the NDP sure it is willing to take their money?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It is certainly the aim and one of the thrusts, not only of this budget but of budgets for a number of years—and it is the thrust and aim on this side of the House—that our businesses, small and large, remain competitive. I recognize that the member would load more on to the corporate tax, whether that is for little businessmen or bigger businessmen. We don't share that philosophy on this side of the House.

Mr. Foulds: But you have just done it.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would point out to the member that there are tables in the budget indicating the variety of payroll deductions in the United States as opposed to here. We believe we are competitive. No one likes to pay higher premiums. But I think the method we have chosen is a fair and equitable one.

Mr. McClellan: It's the opposite—exactly the opposite.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Obviously, however, the member is going to have more to say about that on Tuesday.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Can the Treasurer table information about the effect of the OHIP premium increase on farmers in view of the fact that farm incomes have increased by only two per cent in the last four years but farm costs have risen by 49 per cent?

Hon. W. Newman: They have gone down. Didn't you even know that?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, we don't segregate out farmers per se in our tax system.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary; the hon. member for Scarborough-Ellesmere.

Mr. Warner: Supplementary: Is it the Treasurer's fiscal policy, and is it to remain in force for ever, that the government should collect more money from the OHIP tax than from corporate tax? Is that the fiscal policy that the Treasurer wants to continue in this province?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No.

Mr. Warner: When are you going to change it then?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre with his second question.

Mr. Lewis: You wouldn't consider one more final supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Lewis: Even if it is provocative and inflammatory, Mr. Speaker? Just to brighten up the morning a bit?

Mr. S. Smith: Are you saying your leader is not bright enough?

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I want to serve notice that we are going to invent the penultimate supplementary in order to get a last one in from time to time.

FLECK MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Mr. Cassidy: I have a question of the Minister of Labour. Can she tell this House if there are any outstanding safety or sanitation orders against Fleck Manufacturing Company Limited in Centralia?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot at this point. But I shall check and report to the House.

Mr. Mackenzie: Supplementary: Given the current situation at Fleck, and given that the ministry's inspectors have been in the plant quite regularly in recent months, have they not made the minister aware of the safety conditions in the plant—the five girls who have been burned by one spitting mould alone; the injuries received from falling wire racks; the machines, the presses, without guards? Is she aware of the fact that when her ministry's inspectors are in the plant those presses have been shut down, and when the inspectors have left the plant they have been turned back on?

Is the minister also not aware of some of the sanitation conditions in the plant—there are four toilets for more than 100 women per shift, and most of the time only two of the toilets are working; the dirt that is there, the uncollected garbage, and the rat problem?

Has the minister also been informed by her inspectors—and if not, why not—that they go in and go around with management and have not yet contacted the workers or their representatives on these tours of the plant?

Can the minister explain some of these things and why, given the situation, she wouldn't have been brought up to date on some of the reasons for the organization of the plant?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure at all that last allegation is correct but, as I have suggested, I shall check into this fully and report to the House.

Mr. MacDonald: The Ministry of Labour is neutral, but the question is: Who is it neutral against?

Mr. Lewis: Supplementary: Does the minister not think it might be time for her ministry to entertain some significant and crisis intervention in this particular dispute, given the involvement of the OPP officers? In fact, is she not aware that we are now heading into an unhappy phase with the Ford Motor Company, because the workers at Talbotville obviously will not use the materials that are coming out of Fleck during the course of this unfair management position at that plant and that, in fact, 500 to 600 people may man the picket lines next week as a result of the utterly indefensible OPP intervention on the side of management in this particular dispute? When is the minister going to call either for an inquiry into the conditions in that plant and the behaviour around collective bargaining or when is she going to speak to her hon. colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kerr), and tell him to pull the OPP into line before that entire community is disrupted?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am aware that there was something which I would construe as an unwarranted threat in that community levelled by the Canadian director of the United Auto Workers.

Mr. Lewis: What was the police action?

Mr. Warner: The minister's impartiality is ludicrous.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am concerned that he would move in that direction at this time, when he knew full well that yesterday morning—

Mr. McClellan: She should get out of this portfolio.

Mr. Warner: She is the minister of mismanagement.

Hon. B. Stephenson:—there was the first mediation of this dispute permitted by the UAW to occur.

Mr. Lewis: Permitted?

Mr. Warner: She is a management apologist.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I would remind the members of this House that conciliation was rejected on two occasions by the UAW and mediation rejected on two occasions by the UAW as well.

Mr. Lewis: The company said it wouldn't talk about union security.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The role of the Ministry of Labour is to attempt to resolve the dispute. That is precisely what we are trying to do.

Mr. Cassidy: By sending in the police.

Mr. Warner: By doing nothing.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We shall move in that direction as vigorously as we possibly can.

Mr. Cassidy: It sounds like 1944 all over again.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We cannot do it without the co-operation of the parties to the negotiation. Up until yesterday we did not have that co-operation.

Mr. Lewis: That is balderdash.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am pleased to say that there was an effective mediation meeting yesterday. I am hopeful about it because I believe this dispute can be resolved in relatively short order if good meetings occur.

Mr. Lewis: It had better be resolved.

Mr. Warner: She ought to be ashamed of herself—the Minister of Labour, an apologist for management.

LOTTERY FUNDS

Mr. Kerrio: I have a question of the Minister of Culture and Recreation. In light of the unconscionable and crippling increases in OHIP premiums, would the minister consider a fair portion of lottery funds being directed to offset this increase?

Hon. Mr. Welch: As the member knows, the Minister of Culture and Recreation is restricted with respect to the use of the proceeds of Wintario by the Act establishing the Ontario Lottery Corporation.

Mr. MacDonald: Change the bill.

Mr. S. Smith: Change it. We have offered to change it. The minister knows that.

Hon. Mr. Welch: It is for sports, recreation, culture and fitness.

Mr. Ruston: The government can always amend the Act.

Mr. Kerrio: Supplementary: Notwithstanding that—and as the minister recalls, this is a kind of a perennial question because as things get worse I keep suggesting that the priorities are out of line—I would like to say that he has suggested it was supported on all sides of the House. I suggest that right today that wouldn't be necessarily true. So, I would ask if the minister would entertain some suggestions from this side and speak with the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) to see if by May 15 we couldn't suggest this as an alternative source of income to offset these increases?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Am I to interpret the member for Niagara Falls as feeling that on-going programs of governments should really be funded from lottery sources?

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, may I have one more supplementary? In view of the situation as it exists today, yes, I think we should reconsider.

Hon. Mr. Welch: We don't plan any amendments to the Ontario Lottery Corporation Act at the moment.

Mr. Kerrio: I am asking the minister if he would.

Mr. S. Smith: Supplementary: Could the minister explain to this House, given that the lottery funds for Wintario are vastly in excess of what they were originally anticipated at the time that the Act was brought in—

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's not true.

Mr. S. Smith:—and given the fact that the economy has had a terrible downturn since that time, why it is he insists on maintaining so many millions of dollars to send oldtimers hockey teams around or to fund some folk-dancing festival or whatever?

Mr. Havrot: What have you got against oldtimers hockey teams? You may get old some day.

Mr. S. Smith: Why not set aside a reasonable amount of money for those cultural activities and devote the rest of the money, tens of millions of dollars, to the social and health needs of Ontario which are paramount at this time?

Mr. Havrot: Do you think the member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent) is going to stand for your talking about oldtimers hockey games like that?

Hon. Mr. Welch: I think we had better clear up one misunderstanding on the part of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, that is, with respect to the excessive moneys which Wintario has produced as compared to estimates. That is not the case.

Mr. S. Smith: You expected $20 million.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I don't think the hon. member would need to be reminded that over the years from the tax sources of this province, health and education and a good many other particularly important services of this government have been well looked after.

Mr. Cassidy: I thought it was the people of the province who paid for that.

[11:00]

Hon. Mr. Welch: There was a general recognition that there was some need to attach some importance to matters of culture and recreation and sports and fitness, and I don't share his downgrading of those services.

Mr. S. Smith: What nonsense. Forty million dollars would be enough, and you know it.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Certainly, if the hon. member would like to drop over and see the correspondence that I receive from members of his caucus urging me to do even more for the oldtimers and the handicapped people and the recreational life of this province—

Mr. S. Smith: Here we go.

Hon. Mr. Welch:—he'd understand how important this is. These services are very important to the people.

Mr. S. Smith: Your priorities are cockeyed.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I think ongoing services of government should be provided from taxes and not from gambling or lottery proceeds.

Mr. Lewis: Just get your facts right. You never get your facts right.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sargent: Supplementary: May I say to the hon. minister, that he's the only man in Ontario who doesn't know that that's a political slush fund.

Mr. Kerrio: If he does, we won't get any. The Tories will take it all.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Question.

Mr. Sargent: My question is, why doesn't he level with the people of Ontario?

Mr. S. Smith: Is the minister finally going to sign rejection letters too?

An hon. member: It's all part of the pork barrel.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce has the floor for the purposes of asking a question.

Mr. Sargent: At the current rate of expenditures now, the hon. minister could put $80 million into government-needed services—

Mr. Havrot: Question.

Mr. Sargent:—and keep $10 million in the pot and not kid the people that he's using it for political purposes. It's a total slush fund. That's what it is. We all know what it is.

Ms. Gigantes: Why don't you level?

Mr. Havrot: Question.

Mr. Sargent: Why don't you do that?

Mr. Speaker: That's not a question.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that I don't know anything about it. One of the reasons I don't know is because that isn't the case. That's a tremendously irresponsible statement.

An hon. member: That's an irresponsible minister.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I never cease to be amazed when the clippings come in, to see the opposition members almost knocking over old people to get into the picture as they present the Wintario cheques to the successful recipients.

Mr. S. Smith: When are you going to sign for the rejections too and not just the acceptances?

Hon. Mr. Welch: And the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) is playing both ends. The members should hear what he says in Niagara Falls. He takes credit for the whole program there.

Mr. Lewis: If I may intrude for a moment on the House leader's leadership ambitions, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to put a—

Hon. Mr. Welch: I'd just like to draw attention to the fact that we are wearing the same suit today.

Mr. Speaker: Question.

Mr. Lewis: But you see what green corduroy does for you? May I ask a question of the Solicitor General?

OPP ROLE IN STRIKE

Mr. Lewis: Does the Solicitor General really think it is necessary for 25 to 30 OPP officers to be involved in a small dispute involving 100 to 125 women on the picket line? Does that make sense to him in this day and age in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: As the hon. member knows, on Monday, I believe, there were about six OPP officers in front of the plant in the area of the picket line—

Mr. Lewis: But there were more.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—and because of the incidents that took place that morning—

Mr. Lewis: They brought in the reinforcements.

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—there were more added on Tuesday morning. As far as the number is concerned—

Mr. Lewis: What about the national guard?

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—there are, I believe, something like 160 people working in that plant.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It's one hundred and forty.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: One hundred and forty, I'm sorry. I was including office staff and everything.

Mr. Lewis: It is an informational picket.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Not having been at the scene when the shifts were going on in the morning, I wouldn't want to make that judgement of whether or not there were too many. My information is that there have been no incidents during the past three days. There are two shifts a day and there has, to my knowledge, been no problem as far as pushing and shoving, or interference. I would think, if that is the case, the number of police officers there could be reduced.

Mr. Cassidy: There's been pushing by the OPP.

Mr. Lewis: I am glad to hear that the minister might reduce it. May I ask the hon. minister a supplementary? Since the working people at that plant claim verbal and physical intimidation by the OPP, since there are clear and identifiable examples of the OPP physically handling certain of the strikers and since obviously the police have created the atmosphere of crisis which the dispute itself did not create, does the minister think it is time for an inquiry into the behaviour of the OPP at this plant; or indeed for him to haul them off himself rather than be fed the amount of claptrap which the police are now feeding him to report to this Legislature, and it turns out that the information he has is dead wrong.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, there is information of some incidents on Monday and Tuesday morning.

Mr. Davidson: Why don't you call in the militia?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The purpose of the OPP personnel there is to maintain peace on that picket line.

Mr. MacDonald: On behalf of management.

Mr. Makarchuk: How come they were there before the picket line?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: There has been some obstruction, I understand, when people are entering the plant.

Mr. Foulds: It's the most provocative peace I've ever heard of.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The OPP are not being violent. They are attempting to clear the road when cars or a bus attempt to enter the plant.

Mr. Warner: You don't have any control over them. They can do what they want.

Mr. Lewis: But they were there before it started. It's like goons on the picket line and it's unnecessary in Ontario. The minister doesn't need that in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: As I mentioned before, on the Monday morning there were about six officers there. And because of the fact that there was obstruction—

Mr. Lewis: Obstruction—there was no obstruction. They were trying to talk to a bus driver.

Mr. Rotenberg: If you believe in that, you believe in tooth fairies.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I realize that the member doesn't believe anybody should be allowed to cross the picket line, that no employee should be allowed to cross the picket line. That is an argument we shouldn't get into today.

All I am telling the member is that the police attempt to keep the roadway open because there are people on foot as well as in cars or buses, and there has been obstruction by some of the picketers. There was a car stopping a bus for example; there was some impediment as far as people entering that plant.

The police role is to clear the roadway so that if somebody wants to go into that plant he can do so unobstructed and unimpeded. The picket line there, as the member knows is to inform the people. I don't know what the member said; he indicated there was some verbal abuse.

Mr. Lewis: Verbal intimidation. People have been told by the police they should not be on strike. What kind of stuff is that?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Well, if that is true, that is wrong. If that is true, the police have no business saying that.

Mr. Lewis: Well, then, why is it being permitted? There are affidavits being signed.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: But if the police are saying you are not supposed to be on this roadway, clear this roadway, that may be in your opinion verbal intimidation. It is not in mine.

Mr. MacDonald: Your position is indefensible.

Mr. Lewis: No; verbal intimidation is worse than that.

Mr. Mackenzie: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. Solicitor General then question the six officers that he says were involved because at least two of those officers went around to the employees and suggested—after their leadership were gone I might say—after they had been arrested, that they go back into the plant, that there wasn't anything further they could gain and "it was better" to give you an actual quote, that they be "working and making money" than be out on that picket line. Now is that not intimidation and interference by the police?

Mr. Lewis: That's not the job of the police.

Mr. Mackenzie: Those officers should not still be on that force.

Mr. Havrot: You cannot stand competition.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The hon. member is getting information second-hand.

Ms. Gigantes: Where are you getting it?

Mr. Mackenzie: Everyone we talked to.

Mr. Foulds: Have you talked to them?

Mr. Cassidy: They were there, you weren't there.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You weren't there, Michael.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: If there are employees who say that this in fact took place, then they have a legitimate complaint. The police are not supposed to get involved in the pros and cons of that dispute in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Lewis: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: What remarks an individual officer may say to an employee I would like to find out, but it would be difficult to establish that unless you talked to the employee directly. It is a small area and probably in some cases they know the employees.

Mr. Lewis: You can't even remember what you said yesterday on tape.

PROVINCIAL DEBT

Mr. Peterson: To the Premier, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough): I am sure he has read the editorial in the Globe and Mail this morning entitled, "And Deeper in Debt," where there are suggestions that changes of definitions have been employed by the Treasurer in determining percentage data as a percentage of gross provincial product or domestic product. Would the Premier care to comment on that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker, I wouldn't. I rarely comment on Globe and Mail editorials.

Mr. Peterson: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Premier has indicated he doesn't wish to comment on it, let alone comment further.

Mr. Peterson: I'd like to extract one out of his hide, Mr. Speaker. That certainly is my right. This in my judgement is a very serious charge of fudging the numbers by the government. Would the Premier be prepared to make a statement, or have the Treasurer make a statement, to this House on the changes of definitions that have been employed as per this article?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, this government never fudges the figures. I'm sure if the hon. member's contribution on Monday is going to rely on the sometimes enlightened editorial comment of some newspapers, so be it. I would suggest that Monday afternoon we will all listen very carefully as he reads editorials from here, there and everywhere else. The only advice I would give him is that sometimes his own judgement is better than editorials—not always, not often, but on occasion. I would hope he would contribute some of that on Monday afternoon.

Mr. Peterson: If the government is looking to me for the leadership that is so sadly lacking—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That's not a supplementary.

Hon. Mr. Davis: If the hon. member is saying he is looking for leadership, we all know on this side of the House that he's looking for leadership. We've known that for two years.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, by way of supplementary, is the Premier prepared to confirm that the Smith committee limitation of nine per cent on the basis of consistent accounting is today at least in excess of 12 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to confirm that.

SOFT DRINK CONTAINERS

Ms. Bryden: I have three questions for the Minister of the Environment arising out of his statement on soft drink containers. Has the minister monitored the retail stores in Ontario to back up his statement that the soft drink of his choice is readily available in most stores in both refillable and non-refillable forms? If so will he table the reports of such monitoring?

Secondly, is the minister prepared to change his regulations to make it easier for consumers to return refillables by requiring standard sizes and shapes of all bottles and by requiring stores to accept all bottles regardless of where they were purchased?

Thirdly, what is the minister doing to increase facilities for the recycling of any containers that are not refillable?

Hon. Mr. McCague: Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to have checked the wording of my statement. I gave it to Hansard with the assurance that it would be right back and it hasn't arrived here yet.

Mr. Peterson: You should remember it, George.

Ms. Bryden: Do you really know what you said? I can read it to you, if you want.

Hon. Mr. McCague: With regard to the availability in stores of both kinds, the non-refillable regulation was not to come into effect until April 1 of this year, and our ministry has not spent great sums of money monitoring what is going on in the particular industry. But there are surveys done by Neilson which we think it is more prudent to rely on than to go out and do the surveys.

Your third question was what are we doing about recycling. We would have liked to have had a small five-cent tax on cans at one point to help with the recycling.

Mr. S. Smith: To help with revenue, not recycling.

Hon. Mr. McCague: We were not successful in that. I do notice that the NDP at their convention passed a motion saying there should be a small tax on cans. We don't intend, at this point, to single out any one segment of polluters. Now that I hope we have the matter of soft drink containers set aside for a few years, I would like to see the waste management committee get on with the job of waste management in total and not just zero in on one particular aspect of it. We will be doing that.

Mr. Haggerty: Write the LCBO.

Hon. Mr. McCague: I am sorry—the second part of the member's rather long question has slipped my mind.

Ms. Bryden: I asked if the minister is prepared to change the regulations to make all containers of standard sizes and shapes, and to make it easier for consumers to return refillables by requiring stores to accept all containers.

[11:15]

Hon. Mr. Davis: Patrick Lawlor would oppose that.

Mr. Foulds: No, not so. He would support that.

Mr. S. Smith: Patrick would oppose most of your policies.

Hon. Mr. McCague: No, Mr. Speaker, that's been discussed. There is a size qualification. We're not saying that they all have to be the same shape. I believe the regulation does allow for bottles to go back to a store that sells the same kind of bottles. I'm not so naive as to think that isn't being abused somewhere sometimes, but it's our wish to encourage everybody to take back those kinds of bottles that they sell.

Ms. Bryden: Is the minister not aware that the present regulations require equal space for refillables and non-refillables and Pollution Probe has made various surveys showing that equal space is not being provided in a great many stores, certainly in the Toronto area? What is he going to do to ensure that equal space is available?

Hon. Mr. McCague: Mr. Speaker, I'm not sure what we'll do if that is being badly abused. I've had two letters since I became minister complaining about this. We are working towards self-regulation rather than a lot of regulation; that 75-25 per cent, the business will probably handle that itself.

Mr. Gaunt: Supplementary: The minister has indicated that the refillable bottle has about 60 per cent of the market as of December 31, 1977, which means the can and the non-refillable have about 40 per cent of the market. Could the minister indicate the percentage breakdown as between the can and the non-refillable bottle with respect to that remaining 40 per cent?

Hon. Mr. McCague: Mr. Speaker, I wouldn't want to be tied to a figure. If the member would like me to give an estimate I would say that of the 40 per cent, 25 per cent is cans and 15 per cent non-returnable glass.

MASSEY-FERGUSON

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I'm sorry I am unable to recall whether it was Friday last or Monday of this week that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Makarchuk) raised the question of layoffs at Massey-Ferguson in Brantford.

There are layoffs at Massey-Ferguson in Brantford. In fact, there are about 200 on temporary layoff right now, but all of those layoffs are, indeed, temporary. The four plants in Brantford employ about 3,500 hourly and 400 salaried employees and there will be, it is anticipated, a further number of layoffs of a temporary nature at the plants in Brantford over the next several months.

It is anticipated that many of those who are presently laid off will probably be recalled by late May or early June of this year and that, indeed, all of those presently laid off will be recalled totally by the end of this year.

I should point out that these, as I mentioned earlier, are temporary layoffs and in situations such as this there is not a legal requirement for the company to inform the ministry of its actions because, indeed, in these instances the company still continues to provide a measure of support to the individuals who are laid off temporarily.

HOSPITAL BUDGETS

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Health. The question has to do with the Trenton Memorial Hospital, which, in comparison with other hospitals of the same calibre, operates at a lower cost than many other hospitals of the same size.

The 1976 hospital statistics show the gross operating costs to keep one person at the Trenton Memorial Hospital for one day as $104.03 while the average cost per day for general hospitals with 100 or more beds is $127.17 and the average cost across the province is $149.84. Why is it that a hospital such as Trenton Memorial Hospital, which has worked year after year to cut its expenses, is penalized with only a 3.5 per cent increase on the present budget while hospitals with larger budgets, which have not cut expenses, have their increase based on budgets sometimes inflated in preparation for percentage increases such as this?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will take a look at the material that was sent out to all members on how the budgets were arrived at, he will realize that for all hospitals of 50 beds or more, the average increase in budget is 4.5 per cent. In fact, the emphasis there should be on the word "average," because what we have tried to do is to take into account staffing patterns at December 31, 1976.

We then look at the various factors that contribute to the budget, such as when contract dates come up. For instance, if a hospital has all of its contracts coming up in the first quarter of the year, compared to a hospital whose contracts all come in the last quarter of the year, obviously it is going to require more money since staffing accounts for anywhere from 70 to 80 per cent of a hospital's budget.

Then we look at other things, such as administration, materials and so forth, all of which is factored in and all of which can vary by plus or minus a percentage point since no two hospitals are exactly the same. In fact, the hon. member mentioned per diems, which of course is a calculation at the end of a particular budgetary year. Once you know how many patient-days they had and you divide that into the global budget which is approved, you find that no two hospitals are exactly the same—even side by side, community to community.

In the case of Trenton—and I corresponded recently with the lady who is the chairman of the board there; she is a very fine lady. I visited that hospital, as a matter of fact—

Mr. O'Neil: During the election time; I remember that.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: It is one of a number of hospitals that I have had a chance to visit. I met the hon. member's mother-in-law in the cafeteria that day, as a matter of fact; she is a very nice lady.

Mr. O'Neil: She told me she fed you well.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: She didn't feed me at all. Doesn't it show?

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I see, I see. As a matter of fact, while I am speaking about that hospital, I have to commend them because that's one of the hospitals where they have gone to a commercial operator for their cafeteria services—if I remember correctly, it's Versafood Services—at that hospital. They are running a good operation.

Mr. O'Neil: Don't beat around the bush, Dennis. I just want to know if you are going to increase their budget.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think we knew that's what you wanted to know. Why didn't you ask that?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: In some other hospitals, for instance, it has meant some RNA programs have been taken out of the Ministry of Health's budget and they are now going to be funded by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. There are a number of factors. But I can tell the hon. member that we have tried, as much as it is humanly possible, to spread the available funds equitably.

I find it a little odd that the hon. member can scream and try to put on an act about being concerned about the increase in the OHIP premiums and then try to say that we should spend more money. And while I am on my feet, let me say how much I welcome the petition which was presented here yesterday.

Mr. Kerrio: You're stick-handling all over the place now.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: We have been working in my ministry for nine months, looking at various alternatives to a premium system which we will be more than happy to share with the social development committee. We have come up against two problems, and I would welcome the participation, particularly of the hon. member's party and of the third party, as to how we overcome those problems.

Mr. di Santo: What's this, a statement?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: One is that as we move away from a premium system to anything—

Mr. Speaker: What has that got to do with the hospital at Trenton?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, it has a lot to do with the financing, which contributes to the question of how we make up the budgets. The one is that in moving—

An hon. member: You're out of order.

Mr. Kerrio: You've stick-handled yourself right out of the rink.

Mr. O'Neil: You're getting yourself in deeper. Dr. Potter would never have taken that guff for a minute.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously isn't interested in the subject at all—

Mr. Foulds: You are more articulate when you mumble.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: —but as we moved away from the present premium system to a payroll tax or to an income tax system, we would have to dismiss 625 staff from OHIP.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing at all to do with the original question. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. O'Neil: Yes, I do have a supplementary question; I feel I have to ask it on this matter. The first part of my supplementary question would be: Is the minister going to reconsider the budget that has been established for Trenton? The second part is: Does the minister not feel that, with the present system in his ministry, he is encouraging hospitals to maintain those high budgets so that when the minister comes out with his percentage increases they get a high budget and they aren't cut. That's what the minister needs to look at.

Mr. S. Smith: That's what he does; he rewards the fat hospitals—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Do you want an answer to the question?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: No. That's exactly the point. They do not particularly want an answer, because they have never been interested in the facts. In 13 months as Minister of Health I have yet to see a definitive policy on anything to do with health care come out of that party—not one single thing.

Mr. O'Neil: Here's one right here.

Mr. Kerrio: That's your job.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: It's still nonsense today.

Mr. Speaker, to answer the question—

Mr. Speaker: Okay; fine.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: To answer the question, what we indicated to all of the hospitals is that the money that has been allocated is all the money there is; and unless there's a mathematical error, that we would not change the amount. There is some money built in for new programs and during the year there will be some new programs, although not a lot, approved and some expansion of existing programs around the province.

The second thing is that if the member will look at the facts and take the time to sit down and look at the way it is set up, he will find that a lot of what we would call the 'fat cats' or the 'high rollers,' where we think that there is more fat than in others, are being hit very hard.

Mr. O'Neil: That's not so.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I would emphasize one other thing—recognizing two things, namely, the relative lack of flexibility in the very small hospitals and the future need for growth in chronic care services—that the average increase for hospitals under 50 beds or under a $1.7 million budget, such as McCausland Hospital, Mr. Speaker, in your own riding, and for chronic care hospitals is six per cent.

ARVIN AUTOMOTIVE DISPUTE

Mr. Philip: I have a question of the Minister of Labour: Is the minister aware that in spite of the offer by the United Steelworkers Local 8341 to keep workers on the job at the old rate while bargaining with Arvin Automotive of Canada Limited, the company's new US-based owners have locked the employees out as of January 30 and are reportedly sustaining the lockout by importing products from the US parent company?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I am not aware of this. The company is Arvin?

Mr. Philip: Arvin Automotive of Canada Limited.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I shall look into that.

Mr. Philip: Supplementary: Can the minister at the same time look into why it took her ministry from January 30 to February 21 to meet with the company and why her officials have not met with the company since then? Does the minister not feel that some action can be taken by her ministry to force the company to meet with union officials and bargain in good faith?

Hon. B. Stephenson: We most certainly can attempt to persuade the company that meetings are essential. In this action in almost all instances in the past we have been successful. We shall pursue that.

POLLUTION BY HOLIDAY INN

Mr. Stong: I have a question of the Minister of the Environment. Mr. Justice John Osler of the Supreme Court of Ontario has rendered a less than complimentary judicial interpretation of the role played by the ministry to date in fulfilling its responsibilities towards environmental protection. I quote from a report of that hearing conducted by Mr. Justice Osler into an application by Holiday Inn near Huntsville to discharge sewage into nearby Fairy Lake, wherein he observed: "The provincial government carries out environmental protection in an ad hoc manner, instead of by regulation. It is extraordinary that there are no regulations and that the minister is able to free-wheel all over the place." He said it amounted to the minister saying as well: "As long as I am talking about water, I am completely untrammelled and can do anything I want."

When will the minister make and enforce regulations designed to protect the environment from attempts by such private interests as Holiday Inn to pollute our lakes and destroy our drinking water?

Because I am short of time, I will ask another question. Is the minister prepared at this time to implement the recommendation of the Environmental Assessment Board which would require Holiday Inn to follow the safer route of spraying treated effluent into a properly prepared and adequate bush area, rather than dumping the sewage into our lakes?

Hon. Mr. McCague: As far as the judge's report is concerned, he is critical of the ministry because we don't have one water quality for all of Ontario. I am looking into that matter. I think the hon. member can understand that it is very difficult to have one standard right across the province. I think it leads to a lot of problems.

Mr. Kerrio: You should have one rule: You can't pollute.

Hon. Mr. McCague: It is true that the minister has some jurisdiction. As for the matter of what Hidden Valley will do with their sewage, we are looking at that also but I am not prepared to report at this time. [11:30]

REPORT

ENVIRONMENTAL CERTIFICATES

Hon. Mr. McCague: As requested by the hon. member for Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden), I wish to table two certificates issued by my ministry to the St. Lawrence Cement Company in Mississauga. The first certificate was for the burning of chlorinated organic compounds including PCBs. This certificate has been surrendered by the company and returned to the ministry.

The second certificate allows the company to burn waste lubricating oils and makes no reference to the content of PCBs. Although they were not requested, I am also attaching three additional certificates issued to this company which allow for the burning of chlorinated aliphatic hydrocarbons and chlorinated aromatic hydrocarbons.

MOTIONS

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that the standing administration of justice committee and the resources development committee may meet on Wednesday morning, March 15.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that the standing social development committee may meet on Monday evening, March 13.

Motion agreed to.

WCB REPORT

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that in compliance with section 81 of the Workmen's Compensation Amendment Act, 1973, the annual report of the Workmen's Compensation Board for 1976 be referred to the standing resources development committee for consideration at its meetings of Wednesday, March 15, the proceedings of which shall be transcribed by Hansard and appended to the Hansard proceedings of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that supplementary estimates be referred to committees as follows: Supplementary estimates for the Ministry of Education to the standing social development committee; supplementary estimates for the Ministry of Agriculture and Food and the Ministry of Northern Affairs to the standing resources development committee; supplementary estimates for the Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs to the standing general government committee. All supplementary estimates are to be completed by Wednesday, March 15, and reported to the House on Thursday, March 16.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I wonder if the House would allow me just to amend the motion. In addition to the supplementary estimates for the Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs, those of the Ministry of Government Services as well are to go to the standing general government committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed? So ordered.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

Resumption of the adjourned debate in committee of the whole House on Bill 59, An Act to reform the Law respecting Property Rights and Support Obligations between Married Persons and in other Family Relationships.

Mr. Lawlor: It is probably better, in arguing for legislation, to remain objective, impersonal, above the mere emotionalism of a situation. However, for a moment I would ask for your indulgence to inject a personal note or to continue one.

This legislation has been rough for me—very difficult. I suppose to place it in an overall context it somewhat comes to this: We are no longer at midnight with respect to the interrelationship between human beings, particularly between two sexes. The legislation that has been brought before us is probably at about 7:30 in the morning, or 7:45. It has passed dawn. We have broken through and the light shines, but it is still a little early in the morning. The amendment we propose on this section takes us up to about eleven o'clock. It still isn't high noon. There is quite a bit to go to reach that climacteric.

And then what a legislator has to do is gauge at what time in history there is a consensus. At what time does the largest number in the population—people of goodwill, men and women—feel that a particular recognition of work, dignity and what not, has reached a particular place in the evolutionary cycle. The Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry), and, until recently, myself—not necessarily us personally, but in our assessment of the minds and hearts of the people we represent—have thought how they would react to it. And it is, in my opinion, probably still fairly early in the morning. I haven't changed that view.

On the other hand there are occasions with legislation when we are expected to forge ahead, to be daring, forward, and to give leadership in the particular area and to carry it the extra hour or two forward seems to me beneficial.

I will share with you some of my misgivings about this legislation. One of them has to do with the business community—and by business community, I do not necessarily mean big businessmen at all; quite the contrary. I am thinking of small, single proprietors who run their own business—either male or female. I am thinking of the partnership context, et cetera. I am also thinking of those entrepreneurs, or—even at a step or two down—the fellows who sit all day long, every day of their lives, with their feet up on a spittoon at the various offices of the stock exchange, calculating infinitesimal fractions of shifts in shares. Nevertheless, they have this shareholding. And while it is deferred community property, and they may continue to manipulate or to bargain across the counter as they see fit, on a breakup there is a question of tying of hands, et cetera, a question of disruption in the market. And a disruption with respect to the small variety store on the corner.

Nevertheless, that has been a real problem, and we will admit it is a problem. It has certainly puzzled me. As lawyers, we deal with a large number of small business concerns, sometimes incorporating them, sometimes we even sew up a partnership, depending on the circumstances. And we worry about the consequences—even in economic terms—of the business operation.

But then there are two ways out with respect to this legislation if our section was accepted, one of them being the contract; and it seems to me since the contract notion is enfranchised in this legislation, and since it is an ongoing development, anyhow, in many portions of the western world, we are going to come to the contract very soon as an acceptable, ordinary, commonplace mechanism whereby business operations are carried on.

Let's get to it. It won't upset all the apple carts at the end of the day or even tomorrow morning if we put this through and it will be simply a swift accommodation. It is going to come anyhow. It is going to come within five years, as things stand. That was the basis of my resistance at this particular time, because this is an idea whose time has come. Consider the waits in history with respect to black people, with respect to people who are kept down and in any degree oppressed. There are good things operating in the world too, along with all the melancholy and mischievous things that we encounter more often than we encounter the good in this House. So that's the first device.

The second one is the discretionary formulas written into the legislation. When I say we've come to high noon that would mean that we would have to move in on that discretionary formula to a greater extent than presently. It would have to be restricted, refined and probably more delimited. That would be in the cards. Surely it is not the end of the world if you should see fit to accept that at this eleventh hour?

Another point which is bothering me is the prolongation of this legislation, at least in my experience. I am sure never in this House have we had legislation so long on our plate. Such a meal, you know, does get stale. It does begin to take on some kind of flavour after a while and unless you masticate the object while it is available then you begin to turn it to dog's food.

That's a part of the reason our party on a couple of occasion has qualifiedly accepted this legislation, though some of our members never have. They have at least been consistent in that, and I credit them for it. I mean, they have stood their position throughout. The member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Bounsall), particularly, introduced a bill a long time ago, which I checked out the other day, a private member's bill for doing precisely what we are asking to be done today.

Another reason it bothers me is that when you do look to community law legislation we have been concentrating upon the intricacies, such as they are, of your legislation. Yours is a quite ingenious scheme. I said so at the beginning. It intrigued me. I mean, you jettisoned the Law Reform Commission. You didn't go to the federal Law Reform Commission nostrums, the surveillance of numerous restrictions with all their diverse forms of community property, and there are half a dozen at least of them. You ingeniously trod tippy-toe among the various notions, a little here and a little there, in placing it together in some kind of bouillabaisse that we have stirring before us at the present moment.

In order to work that out, in order to refine that, in order to bring that up to its optimum point has preoccupied all our attention, and it's a regrettable thing in a way that more attention hasn't been paid to what is being proposed to you today. The community property deferred notion that is embodied in this particular amendment hasn't been given the scrutiny by the Attorney General that I am sure it deserves and that I know it hasn't been given by me, and on further thought you see what has happened to the ghostly machine; it got out of the closet.

But I still bother. Take a jurisdiction like California; We have no studies before us from the California jurisdiction, but it's a tripartite type of jurisdiction. There is separate property and both spouses have a community property concept ab initio of the marriage, with the ability to opt out by way of marriage contract—at least over a wide range of things.

From what I've learned, largely from reading Time magazine, as to what happens in a number of situations in the marriage relationship, it frankly bothers me. The only thing I'll say here is this is not that situation. That should be studied in depth to find out what evils it bred, because every system of human devisement breeds some consequences in terms of bedevilment—some ill to some human beings. The whole purpose of law is to have no human being hurt—not a single one. Until we achieve that—

So what do you do? You weigh bedevilments. You say which one has the least harmful consequence? At least that tends to be the negative way the legal profession looks at things. Others may be more blithesome and positive and say, "Oh, look at all the good it's doing." I've never been particularly struck by that as a member of this House. If I'm a philosopher in my own study, I could see benign things happening with human beings, but when I become engaged in these particular things, all the rankles and sores of humanity begin to reek.

So on this particular score, I suspect this legislation may not go through in the form in which we want it. I don't ever stand up in this House when I don't want legislation to go through just as we want it. That's another element of irresponsibility that can be practised on various sides of this House—namely that you know in advance that you'll fail, and therefore proceed to do something which in your heart you really don't desire. You may really desire it or you know it won't yet come to pass.

That's a kind of cushion of the soul. That's not necessary. If that's the position, it's a hypocrisy. Either we want it, and the government should bring it in precisely as it stands, or we should keep our mouths shut. I don't consider this so catastrophic. It's a shift in emphasis rather than a redirection of principle that we're calling for in the legislation before us.

The next point that would bother me is what if the Attorney General acceded to a little pact at 7:30 in the morning, and arrived around 8 o'clock somewhere. Suppose he said, "Fine, I'll go along." He may argue that that would be dislocative of the legislation as it presently stands and that it would require a fairly substantial revamping.

That was a bugbear with me. Here we've got this far. Here we've had these prolonged hearings—a certain weariness assails me at the mere thought of them.

I remember at one time as chairman of that committee—it seems aeons ago now—when I did my level best to get this legislation through before Christmas, if you'll remember. But our attitude at that time—you didn't have to be a genius to know it—was that the prolongation of this thorny kind of problem was to be avoided. Let's have done with it. Let's hit while the iron is hot.

The legislation is admittedly, in my opinion, a considerable advance. It is fairly neutral legislation on top of it. Many law reform commissions have worked it over and they are ostensibly neutral. They haven't got any axes to grind and you are simply the vehicle of that. Therefore, there isn't the partisanship written into it, and so it's advancing legislation. It would have been better than to have this almost arduous, tortuous, labyrinthine pap that we've talked in bringing this into being.

There was no sense fulminating of course, and if I did fulminate at the moment I'd probably enjoy it. But Jeremiah may sit down on his toadstools and weep. He may not even have any friends, so to speak—and Job on his dunghill. But that's okay. Job prevailed, you know. The going back on it is really neither here nor there. Here we are. And since we have come this far and since we have wrangled so much and since we gained so many insights and since we were able to balance off the pros and cons with greater discernment than we started, then let's move in closer to noon. Again, it won't be all that disruptive.

I thought initially that I wouldn't speak on the legislation, for obvious reasons given. But then it struck me that, for what it is worth, my absence might be construed as lending undue support to one side or the other and because in trying to assess the ills and benefits here, I think they overbalance in favour just a bit—but enough—on the side of moving into the area recommended and envisioned by this particular amendment before you. Lump the property, divide it down the middle, subject to those circumstances—and there will be many. I am surprised in a way that such good faith is proposed by the judiciary to be able to discriminate thus nicely and to weigh in an objective and clear fashion the antagonistic interests of the spouse. But it is less discretionary and it is less insidious and less carping than its contrary, because the contrary does involve what my friend said with respect to the Ward-Price gallery inventory of goods that is required all the time ab initio in every case.

The other way of doing it means that a great deal of litigation will be eliminated. The weight will shift the other way and you relieve the courts and relieve married couples of a great deal of contestation and post-marital anguish; and that is really part of our responsibility if we can possibly do it.

I have one final word to say to one of my colleagues about his standard form contracts. I defy him to draw up a standard form contract for the quarrelling spouses. And with that little note, I sit down.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, not only last night but today, I have been invited by the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) to respond to his statement and position which, as always, was a very well-considered position.

I would like to say a small word about some of his remarks because I would not like this House to think that I was responding in any way to flattery. Let me put it this way. I know my friend from Riverdale is not a chauvinist, but sometimes when you put on such flattery to a woman you really are in essence denigrating her.

Mr. Lawlor: Why don't you flatter him for a while? He needs it.

Mrs. Campbell: There is no one in this House who believes—and certainly I don't and I know the member for Riverdale doesn't—that I had such power in this House on this particular amendment.

Mr. Renwick: You're the key to it and you can't deny it.

Mrs. Campbell: He did continue with a request for a very reasoned debate on the matter, taking it out of the barracking, and taking it out of all the partisanship that might be present, and he asked me for a very reasoned response.

He wanted to know if there were any way we could close the gap in our thinking. It is for this reason that I am going to do something I really don't like to do in the House. I'm going to talk, first of all, about discrimination itself because that is the key to the position I take.

I don't know who has been the instigator of some of the material that I've had since I have indicated my position on this section. It's one of those things where it seems to be a buildup of some kind which I don't think is a matter which one normally faces from individuals. The suggestion is—and it's one that is totally abhorrent to me—that because I made it I have no sympathy for other women.

When I look back over my career in the law, I have faced discrimination on a very personal basis, and I want every member in this House to know that when you do face discrimination it is a soul-searing thing. It makes you determined that so far as you can you will spend the rest of your life fighting for the individual, for human rights, and for civil rights because you know that anything less than that is totally unacceptable.

I would like to give some examples and I would like to think that because of people—not me alone, but women like me—things have improved somewhat. Let me take you back, because it's the time to take you back, to a time when you entered the law full of enthusiasm, full of a very real commitment that this is the route to go if you do have a concern for people, to a time when you are a law student, as I was seeking an office in which to article. But I wasn't the child of a lawyer. My mother was a client of the Fasken firm and it was my family firm but that firm at that time was completely disinterested in women in the practice of the law. So you got whatever you could get in order to have an education in the practicalities of the law.

I recall a much publicized incident of June 17, 1937, the day I was called to the bar, the day I was the only woman taking a June call, going into weekly court when the presiding judge asked "the gentlemen" to rise. I had been a gentleman around Osgoode Hall for three years. It didn't offend me at that point to rise with my other gentlemen. But when he continued to say: "I said 'gentlemen' advisedly. I do not approve of women in the practice of the law," it was a very dramatic experience because I had built up with hard work to a point where I thought I had the right.

Mr. Renwick: What was his name, do you remember?

Mrs. Campbell: Yes, I remember. He is still alive and still highly respected. I don't think I should give it but I will give it to you privately.

At that point I wanted to cry out to the Attorney General. I was given some very wise advice by people who were my friends. They said: "Look, the Attorney General will simply laugh it off. He will not do anything about it and you may hurt your career by being a troublemaker at the very beginning of it." So, it went on.

Because I was president of the Women's Law Association I had the right to go to the mid-winter meetings of the Canadian Bar Association. I accompanied Judge Helen Kinnear. We were not quite equal because, while we were permitted to speak, we were not permitted to vote.

One eminent counsel moved at that time a resolution which said that all law students should pay in a mandatory fashion the fees for the Canadian Bar Association as part of their tuition fee. I wasn't very experienced. I got up to support the resolution. Stupidly, I gave my reasons. I didn't know I shouldn't do that. The reason was that I could support this wholeheartedly because, if it were a mandatory, imposed fee, there could no longer be discriminations against women in the profession entering into the full activities of the Canadian Bar Association. I never saw two lawyers act so fast, the mover and the seconder, to withdraw the motion.

Then there was another time when I was asked to speak to the mid-winter meeting in Niagara Falls on the subjects of taxation and support payments. I'm going to tell you I worked hard on it because always women have been under the gun to do better, to work harder to gain the same results. Apparently I did all right, because as a result of that paper the taxation section, together with the accountant, made their submissions to Ottawa and support payments in family court, alimony payments not granted in divorce actions, were finally exempted so that women could get the money that the courts ordered to them.

Following that I had a beautiful letter from the taxation section and it said: "Because of your superb"—and they did overestimate it—"presentation, we are inviting you as our honoured guest to dinner" on such and such a night "at the Lawyers' Club." The letter was addressed to me as "Dear Mr. Baird," and the signals were up, because I knew what Dr. Galbraith has been through and I really didn't want to be humiliated on a public sidewalk. So I phoned and I said: "Are you sure you mean me?" "Well, of course. It's a result of your paper." I said to the young man: "Please check, will you?" I really felt desperately sorry for that young man because he called back and he said: "Oh Miss Baird, it is our loss. Of course, unfortunately you cannot come to the Lawyers' Club." I am saying these things because people believe that this doesn't happen, and it happens today and I am bringing it into the present day.

I met with a woman just the other day, a single head of family, who was deserted 14 years ago, being left with three children. She said: "You know, I just felt I can't do it," and then she came to the view that her children were entitled not to have both parents opt out. She worked, and she's worked hard for 13 years, and she decided it was in the best interests of the family to purchase a home. She was applying for a home buyer grant and was delighted that the government was not making any distinction between her and someone else, but she needed some additional mortgage financing and the first lender she approached said they would give consideration to her application for a mortgage if she would produce two male co-signers. That, of course, she wouldn't accept.

Subsequently there was one who said if she would get her mother to co-sign they would give her the loan. Her mother had no money and no income other than old age pension. The mother was not one who was expected to make any financial contribution. She went to the government and told her story and she said: "I want to buy a house but I want you to know that my mother did own a house," and she put it in writing. She got the grant. Now, of course, she's asked to repay it.

The member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor) has talked about disruption; and this is where I have such honest and sincere problems with this amendment. Surely, after what I have said here today, it is apparent to anyone that, philosophically, I believe this amendment should carry. But I have to place it in the context of our today's society.

I made a mistake the other day, I say to the member for Carleton East (Ms. Gigantes). In giving an example of women entering into a partnership, I mentioned two lawyers because I was so delighted that partnership between women in law is becoming more commonplace. I shouldn't have done that, because to the member for Carleton East I was elitist. I only gave it as an example; I wasn't talking about university people or people who had inherited wealth. I was just using an example.

But let us look at the balance between the story of the single head of family. It is not covered here; that is long past. What frightens me terribly about this amendment is not the amendment itself in any way, shape or form; it is what can happen if women want to establish themselves in business where the prejudice already is there on assisting them financially and when, with this added dimension, they may not be able to establish businesses of their own of what-ever kind.

On top of that, I am worried—and the member for Lakeshore dealt with it, if I may say, from a different point of view; he tended to think we could overcome. But I think of the small businesses in our communities today; I don't think anyone here is in any doubt that many of them are suffering financially and many of them have financial problems. If there were only some way that we could call some kind of a moratorium to give this Act the time to work, so that those in the lending business might not view this as so dangerous that they would call their loan, or that suppliers wouldn't worry so much about calling in their money, I think I could support this amendment, without question, because it is so infinitely a part of what I believe.

I guess I put it badly the other day, because the member for Welland-Thorold (Mr. Swart) thought that when I spoke about the business I felt there was not enough left of the business for the man. It's inconceivable that I should have spoken so badly, to be so misunderstood; my fear is that there just won't be a business for anybody.

I am not worried about the courts in this context, and I agree with my friend the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) that it does improve the context. It gives much better thrust for judges, there isn't any question about that; but what I'm worried about is are we talking about assets that are really academic once this passes.

The member for Riverdale referred to partnership agreements and to corporate bodies and he dismissed those lightly, in my estimation. But as I understand it, perhaps he was more familiar with Brazilian Traction as a corporate customer or client, while I was more familiar with the small artisan who wanted to move out of the employment area and into a partnership. These are not people who could be taken care of out there. They weren't part of the wealthy community, they were simple people wanting to do something about a partnership. If that partnership were in place today and they were still struggling financially, I can't answer for what might happen.

The member for Riverdale spoke about the partnership agreements which provide for widows. I am familiar with that type of agreement, I have drawn many of them. One of the things that I found, and one of the cases that disturbed me mightily, was what happened when the widow became part of the partnership on the death of her husband. It was not a successful experiment. Not because of any lack of talent in her, but because the remaining partner had gone into partnership with a specific person with a specific interest, there was an empathy between them; it just didn't work with the widow as partner.

I have tried desperately to find a way to support this amendment without what I see as a very possible breakdown for both the male and the female in our society. I have suggested my amendment, recognizing as I do that it views the matter from a different point of view. But it does to me give this kind of advantage: It can give a time for the Act to work; it can give a time so that those who are financing various businesses may not be overly alarmed. It does provide for the breakdown and what happens at a breakdown.

I can only say that I have now expressed, as best I know, both my concerns and my very real commitment to equal rights; and my very real and personal concept—not only from my own experience but that of women with whom I am in contact every day—that what you can do in this amendment is to disadvantage not only those who would like to go into business but also those who are in the home and who, by this, may suffer.

The member for Riverdale has suggested that all of these things can be covered by agreement. I would say that in the future that is probably quite true. But the incidence of breakdown of marriage and any effects of that under this Act will take effect for those small businesses as of the date that it comes into operation; and it is quite possible at that time that there is no way to come to agreement.

The member for Riverdale also suggested that only a small percentage of the public has business assets. I know there are a great many in this province who do not have business assets, but there are far more than I think the member for Riverdale indicated in his address.

I want to say that in no sense am I standing here, taking this position, on a partisan basis; in no sense. In no sense am I mouthing anybody's philosophy—except, perhaps, my own—in trying to ensure that women will have the practical, factual protection that you and I want under this bill.

If the member for Riverdale can suggest some solutions by way of amendments to this bill to cover the points which I have raised—and I can't think of them, short of some moratorium—I am certainly prepared to listen to a person whose quality of mind I very deeply respect, as I think all the members of this House do. I can find no alternative, except that which I have proposed, to protect to the best of my ability the very rights that are so personally dear to my heart.

Ms. Gigantes: I would like to add one more comment to this debate as it has proceeded on the amendment that is before the House now. It seems to me, as I reflect on the contributions that have been made to this debate, while it is clear that we may be reaching the point where we are overcoming the feminine mystique, we have a new hurdle to jump, and that's the business mystique.

Mr. Stong: Much of what I have to say with respect to this amendment has already been said by the member for St. George, with whom I fully concur. I will be brief, but I do have some comments to make on this particular amendment. Despite philosophically what is involved, that is equality and the recognition of equality in marriage, with respect to this particular amendment, as the member for Carleton East has just alluded, basically the business mystique is what it is all about.

Mr. Swart: Not all.

Mr. Lawlor: There is a little left over there somewhere.

Mr. Stong: I think we have to remember that the amendment which would include commercial assets acquired during marriage or in contemplation of marriage and which also includes a crude appreciation of all property and assets owned by the spouses prior to the marriage, is very encompassing. This amendment is a two-edged sword. Those in the party to my left who would champion themselves as being the only representatives of women's rights are overlooking one thing, that is that this amendment does not advance women's rights one iota in the business world.

It's tough enough out there in that world for anyone, and a woman particularly, who has accomplished and achieved a professional status, whether it be an engineer, a doctor, a lawyer, a truck driver or a teacher. It is tough for her out in that world and it's tough for her out in that business world to get started. That is where the opposition to this and the problem with this amendment is going to arise.

I suppose really to understand the business world you would have to have been a person who ran his or her own business and had to meet a paycheck every Friday and had to go with your hat in your hand to investors and money lenders to ask for money to get started.

All this amendment is going to do is call upon the ingenuity of the legal profession to concoct contracts to have women opt out or contract out of any rights that they have under the laws which now exist.

I can see bankers or moneylenders saying, "I will lend you the money." But the purpose of lending the money is to make profit down the road, and the way you make a profit in lending money is by keeping your costs down. All we are doing with this amendment is encumbering the business community, which will then have to go to work to draw up contracts to say to a woman or a male who wants to borrow money: "We will not lend it to you because farther down the road we are going to have to face perhaps some problems in a marital contract or some problem arising out of a marital split-up. What we want you to do at this point is enter into this contract which would vitiate this loan for instance in the event of a marriage breakup."

That is not how business can work. It is not how a professional, a woman doctor or a woman who wants to get into business, is going to be able to make it at all. I might say that in speaking to this particular amendment, there are women out there who have had to make it on their own.

I was speaking just the other night to a woman who indicated to me that her husband had been drunk for half his life. He was a taxi driver. She took over the taxi and she drove that taxi. She supported her five children from the proceeds of driving that taxi. She said to me: "If we split up, if there's a division, do I have to give half of what I have earned over these years that I have worked to support my family to him? Do I have to give it up to him?" It's a two-edged sword in business and I think we have to be very careful of where we're going.

Mr. Swart: Do you know what section 4 says?

Mr. Stong: Yes, I support the member for St. George (Mrs. Campbell) in her amendment to section 4 because it recognizes input and value of input, and that's very important in this economic relationship.

Mr. Swart: It's the principle that we're talking about.

Mr. Stong: But not only that, the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) in directing himself the other day to this particular amendment—indicated that if it goes through in its present form—because it deals with talking about the splitting up of assets and the sharing of assets—what about the liabilities that are also incurred with respect to those assets and with respect to that business. Although much has been said, I must say that this amendment in its present form will really be caught and dealt with by the proposed amendment to section 4 by the member for St. George.

Mr. Bounsall: No way.

Mr. Stong: This particular amendment will do nothing for those men or women, partnerships or sole proprietorships, who are trying to make a start in the business world. This is a hindrance and not an advancement of that cause.

Mr. Swart: The principle is equal division of assets.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I'd just like to respond briefly. I must say in all politeness to my friend, the member for York Centre (Mr. Stong), that I regret that he was not in the House last night to have sensed the dynamics of the debate which took place. I think his remarks this morning show an abysmal ignorance of exactly what this Legislature was talking about last night, as well as a selective ignorance of the provisions—

Mr. Kerrio: It's a pity we get the name-calling part of it.

Mr. Renwick: —of the Act as a whole and the express provisions of section 4. I regret having to say that, but I do hope that if and when the member for York Centre has the leisure to do it, he will take the time to read the debate which took place last night, and perhaps at some future time we can have a discussion about the matter.

I do want to say to my friend, the member for St. George, that the remarks I made about her last night were remarks of my esteem for her and I regret if in any way she equated those remarks with flattery. I simply did not intend in any way to flatter.

Mr. Reid: Why not?

Mr. Renwick: I think of all the people that I know, she is one of the people who does not need flattery and she does me a disservice to say that I would have to flatter her.

Mr. Lawlor: She is absolutely unflattering.

Mr. Renwick: My remarks were made out of respect.

Mr. Reid: It's a very fine line.

Mr. Renwick: I listened, as she very kindly did to me last night, with great care to what she said this morning, and I respect and admire the way in which she went about expressing her views about it. I'm sorry that she has come to the decision that her answer must be no and that her caucus will not support the amendment. I regret that very much, because what the member for St. George has unwittingly done is to enshrine judge-made intricacies that the courts had to face in dealing with problems such as those which arose in the Murdoch case. She has placed every single woman in the future who is a Mrs. Murdoch under the obligation to go to court in order to get her fair, equitable share. She starts always as a suppliant, always as a plaintiff, always as an applicant. I'm simply drawing attention to the desperate efforts which the courts took, despite the problems that were faced, to finally work out within the court system a recognition—to come some way into the modern age with respect to the contributions made by women in the marriage relationship. You have said, "We'll call a halt there. We will take no further step. We will not, in this Legislature, do anything at this time but freeze, without any hope of thawing for many years, the result of those cases."

I understand the immense problem involved with women, credit and financial institutions. I have no problem with that. I simply refer again to what I said last night—the only thing that the financial institutions understand is property. I simply fail to understand your logic, reiterated by the member for York Centre, that somehow or other giving women under this Act equal participation in property—that is as a result of a partnership between men and women in marriage while they are residing together—in some way detracts from their capacity to negotiate credit or other assistance from the financial institutions.

I recognize the problem but the problem is an entirely different problem. You misunderstand the system under which we live if you believe for one single moment that to enshrine Murdoch and the subsequent cases into law is in some way a reflection of the modern need. You know as well as I do that one of the major problems the courts have is to adjust to changing conditions. You know as well as I do that they are always behind.

I admire them for having come so far. But to freeze the law of the province in this fashion, so that every woman is a suppliant, every woman is an applicant, every woman is a plaintiff in a court action, in order to get a decision with respect to her property rights, then I say with the greatest respect again, to the member for St. George and to the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry), who is the person I was trying to persuade by transference last night, you do a disservice in the province; you do a disservice because you will not have the intestinal integrity to bring this Act back again.

I would guess the Attorney General and the member for St. George and I will be long gone from here before there is another revision of this concept. It is not something to say, "Let's take this step because we are going to take the next step." We are not going to take a next step. We are going to wait for a long period of time before there is any change.

I had hoped that in the course of this debate we might have found an answer, even if it required a little give on our side, a little give on your side; some way to bridge what appears to me to be such a narrow gap. The member for St. George re-echoed that philosophically she believes in the amendment. This little insurmountable barrier which has been erected in the discussion leads me to believe that we have simply failed, and that failure is a momentous one and is one which we here certainly will regret.

I only wanted to speak very briefly because everything appears to have been said that can be said on this issue. The answer from the member for St. George speaking on behalf of the Liberal caucus is obviously no. They want Murdoch and the subsequent cases of Murdoch. They do not want equality in the law.

Mr. Kerrio: That's the next thing, the shameful NDP conduct in the House and about as responsible.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: That's nonsense. You know it's nonsense.

Mr. Renwick: They want to distort things, as the Attorney General has distorted these matters, by taking the extreme cases, always the extreme; always ignoring that section 4 of the bill provides the court as a method of determining the equity and justice of whether or not a 50-50 sharing of all assets is the fair and proper way. That's what it's about, and section 4 is well drafted.

I would regret we were unable to persuade the House to make the necessary change.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I had not intended to speak again and I'll be very brief. I am certainly not going to attempt to repeat any of the statements made by the member for St. George, because I think her heart-searching eloquence simply cannot be improved upon. I have to say, despite my great respect for and personal affection for the member for Riverdale, I really expected a little better of him in this particular issue.

I hate to drag out those unhappy ghosts of the past, such as the Murdoch case, and suggest to the people of this province that the failure of the member for St. George to support this amendment is somehow supporting the Murdoch concept. I just think with all due respect that is desperately unfair to her and indeed to all of us in this House—

Mr. Swart: But it is right on.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry:—who desperately want the equality of which you speak. With respect, when it comes to the issue of litigation and encouraging litigation, or when as you say the woman must therefore again come to the court as a supplicant, I suggest to you with respect that if you look at some of the comments that have been made by fairly knowledgeable people on this subject, the deferred community of assets system, in my respectful view, has the potential to generate much more litigation than what is proposed under the bill as framed.

The accounting problems are obvious. You talk about Ward-Price type of problems in relation to family assets. Under the deferred community of property regime, the problems and the accounting problems—and we're dealing with all existing marriages—would be horrendous.

There was wide consultation with the people of the province of Ontario. My predecessor travelled widely throughout the province in discussing these issues. Men and women of the province, the overwhelming majority of these people who are interested, made very clear their concerns with respect to this deferred community of property proposal. With respect to this equality, which I know the member for Riverdale and his colleagues seek as we all do, I would ask him with the greatest respect to look at the experience in Quebec and California, for example, where there has been a rigid approach with respect to all non-family assets. The effect of that law has been to make it almost mandatory in every case for couples to enter into marriage contracts with respect to what would in our legislation be non-family assets.

It's the sincere belief of myself and my many very dedicated advisers who have worked so hard in the preparation of this bill, that the deferred community of property proposal as contained in this amendment would invariably lead to less sharing rather than more sharing. I think it's absolutely important that those who misunderstand this legislation look to other jurisdictions for guidance to see what has happened there. This legislation has been very carefully wrought and it is geared to produce—and I sincerely believe this—more sharing than that which is available in other jurisdictions where the more rigid approach has been adopted.

Only experience will tell us whether we are correct in this matter. But I can say, Mr. Chairman, I'm quite confident that experience will satisfy us in the months and years ahead that this legislation, as presently framed, will produce much more sharing between married couples, when there is an unfortunate marriage breakdown, than what has been the experience in other jurisdictions which have adopted the deferred community of property approach.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, in expressing my frustration about my disappointment in the failure of the amendment, I overreacted in remarks which I made about my friend and colleague, the member for York Centre; and I apologize to him for the rather stronger intent of my remarks than I should have allowed myself to express.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I have an amendment by Mr. Bounsall. Mr. Bounsall moves: That clause (b) of section 3 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "Family assets means all property and assets, including commercial assets acquired during the marriage or in contemplation of a marriage, and the accrued appreciation of all property and assets owned by the spouses prior to the marriage; but does not include any damage award, insurance claim, insurance benefit, gift, inheritance or trust benefit conferred upon a spouse with the express or implied intention of benefiting that spouse exclusively or the accrued appreciation of same."

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Shall this vote be stacked?

Some hon. members: No.

The committee divided on Ms. Gigantes' motion that clause (f) of section 1 of the bill be amended by adding thereto the subclause, "(iv) is a widower or widow," which was negated on the following vote.

Ayes 20; nays 54.

Section 1 agreed to.

The committee divided on Mr. Bounsall's amendment to clause (b) of section 3 of the bill, which was negated on the same vote.

Section 3 agreed to.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

ESTIMATES

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I have a message from the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor signed by her own hand.

Mr. Speaker: By her own hand, Pauline M. McGibbon, the Lieutenant Governor, transmits estimates of certain sums required for the services of the province for the year ending March 31, 1979, and recommends them to the Legislative Assembly, Toronto, March 13, 1978.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members, today, the second Monday in March has been set aside throughout the Commonwealth as a day to be known as Commonwealth Day, on which member nations draw attention to this unique world organization of which Canada is an active member.

As members are no doubt aware, the Commonwealth consists of one-quarter of the people of this earth, and one-half of the poor people of the world are members of the Commonwealth. I am sure all members will agree with me that at a time when we as Canadians tend to look inward it is useful to recall our international commitments, not only in the governmental organizations of the Commonwealth but in the important non-governmental organizations such as the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. This year, of course, the Commonwealth Games will be held in Edmonton which will no doubt strengthen Commonwealth ties and the appreciation of Commonwealth relationships in Canada.

On the occasion of Commonwealth Day we have in the Speaker's gallery today the consular representatives in Toronto of nine members of the Commonwealth. These distinguished members are: from Australia, Mr. Llewellyn Martin; from Barbados, Mr. Stanton Carter; from Britain, Mr. F. S. Fielding; from Guyana, Mr. E. V. Persaud; from India, Mr. M. L. Suri; from Malaysia, Mr. N. Sivaraajah; from Malta, Mr. John Pisani; from New Zealand, Mr. P. L. Harland, and from Trinidad and Tobago, Mr. Calvin Smith. I am sure all members will wish to welcome them on this occasion.

OPP ROLE IN STRIKE

Hon. Mr. Kerr: On a point of privilege in connection with the point of privilege raised last Friday by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Deans): When I answered the hon. member's question in the Legislature last Thursday I did not recall using the expression to a radio reporter, "only half the workers at the plant want the union." I have since had the opportunity personally to listen to a tape of my interview with the reporter outside the cabinet office and there is no question that I did use that phrase.

Mr. Nixon: You misspoke.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, I apologize if I inadvertently or incorrectly advised the Legislature last week on this point.

As far as the second point raised by the hon. member is concerned, I refer him again to my statement in the Legislature last Thursday afternoon when I said the decision to inform workers of their rights and responsibilities during a strike was made by the local OPP detachment commander, Sergeant Roy Glover. It may well be true that the local plant manager made this request to officers who visited his plant on the morning of March 3, but the important thing is that the decision was made independently later that same day by Sergeant Glover. There is nothing in my answers to the hon. member for Wentworth—

Mr. Cassidy: What?

Hon. Mr. Kerr:—which he quoted last Friday which conflicts with my Thursday statement.

Mr. Davidson: Who are you trying to kid?

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Speaker: On Thursday last, March 9, the member for Scarborough-Ellesmere (Mr. Warner), on what he considered a point of privilege, asked me to rule that the OHIP premiums are, in fact, a tax, and that any increase therein would require legislation and the appropriate message from Her Honour, the Lieutenant Governor. He referred to section 54 of the British North America Act and standing order 86 of this House, and on Friday, March 10, he added a citation from the Magna Carta.

Mr. Makarchuk: Good document.

Mr. Speaker: I must first refer you to the Health Services Insurance Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1970, chapter 200, section 32, clause (e), which provides that the Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations "prescribing the amounts of premium payable for a single insured person, an insured person and one dependant and an insured person and two or more dependants and governing the time and manner of payment."

What the member is, in fact, doing is asking me to rule on the legality or constitutionality of legislation passed by this House. I must inform the House that this question is beyond my jurisdiction. I quote from a ruling delivered by Mr. Speaker Cass on January 27, 1969, as follows: "There have been numerous decisions by former Speakers, the most recent being that of Mr. Speaker Stewart on April 4, 1944, to the effect that it is not within the Speaker's responsibilities or powers to give an opinion on the legality or constitutionality of any legislation introduced in the House."

As mentioned, the matter raised by the member pertains to the legality or constitutionality of a statute. As such, it obviously is not a matter affecting the special privileges which the House and the members thereof enjoy, and I must, therefore, consider it desirable to point this out to the House. In other words, the hon. member for Scarborough-Ellesmere did not, in fact, have a valid point of privilege.

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, on a matter of principle—

Mr. Breithaupt: I think he should resign.

Some hon. members: Resign.

Mr. Warner: If you've got a better offer.

Mr. Ruston: Resign.

Mr. Warner: Do I hear shouts of a better offer over there?

An hon. member: We're going over our reports.

An hon. member: Back to school.

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, I firmly maintain that some of my privileges and, consequently, those of—

Mr. Speaker: You can't debate the ruling.

Mr. Warner: This is on a different matter, a different point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: You can't debate the ruling. You can challenge it, if you wish.

Mr. Warner: I'm not debating your ruling, Mr. Speaker, nor am I challenging the ruling.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Then sit down. You can't make a speech.

Mr. Warner: I appreciate your effort. What I have is a point of privilege under section 42 of the standing orders. I maintain that the privileges both of myself as a member and of my constituents have been removed by the action of this government. No taxation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is ample opportunity for you to raise that during the estimates, or during the budget debate. You can do it by way of a question. If you're not satisfied with a question, you may have recourse to the late show, but you cannot question the ruling of the Chair, which includes the standing orders.

Mr. Warner: May I raise the matter then by way of introducing a bill this afternoon following question period?

Mr. Speaker: That's your choice.

Mr. Warner: That's what I shall do.

Mr. Makarchuk: We're one step ahead of you.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

ALGONQUIN PARK

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to announce that a significant step—

Mr. Wildman: Is this a policy statement?

Hon. F. S. Miller: —to protect the environment of the interior of Algonquin Park will be taken when the regulations under the Provincial Parks Act are amended to require that after April 1, 1978, only burnable food and drink containers may be taken into the interior of Algonquin Park by canoe trippers and hikers. These restrictions follow the successful experiment introduced last year in Quetico Provincial Park. The results were all positive. Litter was considerably reduced, the quality of the environment was improved and the subsequent cost of garbage removal was materially lowered.

This significant environmental decision is aimed primarily at reducing the volume of garbage in Algonquin Park. The majority of abandoned materials are in the form of disposable food and beverage cans and bottles which decompose either very slowly or not at all resulting in degradation of values and in a decline in the recreational quality of one of Canada's best-known parks. Obviously, this accumulation spoils the scenic and recreational value of remote areas in Algonquin Park for everyone. We have taken this positive action to prevent it.

Since its inception, Algonquin Park has provided thousands of visitors with some of the best wilderness canoeing opportunities available in Ontario. The provision of this high-quality wilderness experience has been threatened by the serious litter problem, requiring expensive cleanup programs. The ban was proposed by a number of individuals and organizations, including the Algonquin advisory committee, and has had wide public support. The results of a questionnaire survey showed that a majority of the interior visitors favoured such a ban. The Ontario Parks Council has also recommended its implementation.

I should point out that the forthcoming ban will not apply to the organized campgrounds where special arrangements are made for garbage collection and disposal. These are primarily along the Highway 60 corridor. This restriction is another step in the implementation of the master plan for Algonquin Park which is designed to ensure that interior camping areas remain unimpaired for future use and enjoyment.

HIRING OF 18-YEAR-OLDS

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention—by the Minister of Natural Resources, as a matter of fact—that there is some concern among resort and tourist operations, for example, that people of 18 will not be allowed to work in licensed establishments if the amendments to the liquor regulations raise the legal drinking age.

The question is particularly topical now because hiring decisions for summer jobs are being made in many sectors of the hospitality industry. I want to quell any doubts, by giving my assurance that whatever the government ultimately decides the legal drinking age should be, 18-year-olds will, nonetheless, continue to be permitted to work in licensed premises.

Mr. S. Smith: The Legislature decides, not the government, may I remind you.

AUTO ACCIDENT BENEFITS

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I have a second statement. I would like to announce today that we are amending the regulations under the Insurance Act to improve automobile insurance accident benefits.

Mr. Laughren: Haven't we got insurance, Larry?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No-fault accident benefits, being paid at the present time, were introduced more than six years ago by this government; in January 1972, to be specific.

An hon. member: How about lowering the rates?

An hon. member: When is the minister going to listen to the consumer?

Mr. Cassidy: The minister is more right-wing than Sterling Lyon.

Mr. Swart: The government's 25 years behind the times.

An hon. member: Why doesn't the minister do what the consultants told him?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I don't think I need to go into any great detail on what inflation has done to the level of 1972 benefits in terms of 1978 dollars. Quite simply, the current benefit level is pitifully inadequate. What we are doing today is to make it contemporary.

To provide just a little background, the provision of these benefits is mandatory and must be included in every contract of third party liability insurance sold in this province. The benefits allow every insured person, including dependants and pedestrians hit by an insured automobile, to have immediate recourse to fixed payments by reason of death or loss of earnings. This eliminates the need to go to court to establish fault, and any amounts recoverable on a fault basis, on either court judgement or settlement are reduced by the accident benefits paid or payable.

The select committee on company law has recommended a doubling of death benefit and loss-of-earning benefit. To this we have added certain other changes based on the experience gathered in working with the provisions. We are today, therefore, announcing the following major benefit increases:

Firstly, increase of medical and rehabilitation benefits in excess of OHIP and other expenses within the new Health Insurance Act from $5,000 to $25,000. Chiropractic expenses, which were formerly not covered, are included in the package.

Secondly, death benefit of the head of the household and his or her spouse is increased from $5,000 and $2,500 respectively, to $10,000.

Thirdly, death benefits for all children under 21 are increased to $2,000. Previously, it was $500 for children under five, and $1,000 for children between the ages of five and 21.

Fourthly, funeral expense benefits are increased to $1,000 from $500.

Fifthly, the maximum payable for loss of earnings has been doubled from $70 to $140 per week.

Mr. McClellan: Why won't you raise the compensation rates the same way?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The regulation is in keeping with the provisions of the Family Law Reform Act in that it incorporates a new definition of spouse. As a result, there are benefits for the partners in a common law relationship of five years' duration or in a relationship of some permanence, regardless of the length of time, where there is a natural child.

A very important part of the regulation changes the concept of "whole and continuous disability" to add a provision which entitles an individual who has consented to return to work and who has suffered a relapse within 30 days, to a resumption of benefits. This will encourage members of the labour force to attempt to resume work without penalizing them if it is then discovered that the attempt was premature. This regulation will come into force July 1 of this year to give the insurance industry sufficient lead time to revise forms and re-program computers. I might add that the much-needed revision of this regulation followed extensive dialogue in consultation with members of the industry.

The no-fault benefits were introduced in 1972 by this government to eliminate financial hardship for those involved in automobile accidents in the interim period while the insurance companies and the courts wrangled over whose insurers should pay. It was a concept which worked, but it can only continue to work if the benefits reflect 1978 costs.

The government feels this is a progressive amendment which will help alleviate the hardship suffered by those consumers unfortunate enough to be involved in an accident.

ORAL QUESTIONS

AUTO PACT

Mr. S. Smith: A question for the Premier, Mr. Speaker: In view of the somewhat over 12,000 unemployed in the city of Windsor, and in view of his interest and ours in ensuring a more equal balance in the auto trade agreements with the United States, can the Premier tell the House if he has been informed by Chrysler concerning any possible plans they may have with regard to the pickup truck assembly plant—the one at Tecumseh and McDougall? Has the Premier been informed as to any plans they might have to move that plant out of Canada into the United States? Could he report to this House on that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have had no information of that kind. I will check it out for the Leader of the Opposition, but there's been no information of that nature brought to my attention.

Mr. S. Smith: I'm pleased to hear that. By way of supplementary may I ask the Premier to give some consideration to a letter addressed to him, which is probably in his office, from the president of Local 444 of UAW? And will the Premier speak to Chrysler and make a full report to this House? Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Makarchuk: Supplementary: In view of the fact that the whole matter of auto parts and auto manufacturing is one of concern between both the provincial and the federal governments, is the Premier prepared to call either a press conference or some kind of a public gathering where he can state Ontario's case? The members of the federal government who are responsible for this particular sector of our manufacturing economy could also state their case, and the Premier would be able to tell them to get off whatever they are doing and insist that we get our rights and our proper share of the manufacturing in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, this point has already been made to the government of Canada. I believe they're aware of it. I don't know what purpose would be served in having a press conference. They have all the figures and they have the views of the government of this province that have been stated both privately and publicly.

Mr. Makarchuk: I think the people of Ontario would want to know what you are all about.

Mr. B. Newman: A supplementary to the Premier: During his discussions with Chrysler concerning the potential phasing out or closing down of the pickup line assembly plant, will he use his powers of persuasion, if the Chrysler officials decide on closing that plant, to keep it open as long as possible and/or substitute some other operation in that plant so the work force in the city of Windsor can remain at Chrysler as it is today?

Hon. Mr. Davis: It has always been the approach of myself and the government—the ministers—to do their best to ensure employment opportunities whether they be in Windsor or even in Brampton.

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Premier: I would like to ask the Premier, in view of the fact it was mentioned in the Throne Speech that it was felt something had to be done with the auto pact, what specific new initiatives is this government prepared to take to see that the auto pact begins to work and a balance begins to exist, so that cities like Windsor do not have to put up with 11.4 per cent unemployment any longer?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I will send to the hon. member for his reading, the presentations made to the government of Canada on this issue. I think they lay it out fairly clearly and I will send him a copy of that.

Mr. Cooke: I said "new initiatives."

Mr. S. Smith: I'll have copies of that. I think it would be a good idea.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, I have got a lot of stuff I want to send you.

Mr. S. Smith: Send it along, send it along. It's better than the usual secrecy anyway.

FRENCH-LANGUAGE SERVICES

Mr. S. Smith: A second question to the Premier on a different topic: Since the Premier believes, as we all do, that we must "reduce factional sentiments in our society"—I am referring to his speech at Bucknell University on Friday—does he not agree that an all-party committee of the Legislature to review and report on the state of French-language programs and services in Ontario would be the first step to finding, as the Premier put it, "reasonable accommodation to situations our forefathers were perhaps not as prepared to discuss"? Is the Premier now prepared to establish such a committee, as I have asked him to do?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I appreciate the suggestion from the Leader of the Opposition. I'm delighted to see he read that small excerpt in the Globe and Mail from my rather lengthy lecture to the students and faculty of Bucknell University which is in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania.

Mr. S. Smith: I wouldn't have missed it.

Mr. Lewis: Maybe the Premier should circulate that as well.

Hon. Mr. Davis: If the member will read it, I'll circulate it. It's really one of the better lectures that have been given.

Mr. Martel: That doesn't say much for the quality of the lectures.

Mr. Makarchuk: The Treasurer circulates his speeches. Why can't the Premier?

Hon. Mr. Davis: As I say, it's one of the better ones. I can only make a judgement because it's the first one I've heard of that particular lecture series.

Mr. Lewis: You mean given by you.

Mr. Laughren: Modesty might become you.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, at that particular university because I've not attended that university.

Mr. Cassidy: I am reconsidering the idea the Premier should leave politics for academic life.

Hon. Mr. Davis: There was no degree. I was there on a working mission.

Mr. Cunningham: There was not even a football team there?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Bucknell is not in that; they play basketball very well.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was interrupted, Mr. Speaker.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Actually, in my observations, I was talking about factual or regional differences in a Canadian perspective. Perhaps when the Leader of the Opposition reads that lecture very carefully, he will understand what it was I was attempting to say.

Mr. Samis: I doubt it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: While I appreciate the constructive suggestion as to the possible establishment of a select committee, I really think the best way for this to be discussed and debated is here in the Legislature. I haven't a closed mind on any subject. I told the Leader of the Opposition when he mentioned this to me a few days ago that I didn't have a closed mind on it. But I think for an analysis of our existing programs and some greater awareness and understanding of them, perhaps some discussion here in the House might be a better route to go. However, I haven't said: "No. We will never have a select committee." If he is asking me whether at 2:15 this particular afternoon we are ready to appoint a select committee, the answer to that would have to be no.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of a supplementary, while I appreciate that the Premier did tell me that the other day, could I ask him, first of all, if he will ask his House leader to find a day for a special debate on this very matter, as he suggests? Secondly, since he says his mind is not closed to the idea of a select committee, could he, in thinking about that, recall that the main purpose of such a committee would be to depoliticize and take out some of the partisan aspects of what is potentially a very divisive topic but which could be a very useful topic for the future of our country and our province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I'm delighted to sense that the Leader of the Opposition is aware of it being potentially divisive, if that is the right way to pronounce it. I think some discussion in this House perhaps after the recess might be appropriate. I have always attempted to depoliticize this issue.

Mr. Martel: Yes, that was obvious last July.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It became somewhat politicized with the intervention of some of the Leader of the Opposition's close associates in the government of Canada who were politicizing it here for the people of this province, which I thought was unfortunate and which prompted a reply from the Premier of this province to inform these gentlemen that they were not adding anything of a constructive nature in terms of the current discussion. If the Leader of the Opposition is saying let's depoliticize it, I can only assure the Leader of the Opposition that it has never been my intent to politicize it.

Mr. Samis: Can I ask the Premier if he is concerned about an increase in backlash in this province against minority rights, and as Premier, in the interests of national unity, what is he doing to challenge and confront such a backlash?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The hon. member may be more aware of a backlash than I am. I can only give him my own personal observations and they are not totally representative. I haven't talked to large numbers of people, although in just about every gathering in some casual conversation this matter is discussed. I still sense a very genuine feeling in this province on the part of the people with respect to the language rights of the Franco-Ontarians.

I recognize there are always exceptions to this. It's fair to state that, contrary to the policy of the member's party, there is fairly general support for the present position of the government in what we have been attempting to do, with, I think, some measure of success. I question whether there is this backlash. The hon. member may feel there is.

[2:30]

Mr. Samis: You mentioned it in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I did not mention it in Montreal. I was asked a specific question, "Was there...?" and I said there could be. I did not say there was, and I think any accurate reading—

Mr. Samis: You are splitting hairs again.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —of what was said will show that, because I am very careful what I say on that particular topic.

Hon. Mr. Welch: There's an important distinction.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, ignoring the Leader of the Opposition's efforts to depoliticize every issue in this province, I would like to ask the Premier this question: In view of the mounting crescendo of public opposition to the OHIP premiums increase as announced in the budget, is the government prepared to reconsider its position and to maintain OHIP premiums at or below the levels which existed before last week's budget?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the leader of the New Democratic Party wants to politicize everything in sight. That's part of our process. I don't quarrel with that, but I would say the answer to that question at this moment, of course, is no.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: With the growing amount of public opposition to premium increases, will the Premier not take the initiative and bring this issue to the Legislature by means of resolution or by means of legislation in order to submit his government's plans to debate in this House to be followed by a vote?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, these matters are always contentious. They are always difficult. It is not easy for government in its assessment of the situation in this province to make decisions with which everybody is going to agree, but to ask for a specific resolution, I think the leader of the New Democratic Party knows full well the process in this House. I fully expect from what I have read that in his contribution tomorrow afternoon he will introduce a motion of less than confidence—

Mr. Martel: What else do you expect?

Hon. Mr. Davis: —and that is the process that I think should be followed. The avenue for members to make their views known and to offer constructive suggestions to us is open to us in the budget debate, but the leader of the New Democratic Party can, tomorrow at about 3:15, take whatever steps he may feel he wants to take, although I would just urge him in advance to take a look at the total economic situation, take a look at the total health costs, ask himself in terms of being responsible what other—

Ms. Gigantes: Soak the poor.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —opportunities are there in terms of government administration and policy—

Mr. Swart: All your policies are reason for no-confidence.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —and sort of put that into the mix. I know his answer is very simple, tax the corporations out of existence so we don't have any tax base—

Mr. Martel: He didn't say that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —on which to fund the economic and social policies of this province.

Mr. Makarchuk: Six other provinces do not charge for OHIP.

Mr. S. Smith: Since, as the Premier knows, our concern on this matter is one that we feel ought to be dealt with in the social development committee, where we hope that alternatives—

Mr. Cassidy: Going to depoliticize it, eh?

Mr. Lewis: What a copout that is.

Mr. S. Smith: —can be put forward by all parties, since it's easy enough to criticize but not as easy to present alternatives—

Mr. Martel: There is Xaviera Hollander again. Another position.

Mr. S. Smith: —will we have the assurance of the Premier that we are going to have the co-operation of the government in our search for the various possible alternatives, that all studies done by the Ministry of Health and by the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) will be made available to that committee for use and that the results of that committee will, in fact, be taken very seriously by the Premier?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I take the results of every select committee of this House seriously. I took the results of the Hydro select committee very seriously in terms of a certain issue.

Mr. Lewis: Right. Got you off the hook.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I waited, and in that I didn't get any, shall we say, constructive alternative, then the government obviously had to make that decision. I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that I think the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) is prepared almost literally to inundate the committee in terms of material, statistical information et cetera, and I can assure him that in terms of the functioning of the committee it will not be short of any co-operation from the government.

Mr. Lewis: It's like a godsend to you to have a Liberal Party to shore you up.

Mr. Martel: They help you, don't they?

Mr. Cassidy: In view of the fact that the amendments to the budget and the budget itself will not be voted upon until December, and in view of the fact that the cabinet has already acted by order in council concerning this premium increase, does the Premier not agree that it is contrary to the principles of parliamentary democracy to impose a tax increase without legislation from this House and does he not agree that there should be no taxation without legislation which is passed before May 1?

Mr. Martel: Fought a couple of wars over that, didn't they, Bill?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would only remind the leader of the New Democratic Party of the ruling that you made earlier this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I think that really is an answer in itself.

Interjections.

Mr. Warner: A supplementary question to the Premier: Noting that at least one of his cabinet colleagues has publicly disavowed any responsibility for the budget—and there are probably others—

Mr. Lewis: At Hy's steak house, no less.

Mr. Warner: —could he please explain why he has rejected the democratic principle of no taxation without legislation?

Mr. Eaton: Have you ever heard of paying fees for service?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This government has never rejected any tradition or principle of the parliamentary process. The process is totally understood, I think some days, even by the hon. member who asked the question.

Mr. Speaker: A new question?

Mr. Cassidy: Final supplementary, Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the Premier has already rejected any action arising out of this legislative committee, does the Premier not understand that the opposition to these OHIP premium increases among the public of Ontario is real and that this is not sabre-rattling on the part of the New Democratic Party of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Since the new leader assumed office, I can never distinguish between real problems and sabre-rattling, because he rattles his sabre—if I may use that terminology—at every opportunity he gets.

Mr. Martel: That's a great answer. You just ignored the question—

Mr. Cassidy: The people of the province will judge that, not just this Legislature.

Mr. Eaton: You blew it again, Mike.

Mr. McClellan: What is your position today?

Mr. Martel: It's a new position, isn't it? Xaviera Hollander would be envious of you.

Mr. Hodgson: Show some respect, Elie; you're a House leader now.

FLECK MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have a new question for the Solicitor General. Does the Solicitor General have any comment on the affidavit he received today concerning what has been happening at Fleck Manufacturing Company in Centralia, particularly in view of the apparent contradictions between it and his earlier statements, and especially the fact that the police were apparently involved at least two weeks before the minister had previously admitted?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, I have had a chance to read the letter which accompanied the affidavit. I really haven't had a chance to look at the affidavit; it was handed to me just a few minutes before two o'clock. However, the letter refers to the affidavit and makes certain allegations. I intend to look into them.

Mr. Mackenzie: Supplementary: If indeed the information is verified, that the police were in that plant at least two weeks prior to what we have been told to date and discussing the strike situation with management and employees, and in view of the comments that were in Saturday's Toronto Globe and Mail made by Sergeant Glover of the Exeter detachment of the OPP, who said, "There is no doubt that barring the individual in question from the strike site has its effects; this does the job," would the minister not take a look at some other form of investigation, rather than having the OPP investigate their own complicity in this situation?

Mr. Martel: That is like putting Dracula in charge of the blood bank.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: There was a visit by a police officer to the plant, I believe in late January or early February, in respect to another investigation. I understand it was in respect to a criminal investigation and not in respect to the present dispute at the company between labour and management. As far as the report in the newspaper is concerned, I will look into that. I didn't see that particular quote.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary; the member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Mackenzie: Would the minister then comment or also check into the statement in the affidavit as to whether it was a criminal investigation some two weeks prior? As to the comment made in that affidavit, Mr.

Turner approached me and said that Constable MacIntyre would be on the picket line the first morning of the strike. Further, in checking that, would the minister also find out if, just before a previous attempt to organize this plant, some eight or nine months prior to this successful organizing drive, the Ontario Provincial Police were also in the plant, discussing with management and the employees the effects of a union in that plant?

Mr. Warner: Shameful. Union-busting.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I will look into those matters.

Mr. Martel: I think you should fire a few people.

Mr. Riddell: This is a new question to the Premier on a topic related to the Fleck Manufacturing Company strike. As a prelude to my question, I might say that I spent two hours this morning talking to the workers in the plant, to the workers outside the plant and to the management—

An hon. member: Too little too late.

Mr. Speaker: Question?

Mr. Riddell:—and it appears that considerable headlines were made last week arising from questions put by the NDP, information which was in a large part erroneous—

Ms. Gigantes: Question?

Mr. Speaker: Question?

Mr. Riddell:—accusations which were false and allegations which were unfounded.

An hon. member: Where were you last week?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That's not a question; that's a statement.

Mr. Riddell: In the interest of de-escalating—

Mr. Deans: In whose opinion?

Mr. Riddell: In my opinion, after talking to the workers—

Mr. Deans: After management put the words in your mouth.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Riddell: After I talked to the workers. Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member doesn't wish to pose a question, I can recognize someone else.

Mr. Riddell: I'll pose my question, but I'm getting a lot of flak, Mr. Speaker.

Interjections.

Mr. Laughren: Fleck, it's called—not flak.

Mr. Davidson: You're getting a lot of Fleck.

Mr. Riddell: In the interest of de-escalating an explosive situation—

Mr. Lewis: What do you mean, explosive?

Mr. Riddell:—explosive from the standpoint that there are supposed to be 1,300 shift workers coming from Talbotville—

Mr. Lewis: Oh, I see.

Mr. Riddell:—will the Premier review and report to the House on the situation at Centralia concerning the Fleck Manufacturing Company so that the facts may be known? I refer specifically to what the police said to the workers before the strike began and how the police, strikers and workers have conducted themselves—

Mr. Deans: Welcome aboard.

Mr. Martel: You know they always are in every strike—the police.

Mr. Riddell:—since the strike occurred. Will the Premier undertake to ascertain the facts and report to the House? In that connection, will the Premier also undertake to table the documentation concerning the application, consideration and terms of the lease which Fleck Manufacturing Company holds at Huron Industrial Park with the Ontario Development Corporation?

Mr. Lewis: We're not as nasty as you are, my friend. Not as insidious.

Mr. S. Smith: Don't put on that kind of attitude—holier than thou. That's why you are the third party.

Mr. Lewis: Well, come on. You open up by asking falderal and then you get to what you really want. You never change.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Kerrio: Hang up your skates, Stephen, you're done. Put your stick away.

Mr. Deans: We at least ask about things that are immediate and relevant.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I'm tempted to ask the hon. member if he would repeat his question, but—

Mr. Riddell: He'd be glad to.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It was the preamble before that I'm sure he wanted to repeat. I must say he looks very healthy—I welcome him back. Nice to have him here.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Riddell: Point of privilege—after a very heavy two months on legislative business I was just giving nature a chance to get ready for another year of dedicated service.

Mr. Deans: That's as much hogwash as the first piece.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

An. hon. member: The Premier has a tan.

Mr. Speaker: I don't think the Premier or any other member of the House is too concerned about the degree of tan that the hon. member is sporting.

An hon. member: He asked about it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Nor are we interested in the health of his body, for that matter, but—

Mr. Reid: We know the health of his mind—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, it's his mind that we worry about.

Mr. Reid: Looks like a terminal case.

Hon. Mr. Davis: In answer to the first part of the question, I think really the Minister of Labour (B. Stephenson) has dealt with some of the matters raised, but I will alert her—

Mr. Laughren: That's what bothers you.

Hon. Mr. Davis:—as to the specifics of the question the hon. member asked and will ask her to make a report to the House.

With respect to the second part of the question, I will ask the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) to table whatever documentation there is, which I think is pretty close to what has already been reported in the press. But if the hon. member hasn't had a chance to read that, the lease, I'm sure, will be readily available.

Mr. Martel: They're scandalmongers.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Listen, your own leader didn't cover himself with glory, either.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Welland-Thorold.

Mr. Martel: No, no. I read what he said.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member for Sudbury East allow his colleague to ask a question?

Mr. Martel: I am having a discussion with the Premier.

PAYMENTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Swart: Will the Treasurer recall that according to his own figures the province one year ago had a net balance owing to municipalities of $18 million? Will he recall that through his unilateral change of the Edmonton commitment, making it retroactive for a period of four years, and that in September that $18 million owing was changed to $298 million owing by the municipalities to the province, and that he now claims in a new budget that he has overpaid municipalities by $444 million? Because he has now unilaterally, without any notice to municipalities, assessed new costs against municipalities in the amount of tens of millions of dollars for OHIP premiums and for licences and for taxes, will he give this House and the municipalities an assurance that he will not recover by way of reduced transfers the $444 million which the Treasurer says the municipalities owe the government, either next year or in the future?

Mr. Warner: Fiscal finagling.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I thought the member would draw attention to the chart which shows that after five years we have delivered some $13.581 billion to the municipalities out of a commitment of $13.583 billion—which indicates that we are only, after five years, $2 million short. I thought the member was standing up to commend us on that today, and I am a little surprised he didn't.

Elsewhere in the budget the member will find some reference to the fact that we hope to get along with market value assessment, with property tax reform—

Mr. Martel: Another 10 years.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—that there will be discussions about grant reform and we will move on from there to a redefinition of the commitment. Therefore it would be premature of me to answer that question today.

Mr. Warner: You fiscally fiddle while the province burns.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, Scarborough is in pretty good shape.

Mr. Swart: By way of supplementary: You didn't answer that question, but may I ask the Treasurer if he will not, in the coming year, transfer to municipalities an offsetting amount equal to the new taxes that he unilaterally levied against them this year? Is he not aware, because he hasn't increased the property tax credit, that the property tax increases, like OHIP premiums, hit the modest- and low-income taxpayers the hardest?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I find it hard to believe that OHIP premiums hit the lowest-income people hardest, inasmuch as most of them are exempt.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Some 1,820,000 in this province will not pay the premiums.

Mr. Makarchuk: There is a difference between the pensioner and the low-income person.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I recognize the member will pay and that I will, but 1,820,000 people will not pay the premiums in this province.

Mr. Swart: How about those who make $7,000 a year?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Beyond that I am not aware of where we have hit municipalities. And no, I don't intend to go back and redistribute the amount of money which was determined back in September. I can't think of anything more upsetting. We make our announcements in September, and within a few millions of dollars those are the amounts of money which are delivered to the municipalities, which they have been counting on since January 1. No, we will not be going back.

Mrs. Campbell: Are you sure it isn't a question?

MINI-SKOOLES LIMITED

Hon. Mr. Norton: I would like to respond to the questions raised by the hon. member for Bellwoods (Mr. McClellan) in the House on Thursday last. I would have responded on Friday, but I delayed one day in order to clarify my position through my legal staff with respect to an injunction which I understood had been issued relating to the documents which had been passed to me by the hon. member. Having received an opinion from our legal staff, I will respond to the questions.

The first question raised by the hon. member was whether or not it was true that Metro awards agreements without proper financial submission or adequate accounting. Requirements for submission of budget and financial information prior to negotiating a purchase-of-service agreement with privately operated nurseries are established by the municipalities in question. Metro social services has set up its own criteria in such matters.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services does not review these procedures and does not participate in the negotiations concerning the agreements. The municipalities submit proposed per diem rates to the ministry and a proposed budget for purchase of service. We review the Metro social services budget and approve both the per diem rates and the total net municipal expenditures.

We are satisfied that the rate proposed by the Metro social services in 1977 for its purchase of service with Mini-Skools is competitive. This rate was compared with those for other nurseries. The proposed per diem for 1977 for Mini-Skools was $10.57 in each of the six nurseries. We understand that the per diem rate will now be reduced to $10.17 for all Mini-Skool nurseries as a result of the experience over the past year.

The $10.57 was not the highest per diem rate for a private nursery in the budget submitted to us by Metro social services. It also compared very favourably with the per diem of $15.92 in Metro-operated day nurseries.

We are pleased that the actual per diem is coming in at a lower level than was originally proposed. Once a month Metro social services inspects the accounts submitted to it under purchase-of-service agreements to establish the validity of the accounts. Each nursery is checked once a month to reconcile the attendance of each subsidized child with the amount being claimed on his behalf.

This is one of the most intensive municipal audits of purchase-of-service accounts in the province. In addition, the ministry employs claims examiners to review the same account on behalf of the province and because of the intensity of the scrutiny by Metro social services it is very rare that any adjustment is necessary in those accounts.

The second question raised by the hon. member related to the issue of whether or not subsidy payments without a signed contract are legal under the Day Nurseries Act. Metro social services have signed agreements for 1976 with Mini-Skools covering purchase of service. There is no requirement in the Day Nurseries Act that purchase-of-service agreements be in writing, although we do by policy require them to be in writing. Metro social services have negotiated a new agreement for 1977 and we are advised that it was almost finalized and would have been signed except that they now wish to wait until the questions which have been raised have been settled.

In the fall of 1976 Metro social services requested budget information from Mini-Skools in connection with the renewal of the purchase-of-service agreement. In 1976 Mini-Skools had not submitted such information and it was decided that no agreement would be signed for 1977 until this was received. It was finally received in December 1977 and the agreement negotiated for a per diem of $10.17, as opposed to the higher figure earlier in the year. This rate has not yet been paid by Metro social services to Mini-Skools. Provincial subsidies are still based on 1976 rates.

We have a legal opinion that the arrangements for 1977 can be construed as an extension of the previous agreement and on this basis subsidies have been paid by the ministry to Metro for 1977 based on the conditions which pertained in 1976.

The next inquiry was whether the profits of Mini-Skools are a ripoff. The Ministry of Community and Social Services has no direct knowledge of either the profits or losses of operators of day nurseries unless these are financed directly by the province. In the case of Mini-Skools we do not know how much profit, if any, was made by them.

We do know that a per diem rate of $10.17 compares favourably with those negotiated by other nurseries with Metro social services. Metro social services budget criteria do allow a profit of 10 per cent based on income and expenditures as defined in their budget guidelines.

The next inquiry was whether Mini-Skools' rated capacity exceeds the licence capacity established by the ministry. The term "rated capacity" is not one which the ministry uses and we have not been able to determine precisely how it is defined by Mini-Skools. In the statement by Elody Scholz to the social services and housing committee it is indicated that rated capacities are internal goals for enrolment.

Based on ministry inspection reports since 1975, Mini-Skools did not have in any nursery an enrolment overall which exceeded its licensed capacity. We have no evidence from our inspections that Mini-Skools overenrolled generally. In specific rooms, there were from time to time more children than would be permitted under the space requirements set out in the day Nurseries Act.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in response to the fifth question, it was indicated in that question that the child-staff ratios of Mini-Skools centres are violated as a matter of habit. There have at times in the past been problems with child-staff ratios. In view of this, inspections are made more frequently than once a year at some Mini-Skools centres. Notice is not given of inspections prior to their being carried out by our staff.

Mini-Skools have complied with the child-staff ratios after requirements have been discussed with them. The 1975 licence for Tuxedo Court was issued with a condition requiring the operator to comply with the regulations concerning staffing, and this was done.

It is not our practice to revoke licences immediately when difficulties are encountered, except in situations where the safety or well-being of the children appears to be in jeopardy. We meet normally with the operators and discuss the requirements of the legislation and give them a specified period during which they have an opportunity to comply. Closing a nursery creates difficulties for all concerned but particularly for parents and children. We therefore provide some consulting service to assist operators to meet the standards within a specified period.

Information is supplied to us by Mini-Skools, as required under regulation 232, section 3 of our legislation. There are no difficulties being encountered by the ministry under this section at the present time. At the present time, Mini-Skools are complying with the terms and conditions of the Day Nurseries Act. All nurseries are licensed and none has a conditional licence. I might add that I have reviewed the matter and the six Mini-Skools within Metropolitan Toronto in the past three years—in some cases two years—have been inspected a total of 25 times by the inspection branch of our ministry.

Mr. Speaker: Detail was sought in the multiple questions that were put by the hon. member for Bellwoods, and as I recall in the supplementaries that followed. I think in future a question as detailed and requiring as much detail in the answer should be put on the order paper. I'm going to add five minutes to the question period.

Mr. McClellan: May I have a supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: A brief supplementary.

Ms. Gigantes: He's got a right to it.

Mr. McClellan: Rather than get into the details of his response, do I gather from what the minister has said that he had refused to undertake the kind of inquiry I requested, which would have involved his use of his authority under regulation 13 of the Day Nurseries Act to obtain full financial and enrolment records from Mini-Skools and determine whether the material which I presented to the minister, which I gather he didn't even study, indicated violations of the Act and irregularities in the contract awarding?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I don't think that degree of sarcasm is necessary in response to what was a sincere attempt to respond to the hon. member's questions of the other day.

Ms. Gigantes: That's a sincere question.

Mr. Martel: Boy, you're touchy.

Hon. Mr. Norton: No, it does not mean I am closing off the matter.

Ms. Gigantes: Talk about sarcasm.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Obviously, we will continue to look into this but I do want to indicate to the hon. member very clearly that this is not a situation that has not been under regular supervision by our ministry staff and, as I understand it, by the Metro staff. Obviously we will look in detail at the rather copious material that was supplied to us.

Mr. McClellan: Couldn't the minister have done that before he answered?

Hon. Mr. Norton: If there is any truth to the innuendo and outright accusations that the hon. member has made, certainly I will respond.

Mr. McClellan: It's not innuendo.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I will continue to examine the matter.

Mr. McClellan: May I have another supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Huron-Bruce.

HYDRO TRANSFORMER FIRE

Mr. Gaunt: I have a question of the Minister of the Environment. Since the Ministry of the Environment report on the PCB fire in downtown Toronto positively identified only one toxic compound, since the Ministry of the Environment believes that other toxic substances were present but couldn't be identified because of the limitations of its own laboratory facilities, and since Dr. Harding of the Ministry of Labour's occupational health branch has asked for the funds for a study on the liver functions of those people most likely to have been exposed to these extreme toxic substances at the scene of the fire, has the minister, in conjunction with the Ministry of Labour's occupational health branch, sought and attained funds from OHIP for such a study; and when will it commence?

Hon. Mr. McCague: No, not as of this point.

Mr. Gaunt: Supplementary: Is the minister pursuing the matter with the Ministry of Labour; and if so, when does he think this problem will be resolved?

Hon. Mr. McCague: I am not personally pursuing it. The staff is.

Mr. Gaunt: Supplementary: At what stage are the negotiations?

Hon. Mr. McCague: At the staff level; I will find out for the member.

Mr. Riddell: The minister better take a holiday.

Mr. Gaunt: Will the minister report back?

Hon. Mr. McCague: Certainly.

[3:00]

CITIZENSHIP PROGRAMS

Mr. Grande: My question is for the Minister of Culture and Recreation, if he would take his seat. The question regards cutbacks and phasing out of citizenship classes, English-for-mother program classes and the nursery program component of those classes.

Given the fact that the federal government last year changed the waiting requirement for Canadian citizenship from a five-year to a three-year period and given the fact that the number of people who are applying for citizenship has almost tripled since last year, can the minister explain why the citizenship department of his ministry is cutting back and phasing out the citizenship classes, the English-as-a-second language classes for adults—which prepared our immigrants to achieve Canadian citizenship status—and also cutting back the nursery component? Why is he phasing out a program for which the need has almost tripled in one year?

Hon. Mr. Welch: I would simply ask the hon. member what information does he have that we are?

Mr. Grande: Supplementary: Is the minister not aware that the citizenship department was asked to cut back $150,000 in salaries? Is he not aware that at F. H. Miller School and St. Mathew's Church the four people who run the adult English-as-a-second-language classes and nursery programs, respectively; and the person who does the citizenship classes at St. Thomas Aquinas—all within the borough of York—have been fired as of March 31 of this year?

Hon. Mr. Welch: My response to that is that this government will maintain its commitment to ensure that this program is not impaired in any way. The hon. member knows that a great deal of this program is run through the community colleges of the province; and indeed as far as the involvement of the ministry itself is concerned it is to look after some of the shortfalls there. I am quite prepared to stand here and say that no one will go without support in order to maintain this program; that's our commitment. The hon. member is now talking about particulars, I am talking about the commitment. We will look after this program. As the hon. member knows, the estimates of this ministry will be before the standing committee on social development on March 28 and we can go into this in further detail at that time.

Mr. Martel: Will the minister look into the firing?

Mr. Dukszta: Does this apply just as much to a working English program in Shirley Street School which has been notified by this ministry that its nursery program is going to be finished in the next few months?

Hon. Mr. Welch: The comments I have made apply to the entire program. As far as our support of teaching English as a second language is concerned, and all its ramifications also, it is a complex program involving other agencies and other ministries besides ourselves; I am quite satisfied that nothing will stand in the way of maintaining our overall commitment to that program.

SMOKING AND DRINKING HAZARDS

Mr. Reid: I have a question for the Minister of Health. Has the Minister of Health any plans on publicizing the ill effects of smoking and drinking on pregnant women who are about to give birth, and the effects that those two vices will have on the birth of their child?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I think questions on the effect of these lifestyle problems on pregnant women are already well covered in material which is put out both by our ministry and by various private sector groups. If the member has any particular suggestions or problems in that regard, I would be pleased to consider them or refer him to the appropriate counselling authorities.

Mr. Reid: I was more concerned about the minister himself Mr. Speaker. But, unlike the Minister of Health, I don't hang around doctors' offices and prenatal clinics. Is there information available to women in doctors' offices and in clinics on the effect that drinking and smoking will have on the health of their children?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I will be glad to send the member copies of the material that we send out or which we make available to physicians. He may have seen the small brown stands in pharmacies and doctors' offices.

Mr. Nixon: There is one other pamphlet you should send.

Ms. Gigantes: This is not funny.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: You don't go to doctors?

Mr. Eakins: Send him the full kit.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Yes, I'll send the member the material we have. It's optional for the doctors to have these pamphlets in their office at all or which of them they use. I may say the pamphlet program is very successful in that last year we distributed over 800,000 pamphlets on a wide variety of subjects to schools, doctors' offices, pharmacies and hospitals around the province.

OTTAWA PSYCHIATRIC FACILITIES

Ms. Gigantes: I have a question for the Minister of Health. It's not a funny question; I didn't think the last one was either. I wish he would take his responsibilities a little more seriously on this subject.

Mr. Warner: Shame.

Ms. Gigantes: I am assuming the minister is familiar with the tragic murder last week of two members of an Ottawa family, two young girls, and the charging of an alleged suspect who was a member of that family.

I would like to know if the minister is prepared to respond to the very well-placed criticisms that have been levelled at his ministry concerning the lack of adequate psychiatric facilities in the Ottawa area? These criticisms are now coming publicly from the director of psychiatric services at the Royal Ottawa Hospital.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Let me say, first of all, I take myself not nearly as seriously as perhaps the hon. member does. Once in a while I can look at myself and not be so stuffed up as the hon. member that I can't see the lighter side of life.

Mr. McClellan: This is a riot.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: As regards this, I understand there were some things in the Ottawa press late last week. We have over the last few years attempted to ensure the provision of more psychiatric services in the area. The member will know that this is one of the aspects of the review by the district health council of all facilities and programs in that area, which is of prime importance. Once we have that review in hand, within the next year or year-and-a-half, we will be able to make some decisions about the provision of psychiatric services, not just in Ottawa but in all of eastern Ontario, that one wouldn't want to make without having a complete study in hand.

Ms. Gigantes: Supplementary: I wonder if while we are holding our breath on this matter we could get some encouragement from the ministry in terms of citation of what new programs are being developed. The only result I know of currently from the review process that's been going on is a holding motion which has led to the dissolution of projects like the mental health project.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: The hon. member will know that over the last number of years there have been developed in all parts of the province a number of community mental health programs as the process of de-emphasis on the traditional psychiatric incarceration has been accelerated.

I can only say she is quite mistaken if she sees the review of the district health council as some form, as she puts it, of "holding your breath" or trying to stall. Rather, for the first time in the development of the district health councils and in the further development of modern health care planning, we are in the region of Ottawa-Carleton coming together under the auspices of the health council and using the services of the university and a number of other agencies within government—

Ms. Gigantes: There are no facilities and no programs.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: —to develop a long-term plan for all aspects of health care in that region. I'm sorry the member is not supportive of that process.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Is the minister aware that it is now more than a year since recommendations have been made to the ministry about a forensic program for the Ottawa area which would include a secure psychiatric ward at the Royal Ottawa Hospital so that patients do not have to be taken to Penatanguishene, 300 miles away from Ottawa, and that this tragedy might have been averted had the action that was promised in that program during the election campaign last June been taken by the ministry rather than put forward as a kind of pre-election promise?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I am not aware of any pre-election or intra-election promises on the subject. Let me say on the question of secure units, as the member knows, if funds permitted we would perhaps do a lot of things we don't do now. We have an excellent program at Penetang and one which is probably better known and better appreciated outside of Ontario than it is by members opposite.

Mr. Cassidy: You were very warm during the election period.

Mr. Martel: One of your promises was to have a hospital built in Sudbury.

Ms. Gigantes: How many people have to get killed?

Mr. Makarchuk: Is the minister aware that because of his cutbacks in mental or psychiatric hospitals, the net result has been deaths in his hospitals because of lack of staff? Is the minister prepared at this time—

Mr. Speaker: The question dealt specifically with an incident in Ottawa.

The hon. member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk.

TOUR OF NORTH

Mr. Nixon: I have a question of the Premier. Does he recall that traditionally the government has arranged a tour of northern Ontario for the members of this House at a convenient time following each election? If so—and I'm sure he does recall this—will he undertake to set in train the mechanics for planning such a tour, which I personally think would be valuable for new members of the House, as well as for some old war-horses, so that we might perhaps visit the Indians in their own community, perhaps go and see the timber limits that have been under discussion—and maybe even wet a line?

Hon. Mr. Davis: To reply to that question it's quite obvious to me why the members of the Liberal caucus would like to visit northern Ontario because it would be, with the exception of one, their only relationship to it.

Mr. Breihaupt: Which one?

Mr. Reid: Quality, quality.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Listen, I've never argued the member's quality. Never. His judgement, yes, but his quality, no.

Mr. S. Smith: North Bay gets a $10 licence.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I certainly would want the member's leader to get to Sault Ste. Marie. It would be the first time since he said he'd never be back.

Interjections.

Mr. S. Smith: You got an excellent reception in Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Breihaupt: See Ontario first.

Hon. Mr. Davis: However, to get back to the question; the House leader from the Liberal Party is suggesting there be a tour of northern Ontario. I certainly think that's worthy of exploration.

OWEN SOUND HOSPITAL TRANSFER

Mr. Charlton: I have a question of the Minister of Health. Can the minister tell us if the terms and conditions of the proposed transfer of the MacKinnon Phillips Hospital in Owen Sound have been completed and approved? If they have, would he table that package in the House? If they have not, does the government still intend to go ahead with the transfer, as April 1 is approaching rather quickly?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: To answer the last part of the member's question first, yes, the transfer will go ahead.

The answer to the first part is that it will be reviewed by Management Board in cabinet within the next few days.

Mr. Charlton: A supplementary: Can the minister tell us if there is a problem with the transfer of the land; and if there is how that will affect the transfer itself?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: As I recall there is some difficulty with regards to a sewer easement or something of that order, but nothing so major as to delay the effective date of transfer. It is something which can be worked on by the respective parties after April 1.

Mr. Charlton: One final supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Is the minister aware at all of the possibility of any layoffs in this transfer, as somebody from the administration of the General and Marine Hospital in Owen Sound has indicated that there may be some layoffs?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: All employees of the MacKinnon Phillips Hospital have been offered employment by the Owen Sound General and Marine.

NORTH PICKERING INQUIRY

Mrs. Campbell: My question is to the Attorney General. In view of the fact that he has now released the abortive commission report on Pickering, and in view of the fact that the Ombudsman has publicly challenged the position of that report, has the Attorney General given any consideration to a reply to the Ombudsman's position with reference thereto?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: No.

(Laughter.)

Mrs. Campbell: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—I am sorry that I don't think it is a matter for levity.

I would ask if the Attorney General is prepared to give consideration to a reply to that matter, because it seems to me it's of great importance in the field of justice in this province?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: It may be that the Minister of Housing (Mr. Bennett) may wish to say something at the appropriate time. It's my own personal view that with this unfortunate North Pickering problem any decisions may very well have to await the report of the Hoillett commission, which is expected sometime in May.

OLIVETTI LAYOFFS

Mr. Wildman: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry and Tourism. In view of the cuts in the work force at Olivetti Canada on Don Mills Road from 180 to 55 over the past year and a half, and the fears at the plant that further layoffs may be pending, will the minister investigate to determine if these cuts at Olivetti's Canadian plant results from dumping in Canada by Olivetti's plants in Brazil, in Britain and elsewhere? And if he would be willing to look into this, would he also approach his federal counterpart to ensure that dumping by foreign typewriter manufacturers will not take place at the expense of Canadian jobs?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, certainly I will look into that. There is no question that we are not in favour of allowing offshore companies to dump into our markets. I will certainly look into that.

Mr. Wildman: Supplementary: Would the minister also inquire to determine what Olivetti's plans are for the future of its Ontario plant to ensure that it is not intending to phase out operations completely, and would he investigate to determine whether or not the provincial government has purchased foreign-produced typewriters and other business machines?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Yes.

STUDENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Sweeney: A question to the Minister of Community and Social Services, Mr. Speaker: Given that the minister's colleague the Minister of Colleges and Universities (Mr. Parrott) is making it more difficult for university students to get money these days—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Shame.

How can you distort things like that?

Mr. Sweeney:—I wonder if the minister would please advise me why it is necessary for the Association for Single Student Parents to indicate in their most recent newsletter that those who are on welfare will have some of their money deducted from their grant by municipalities?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Is the hon. member suggesting—excuse me, Mr. Speaker, this is a question—that the municipalities would take into account the student grant or loan as income?

Mr. Sweeney: My understanding is that the municipalities, through the Ministry of Community and Social Services, will deduct—

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Question.

Mr. Sweeney:—and this is the question, why is it necessary for them to deduct some of the grant for single-parent students?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I have not looked into that matter—I will—but presumably the grant or loan would be awarded to the students on the basis of their total responsibility and living expenses; and if that were the case, then presumably that portion would be income which was designed for their support and the support of their child. If they were to continue as a student, it would seem to me that it might be appropriate that the municipality consider the total income when they are assessing the need, if they are contemplating giving some assistance to the student.

Mr. Sweeney: Supplementary: Given the fact that the welfare amount is even less than the family benefits payments that come from his ministry, does the minister think this is reasonable?

Hon. Mr. Norton: The hon. member's assumption is correct that it's less than family benefits. I would have to comment on a specific case before I would know whether it was a reasonable decision. If the hon. member is asking, do I think there ought to be discretion? I would say yes. But if he asks me, in a specific case, do I think it's reasonable; I would have to know more before I could respond to that.

URANIUM DRILLING

Mr. Martel: A question to the Premier: In view of the fact that Hollinger has now indicated it won't drill Lake Wanapitei, in view of the fact that the regional municipality has dropped the legal proceedings against the firm, is the Premier now prepared to give assurance to the regional municipality of Sudbury that his government will not give permits or licences to anyone else to drill in Lake Wanapitei for uranium?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think that question should be properly directed to the Minister of Natural Resources.

Mr. Martel: I am sometimes afraid of the answers I get from him, because there is never anything concrete in them. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to redirect that question to the Minister of Natural Resources.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, my answers are as concrete as the questions.

I am not going to commit this government, or my ministry at least, at this time to refusing any application in the future. I only would suggest to the hon. member that we will give it very serious consideration before any decision is made.

Mr. Martel: That is the reason I put the question to the Premier in the first place. In view of the fact that his government has given the regional municipality of Sudbury, under Bill 164, the responsibility for drinking water for the region, is he prepared to change Bill 164 so that the responsibility for drinking water doesn't rest with the region but in fact, because his government is going to play around, that it rests with the province?

Hon. F. S. Miller: That does not relate to my ministry.

Mr. Martel: No, and that is precisely why I raised the question with the Premier in the first place. You can't have it both ways.

MINING TAX

Mr. Reid: I have a question for the Minister of Natural Resources—which I believe is within his ministry if perhaps not his competence—dealing with mining taxes.

Hon. F. S. Miller: If you can think of it, I can answer it.

Mr. Reid: That's a good point.

Can the minister indicate what line he will be taking in going to Ottawa to discuss with his federal counterparts taxes within the province relating to mining, and the impact of the federal tax? And can he indicate if his committee dealing with mining tax has come up with any solution for declining resource communities, and the tax base which will be affected by that decline?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I read with interest the report of the select committee of the Legislature that was set up to look into the Inco matter. The member may recall that he suggested we look at tax measures as they relate to these municipalities and to the industry itself.

Just this last week the prospectors and developers were in Toronto, and I had an opportunity to talk to Mr. Gillespie and to five other provincial ministers. The one thing we all agreed upon is that we are, as ministers, going to meet regularly on the matter of taxation. We are going to try our best to make—not uniform rules across Canada, because I believe with 10 provinces they are neither appropriate nor possible—but we are going to do our best to simplify the system and to put in stimuli to encourage investment.

As far as the single-industry community is concerned—a place like Atikokan, which I am sure is one that is near to the member's heart at this moment—

Mr. Reid: Right.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We are very concerned. I have been in touch with officials in Atikokan within the last few days and have assured them that I am going to be talking to them and that my committee is trying to find alternatives.

Mr. Reid: May I ask, by way of supplementary; I presume that the minister and his federal counterpart and the five provincial ministers agreed that perhaps the taxation load, on the mining industry in particular, was killing any incentive for new exploration and development of mines in Canada and that this is one of the objects of the meeting?

Hon. F. S. Miller: That wasn't the object of the meeting on Monday, but it certainly got discussed in a long panel meeting with the mining people present. In the last fiscal year, no one could possibly say that the taxes collected in Ontario for mining were a burden to the industry. What has been the problem, because there were very few profits—

Mr. Reid: That's true, there is no incentive to open a mine even.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We collected taxes to the best of my knowledge from fewer than 15 mines in Ontario last year—

Mr. Martel: Darcy said that's great stuff; he gave me a junior economics lecture here one day.

Hon. F. S. Miller: —and probably less than $20 million in total.

Mr. Cassidy: You are trying to get out of this as well.

Hon. F. S. Miller: However, the issue was not that but the impact year by year, when profits went up; the relative tax rate when they went up. The changes mentioned by the Treasurer in the budget were aimed at leveling the good and the bad years in Ontario. They are going to do that to a large degree.

Mr. Reid: That doesn't deal with the problem.

Hon. F. S. Miller: The federal government has an aspect of that.

MERCURY CONTAMINATION

Ms. Bryden: I'm very glad to see the Minister of Natural Resources is here; I have been trying to ask this question for 10 days, but either he wasn't here or—

Mr. Kerrio: Why weren't you here?

Hon. F. S. Miller: You can't ask it from Florida.

Interjections.

Ms. Bryden: He hasn't been here whenever I was able to catch the Speaker's eye in the last 10 days.

In view of the extreme importance of including Ontario native people in the federal epidemiological survey of persons exposed to mercury contamination, particularly in view of the very high levels of methyl mercury found in the blood and hair samples of some people in the Grassy Narrows Reserve, will the minister stop the silly Gaston and Alphonse routine between himself and the federal Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and facilitate the acceptance of this survey of the native people in the Grassy Narrows and Whitedog reserves by making a commitment to assist the federal minister in enforcement of at least a temporary ban on sport fishing in the English-Wabigoon River system, until such time as the survey is completed and we find out the extent of the health hazards in this river system and can then decide whether a permanent closing of the river system is necessary?

Hon. F. S. Miller: The government stated its position clearly last May on this matter. The federal government has the power to close the river system—

Mr. S. Smith: So do you.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Certainly we have. I've never denied that. We have decided not to close it. If the federal government wishes to close it within its power, it may do so with our blessing.

Ms. Bryden: Will the minister agree to provide them with every assistance in enforcing a closure if they decide to close the river?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I'd have to consider that, but I would assume that would become their responsibility.

MINI-SKOOLES LIMITED

Mr. McClellan: Pursuant to standing order 27(g) I wish to give notice that I am dissatisfied with the answer to my question of the Minister of Community and Social Services and wish to pursue it at the adjournment of debate at the next opportunity.

WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Mr. Speaker: On Friday last, the hon. member for London Centre (Mr. Peterson) raised with the Chair the question of the apparent delay in a response to his written question number 10. I note that on the same day the hon. member was provided with an interim answer in accordance with standing order 10(b). I can only advise the member that the ministry has complied with the requirement to respond within 14 days, even though the response is only an indication that more time will be required. That's in keeping with provisional order 10(b).

OTTAWA PSYCHIATRIC FACILITIES

Ms. Gigantes: Pursuant to standing order 27(g) I'd like to give notice that I'm not satisfied with the response of the Minister of Health to my question concerning psychiatric services in the Ottawa-Carleton area, and I'd like to raise it after adjournment of the debate tomorrow evening.

Hon. Mr. Warner moved first reading of Bill 32, An Act to amend the Health Insurance Act, 1972.

ORDER OF THE DAY

Resumption of the adjourned debate on the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. Welch: Double-breasted suit!

Mr. Peterson: I rented this suit from the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) for the day.

Mr. Nixon: You look like an NDP critic.

Mr. Martel: That's an insult.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise for our party today and to make our contribution to this budget debate. As you recall, last year I was representing the third party, now Her Majesty's official loyal opposition. I am expecting the logical progression, Mr. Speaker, is that next year we will be presenting the budget. We will look forward to see what kind of an opposition critic the Treasurer of this province is.

An hon. member: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Rotenberg: Are you going to pull the plug?

Mr. Peterson: We may just pull the plug. Just keep ready all the time.

Some hon. members: We are ready.

Mr. Peterson: It has been very difficult to prepare this budget response because of the considerable number of things that I would have liked to have said which we unfortunately had to cut out. About three-quarters of the good stuff has been eradicated, Mr. Speaker, but I want you to know I am prepared on short notice to come back to this House if there is a popular request for my so doing to include the stuff I am not going to have time to talk about today. I gather my time is till 6 o'clock. There is a great round of approval from my House leader on that particular matter. He is suffering, Mr. Speaker. He feels a bit persecuted today because his obligation is to sit here and listen to all of this stuff.

Mr. Nixon: It is what I am paid for.

Mr. Rotenberg: Can you take it, Bob?

Mr. Lewis: You could go on this evening.

Mr. Peterson: I appreciate that very much.

In analysing the budget of a province or of any jurisdiction I think one has to put it in the context of all the other major documents—the social documents, the other planning documents of a province or of a jurisdiction. I think maybe when one analyses the discrepancy between the Throne Speech and the speeches and all of the attendant good things that were attached to the first ministers' conference and then you see the budget, one is bound to be somewhat disappointed. In fact one wag has said if you really want to understand the soul of a government you have to look at their budget, because that clearly outlines their priorities and how they feel about the social problems—how they feel that financial burden should be distributed among the people and the institutions of a particular jurisdiction.

I think that as we analyse this budget we are going to see our party differing very substantially in a great number of the priorities.

When I read the budget this time I was struck particularly by the total absence of any kind of long-term policies or vision by the Treasurer and by the government. For a government that has long held unto itself almost exclusively the myth of management competence—and the Treasurer himself almost embodies that myth of management competence held by the government—when we analyse some of the discrepancies, when we analyse how so many of the rules have changed to fit his contemporary political purposes and how he has unabashedly changed some of these rules and terms and conditions, I think we are going to find that perhaps they aren't as competent as one would have assumed and that perhaps other people have just as constructive ideas, given the very difficult economic climate we are living in today.

I said after the budget it is not an easy thing to make up a budget today.

Mr. Laughren: Not with those Liberals in Ottawa.

Mr. Peterson: We have so spent out our options, we have so little room to move without incurring massive deficits. I am going to point out in the course of this speech the tremendous constraints put on the budget of this province over the next 20 years because of our financial obligations, our obligations to pay back capital, having exhausted all of our sources of capital; it is very alarming.

I can tell you that whoever forms the government in this province in the next two or three years—and I suspect it is going to be somebody different from those members sitting across there now—and I really don't, in all fairness, think it will ever be my friends on the left.

An hon. member: I don't think so either.

Mr. Lewis: Why don't you be unfair?

Mr. Martel: They are not biased.

An hon. member: Thirty-four seats again is hardly overwhelming.

Mr. Peterson: I can tell you that it is going to be extraordinarily difficult. If you think we have economic problems today, let me tell you they are going to be a lot more critical, because we have been exhausting our options, we've been using up all of our flexibility.

In the old days, perhaps it was more fun to be in government, perhaps there weren't the great demands on government that there are today. Maybe they didn't have to make the tough priority decisions that they have to make today. When things were running in a balanced sense, when governments could have surpluses or deficits, there was lots of flexibility, and I understand that. But I can tell you that flexibility is not there today. To that end, and to that extent only, I sympathize with the Treasurer. Given those constraints, though, I think that the decisions he made were not only wrong but they were abjectly unfair, and I think that the people of this province are going to show that to the Treasurer.

Mr. Haggerty: He's been wrong six times.

Mr. Peterson: Personally, I have detected, just in the last couple of weeks—pre-budget as well as post-budget—that people are looking at the Treasurer with a new set of glasses. Because of his demeanour, and with the assistance of his tailor and barber and the stewards at the Albany Club, he was able to project an image of confidence, but now we are seeing far more bluster. We are seeing a far less specific response to some of the very difficult questions. We are finding that he is in a bind. If you look at question period for the last week, look at his responses to the straightforward questions asked, look at how he has changed the rules; it is my opinion that the decline of Darcy McKeough is starting to set in.

Mr. Haggerty: The duke is on his way out.

Mr. Peterson: I think that we are going to see a very different view of this gentleman held by the people of this province.

I planned, today, to talk briefly about some of our historical problems because I think they are important and relevant to the financial bind we are in today. I expect, in the process, to analyse our relative position, to talk briefly about how we compare to the other provinces in Canada, because I think it is important that we understand the trends and the kind of situations that we have developed for ourselves today.

Then I intend to discuss the present government's solutions: how we differ, how our priorities would be different; then I would go to our constructive suggestions. And that is going to include our specific suggestions for job creation, our specific suggestions for developing an industrial strategy in this province—which the Treasurer mouths the need for but does absolutely nothing about—and I intend to talk briefly about an energy strategy for this province, because we are the most energy-consumptive people in the world per capita; and as we find that we are totally vulnerable—because we are importing some 80 per cent of that energy and the energy bill is getting into the area of 10 per cent of the gross provincial product—it becomes an area in which we need massive new invigorated strategies with new insights, a new toughness. We on this side of the House are prepared to provide that, and I intend to lay out some of our approaches and give our reasons why. So with any luck I will be finished by 6 o'clock; if we are not, well we will try to accelerate it.

Before I start I would like to thank many people who assisted in the preparation of all of this work. As I have said before, the research department of the Liberal Party of Ontario—that you may or may not be familiar with, Mr. Speaker—is just first class. They have just done a marvellous job. We have assistants with new insights, taking us into new areas; and I, for one, am very grateful to them. I am going to take the liberty of reading five of these names into the record just because they have been a great help to me. And it will be interesting when their children read Hansard—and they will particularly want to refer back to this debate, I am sure—and they can see their 'mommies' and 'daddies' names in Hansard. They are Daphne Rutherford, Jane Shapiro, Lou D'Onofrio, Sandie Giles and Jean Shilton, who have been terrific and worked many long hours and many weekends to assist me. In addition to that we have had many outside experts who have assisted. That's one thing that gratifies me.

Mr. Laughren: Walter Gordon tried that too.

Mr. Peterson: Many outsiders—economists, people in the labour movement, people in the investment business—are now coming to us with positive ideas. They are trying to provide meaningful input. Today the Liberal Party of Ontario, I say with great pride, has gained under the leadership of the member for Hamilton West (Mr. S. Smith) a great deal of respect in many communities and in many constituencies in this province. We will continue to grow as we continue to attempt to represent all of those constituencies as fairly and as equitably as we can.

Mr. Samis: Finally.

Mr. Martel: I'm glad the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon) is here.

An hon. member: I'm glad he got the message.

Mr. Peterson: I want to start off with a little historical view of the situation. The Premier (Mr. Davis) took over the reins of government inheriting a provincial budget of some $5.2 billion. Today the budget stands at $14.005 billion, an increase of some 171 per cent.

Mr. Johnson: That's an irresponsible statement.

Mr. Peterson: Prior to the Premier's advent, this province had the benefit of sound financial and economic management. Our economy grew steadily and we led the nation. The first Davis-McKeough budget in 1971 promised controlled public spending and delivered a 15.6 per cent or almost $1 billion increase in government expenditures. That year saw, not coincidentally, an election and a record provincial deficit of $1.28 billion.

With the characteristic inaccuracy that we have grown to expect on a yearly and even monthly basis from this government, the Treasurer underestimated his budgetary expenditures in that year by more than $1 billion in 1971 and against in 1972.

Mr. Haggerty: He's consistent.

Mr. Peterson: Expenditures went up by 7.5 per cent or almost $450 million, increasing 50 per cent more than the spiralling cost of living.

In 1973, with a different Treasurer at the helm, the provincial budget called for increased spending to the tune of $750 million, or 11.8 per cent compared with the preceding year. Ultimately, expenditures increased by some $811 million, an increase of 12.7 per cent at a time when Ontario's inflation rate was running at 7.6 per cent.

Inflation was still rampant in 1974. Experts agreed that control of public spending was absolutely essential. The government of Ontario responded by calling for a 14.2 per cent increase in expenditures, notwithstanding a predicted inflation rate of 7.7 per cent. Again the budget was overspent, this time by about $385 million. Increased spending rose from an estimated 14.2 per cent to an actual 20.8 per cent. Did I hear "shame" from my benches?

Mr. Nixon: Shame.

Mr. Peterson: Thank you. The 1975 budget envisaged an increase in government expenditures of 16.8 per cent, about $1.5 billion. That was the year of the "mini-budget," which boosted the increase in government spending to 21.2 per cent. Updated to December, 1975, budgetary and non-budgetary deficit figures were $1.976 billion, within nudging distance of the dreaded $2 billion mark—almost half of the entire provincial budgetary expenditure when the Premier took over.

Deficit financing had clearly become a way of life for the government of this, the province of opportunity, for they knew no other way. Our budgetary and non-budgetary deficit had gone from $566 million in 1970-71 to nearly $2 billion in December, 1975. The year 1976 saw net cash requirements increase by $158 million to nearly $1.4 billion, an increase of 12 per cent in government spending, the budget overspent by $55 million and a budgetary deficiency of $302 million more than the estimated amount.

By this time, the bizarre fiscal policies of the Premier and his colleagues had incurred a well-nigh intolerable burden of debt for the people of Ontario. Between 1970 and 1974, the accumulated provincial net debt had more than doubled, from $1.4 billion to $2.9 billion. Within the next two years, to March, 1976, it more than doubled again to $6.2 billion.

Mr. Haggerty: It sounds like a balanced budget.

Mr. Peterson: Last March it was estimated at $7.2 billion; in fact, at the end of the fiscal year it is $7.8 billion. The projection for 1978 is $9.1 billion. Soon we will be in debt by almost twice as much as the entire provincial budget when Mr. Davis became Premier and Mr. McKeough started to get his hooks into the Treasury.

I just want to recap this because it's meaningful in terms of the environment we're in today. Since John Roberts' last full year as Premier, we have witnessed the following: Budgetary expenditures have more than tripled from $4.2 billion to $12.9 billion, an average annual rate of increase of 15 per cent. The projection for 1978 is over $14 billion. From a budgetary surplus of $150 million we now have budgetary deficits totalling $6.4 billion.

The projection for 1978 adds almost another billion and a half to that deficit. The provincial net debt has more than quintupled. It has increased 450 per cent, from $1.4 billion to $7.8 billion. The projection for 1978 has the net debt rising a further 17.5 per cent to $9.1 billion. The net debt as a percentage of gross provincial product has increased by 112 per cent. With the 1978 projection, that increase will be over 120 per cent.

The net debt as a percentage of budgetary revenue has more than doubled, increasing from 31.9 per cent to 68.5 per cent. For 1978, the percentage is expected to rise to 72.1 per cent. Interest payments on the public debt rose 472 per cent from $209 million to over $1 billion. Projections for 1978 show a further increase of 15.4 per cent, the largest increase in the budget, to a total of $1.2 billion in interest payments. That is about $3.3 million a day in interest on the debt accumulated by this government.

The net debt per capita has increased 391 per cent from $189 to $928 and is projected to rise this year to over $1,000—$1,077 to be exact—an annual increase rate of 22 per cent.

These are the sad facts but they are important to setting a context for today's budget debate, for the situation that we are in today.

What we found is the Treasurer isn't stupid. He understands the evils of his past and now we find him trying to run against his past. We see him making or trying to make a virtue of denying his own past excesses at the public expense. When we have seen this massive growth in debt and the raiding of the pension funds in order to finance it we have seen a situation entirely created by this government, no one else. That is something that he is going to have to own up to. It is something that he is going to have to pay for in the near future. I suspect he won't be in government to have to deal with it when the crunch comes.

Mr. Nixon: He'll be back pushing plumbing.

Mr. Peterson: It's important that I also discuss Ontario's economy not in terms only of its past but in terms of its relative position in this country and indeed in this world.

The decline in Ontario's economy in the last eight to 10 years is serious enough when viewed in isolation. In comparison with developments in other selected provinces and the Canadian national average the implications are cause for very real anxiety.

Let's consider the compound annual rate of growth in gross provincial direct and guaranteed debt in Ontario between 1968 and 1975—which was 14.5 per cent. This was the third highest growth rate in the country. Moreover, the actual debt was greater in size than Quebec's by $4.5 million; than Alberta's by $10.8 million; and British Columbia's by $9.1 million.

The per capita compound annual growth rate in gross provincial direct and guaranteed debt for Ontario between 1968 and 1975 was 12.5 per cent. This was the third highest growth rate in the country. In 1968, Ontario ranked behind Alberta in having the lowest debt per capita. By 1975, Ontario had dropped to fifth place.

While Ontario has the highest personal income per capita in the country at present, the compound annual growth rate in personal income, per capita, between 1968 and 1975 in Ontario was the lowest in Canada; 9.8 per cent compared to 10.4 per cent in British Columbia, 11.3 per cent in Quebec, and 12 per cent in Alberta. In these circumstances, we cannot expect that Ontario will continue to rank first for very long.

Ontario's compound annual growth rate in provincial government gross annual revenues between 1972 and 1976 was 14.7 per cent. This was the lowest growth rate experienced by any province in the country.

The compound annual growth rate in Ontario's gross provincial product from 1970 to 1976 was 13 per cent—lower than the national growth rate of 13.6 per cent.

Another area in which Ontario's performance over recent years compares very unfavourably with other provinces in the national average is in terms of housing.

With the exception of 1972, the annual percentage increase in housing starts in Ontario has lagged the national average since 1970. If Ontario starts are removed from the national total the difference in percentage increase is dramatic.

In 1975, Ontario experienced a decrease of 5.7 per cent over 1974, while nationally, excluding Ontario, there was an increase of 16.6 per cent in urban housing starts. Again, in 1976, while Ontario had an annual increase of 5.4 per cent in urban starts, nationally there was a 15.3 per cent increase. If Ontario starts are excluded, the rest of the country experienced a percentage increase of 21.2 per cent.

These are a lot of numbers and in some ways I apologize for putting these in the record today, but I think it is very important that—

Mr. Nixon: Don't apologize.

Mr. Peterson: —we set the stage properly.

Mr. Nixon: It is a serious indictment of inadequate policy over many years.

Mr. Peterson: While urban starts in 1977 finally improved over the national average increase, the number of starts has declined. With the exception of 1975, the total is the lowest since 1970. Urban starts declined by one and one half per cent over 1976. While all starts came in close to, but under, the projected level of 80,000 starts for 1977, they were targeted by the government at a level almost six per cent lower than 1976; so reaching this goal cannot be considered a great achievement.

The data for January of this year is not promising, especially in multiple dwelling starts where an increase of 25 per cent for Ontario in January of this year over January 1977 was matched by a national increase of 57 per cent. Ontario's increase is less than half the federal. If Ontario starts are excluded from the national increase, the latter increase would have been more than 73 per cent over the period last year. This is of particular concern, given apartment vacancy rates for selected Ontario cities in October 1977 as follows: London 1.6 per cent, Ottawa 1.2 per cent, Sudbury one per cent, Thunder Bay 0.2 per cent, Toronto 0.2 per cent and Windsor one per cent.

That's just too low and has tremendous distorting effects on the local housing markets.

In almost every case these figures represent a decline in the apartment vacancy rate from October 1976. The national figure, which represents the average for 24 centres across Canada, rose from 1.3 per cent in October 1976 to 2.2 per cent in October 1977, coming slowly closer to the three to four per cent apartment vacancy rate which federal housing experts maintain is healthy—conducive to fair rents and the construction of more buildings. Ontario is making no progress towards that healthy target.

The government is forecasting 80,000 housing starts for Ontario in 1978. This represents no increase over the 1977 level. This is also a far cry from the 100,000 starts which the government-commissioned Comay report four years ago said would be necessary annually for a decade to avert a housing crisis. Indeed in each of the intervening years we have fallen so far short of that level that it would take a monumental effort, far beyond anything we have come to be able to expect from this government, to rectify the situation and to provide the number of starts required.

The target for 1978 will certainly not help in this regard. We will not even fulfil the famous Brampton charter which forecast 90,000 housing starts per year for a decade. The low levels of housing starts are due to a high inventory level of newly-completed homes. Clearly what Ontario continues to need is not housing but affordable housing.

Ontario has lagged substantially behind the national percentage increase in retail sales in 1973, 1974 and 1976; and while this province finally slipped by the national increase in 1977, it was attained by a lower annual percentage increase than was achieved in 1976. In 1976 and 1977 Ontario failed to reach the percentage increases predicted by the government. An increase of 12.3 per cent was forecast for 1977, but only 8.4 per cent was achieved, a shortfall of $1.1 billion in retail sales. The 8.4 per cent achieved is certainly a far cry from the Treasurer's prediction of 10 per cent for 1977.

From 1970 to 1977, capital expenditures for the nation as a whole increased by 161 per cent. Ontario experienced an increase of only 110 per cent, lagging behind the other growth provinces during this period. Alberta had an increase of 298 per cent, Quebec 215 per cent, British Columbia 132 per cent. If the Ontario figures are excluded from the national total the increase for Canada was 194 per cent from 1970 to 1977, compared with 110 per cent for Ontario. The gap in expectations for 1977 between Ontario and the national average widened over the course of the year.

From 1970 to 1977 capital expenditures for machinery and equipment showed the same trend, rising by 159 per cent for Canada and only 116 per cent for Ontario. Again, the other growth provinces fared better; Alberta 370 per cent, Quebec 190 per cent and British Columbia 125 per cent. When the Ontario figures are excluded from the national total the increase for Canada was 191 per cent compared to 116 per cent for Ontario. Again, the gap in expectations for capital expenditures between Ontario and the national figure grew over the course of the year.

The lagging trend for Ontario shows no signs of changing. Specifically, the annual average percentage increase in capital expenditures in 1976 was 7.6 per cent for Ontario and 12.1 per cent for the nation as a whole. In the entire country, only Newfoundland experienced a lower yearly percentage increase in 1976, at 5.2 per cent; while Alberta saw an increase of 27.6 per cent, Quebec 10.7 per cent and British Columbia 10.2 per cent. For 1977 the increase for Ontario at six per cent was well below the national increase of 11 per cent.

Ontario's share of the country's planned capital spending in 1977 works out to 31 per cent, down from 39 per cent in 1970. This will mark the fifth year in a row that Ontario's advance in capital spending has lagged behind the national average.

The situation may, however, improve slightly for Ontario in 1978. Predictions by the Conference Board in Canada rate Ontario as number three nationally in production growth and increased retail sales, number three in real provincial growth, and second in gains in employment and personal income.

As a Toronto Star economic columnist stated—and I really don't want to read a lot of editorial comment; I know that the Premier was very worried about that, because almost every editorialist in this country has castigated this government in the last week, but I just want to quote the Toronto Star economic columnist. He says this about Ontario:

"It's not bad for a has-been," and he commented: "One factor, obviously, is that the province has done so badly in the recent past that it has plenty of room to improve. Ontario may be over the worst of its painful adjustment to the fact that it is no longer number one in just about everything."

Indeed, a survey conducted by the Toronto Star last month found that a growing number of politicians and economists believe that Ontario is in an economic decline from which it may never recover its once envied position. Not one of the experts interviewed held out hope for an upturn in Ontario's fortunes this year.

Arthur Donner, a respected Toronto economist, expressed the view that rather than holding our own, "we're slipping both ways; in Canada and in the rest of the world." Whether 1978 proves to be a year in which this province improves slightly over its dismal performance of the last six to eight years, or whether we decline even further in major indicators of economic growth, the fact remains that our situation is critical.

This government has allowed our provincial economy to drift, providing no leadership, no direction for recovery or growth.

The survey conducted by TV Ontario is clear proof that the people of this province lack confidence in the economic future of Ontario. And this attitude, of course, affects investment intentions which are so important to any turnaround in the economic climate.

We do not have to take a defeatist stance, we do not have to take a hands-off stance—the one taken by the government which believes the solutions lie with the federal government.

Ontario possesses the resources, both human and financial, to become a leader again. We must have economic leadership. We must chart a course to prosperity by building a manufacturing base and by putting our skilled and motivated labour force to work. It is tragic that the Ontario economy has been allowed to deteriorate to its current state when the decline, in large part, was avoidable.

Government, along with the private sector, should have planned and must plan together for the future. Unfortunately, the government's economic performance in 1977 hardly represents a step in the right direction.

I just want to point out a discrepancy that bothers me. I think that the Treasurer understands these trends because he's faced with them daily. Indeed, when he went to Ottawa and presented his paper reassessing the scope for fiscal policy in Canada, he presented this statement as one of his major conclusions. Of course, the Treasurer and the Premier came away from that conference very smugly. The people felt they were looking to the Premier and the Treasurer for leadership because he said this:

"The composition of unemployment in Ontario and the rest of Canada merits more attention. Skilled, permanent jobs for youth is highlighted as the pre-eminent challenge to governments in the immediate future. Required are fundamental structural changes in the economy to enhance competitiveness, to increase exports and generate well-paying jobs in the private sector." When it came to his budget some months later, there isn't one reference to this. He denies, in almost everything that he says there, having made that kind of a statement.

That statement summarizes what we believe has to be done for the economy of this province. We have, and I will be laying out this afternoon, constructive, positive ways to reach this goal—a goal that the government has stated but from whom it has completely backed off. I for one am disappointed—not only disappointed but struck, very frankly, by the hypocrisy between those two documents.

I think it's important that we run down some of the past budgeting of this province to understand how deeply in error they have been on so many occasions and how any objective observer, looking at their past record, is going to not face the numbers with a great deal of credibility.

[4:00]

At the time of the 1977 budget, revenues were estimated at $12,621 million with expenditures at $13,698 million. Net cash requirements were quoted as $1,077 million. The publication Ontario Finances, issued by the Treasurer's ministry on June 30, gave revenues as $12,529 million, expenditures as $13,606 million. It's interesting to note the immediate post-election drop of $92 million in revenue. Possibly even more interesting is the fact that, as soon as it became necessary, the government was able to reduce expenditures by the required amount. In one stroke of his magic wand he cut out that amount of expenditure to arrive at this revised revenue figures.

What I am going through now is a litany of the number of budgets we have had in the last year. We have had six or seven budgets, each time the figures being revised in major proportions.

Let's not forget either that much of the loss of revenue resulted from delay in implementing tax measures—a delay caused by the government's determination to have an election no matter what the cost to the people of Ontario. Nor should we overlook that fact that while the Treasurer maintained that performance of the economy was weaker than had been expected, the only so-called authority who was really surprised—or pretended to be—was the Treasurer, whose pre-election optimism or, for want of a better word, pseudo-optimism had led him astray.

By mid-September, the Treasurer was once again forced to undertake far-reaching "refinements" of his financial statements because of his irresponsibly optimistic predictions last spring. He admitted that his revenue projections had been inaccurate; revenues were now stated to be lower by some $309 million. The implications were particularly serious, given that we were at that time only five months into the fiscal year.

As of June 30, 1977, the Treasurer's net cash requirements had been the same as his budget estimate. On September 16, he admitted that these would be another $217 million more than this figure. In other words, within two and a half months he had estimated an increase of some 20 per cent.

Two weeks later, on September 30, the Treasurer reported a further drop in revenues of $158 million, or $467 million less than the budget estimate. Once more, a sluggish economy was blamed, together with a downward re-estimate by the federal government of Ontario's 1977 personal income tax by some $350 million. However, even given this federal re-estimation, Ontario's revenues were off $117 million in five months—not even halfway through the fiscal year. By this time, net cash requirements were up $375 million or 35 per cent since the budget estimate.

The December 31 issue of Ontario Finances offered us yet another revision of the budget plan and, as the publication noted, "one significant change—the need for an additional $103-million contribution to the Teachers' Superannuation Fund." This figure is actually $107 million. Even more noteworthy is the fact that this was the second time in 1977 that the government was forced to admit that it owed the fund over $100 million more than it had thought. It was also the second time in 1977 that the government was able to accommodate an additional expenditure increase or loss by cuts in other spending areas. In June, $134 million was found through "a reordering of priorities and implementation of spending cuts." In December, another $103 million was found.

If reductions in expenditures are that simple to achieve, surely a tough and disciplined budgeting process could bring about far greater reductions in the initial budget allocations. For if the Treasurer can continue to make this kind of adjustment to compensate for loss of revenue, then obviously there is considerable fat in the provincial budget. This is not a time when we can afford to tolerate such loose budgetary procedures. If this government sincerely believes in restraint, let's see a budget so tight that it cannot be pared down.

I want to get back to the figures for a minute. Revenue in December had dropped off yet another $162 million and fell another $5 million by the time the 1978 budget was introduced—a total decrease of $634 million in revenue over the year. Net cash requirements have now risen by $539 million or 50 per cent since the last year's budget estimates. The budgetary deficit rose to more than $1.6 billion from the predicted $992 million, rather than decreasing by some $287 million over the year as anticipated.

Again the Treasurer blames his new revenue loss on a downward adjustment by the federal government of its personal income tax payments to the province. I would like to take a few minutes to consider this matter and to relate to this House a very important exchange that took place between the Treasurer and myself and his executive director of fiscal policy during the consideration of the ministry's estimates.

My colleague the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk, now the famous House leader, and I were asking about the reliability of the forecasts the federal government provides to us as to the amount Ontario receives in personal income tax payments. Mr. Allan, the executive director, stated: "We run an independent capacity, just for our own interest" and "We've had a pre-warning since 1970 that they're"—and I'm referring to the federal government—"all screwed up basically." The Treasurer later corroborated this view by saying: "They have continually underestimated the effects of indexing and it's caught up with them."

I then asked Mr. Allan if the fiscal policy division did its own independent forecast on these figures, and he replied: "We always do. We run computer programs on the income tax tapes." To this the Treasurer added,

"Obviously, in creating our own picture—a snapshot of what we think the economy is—we estimate a whole lot of things on our own and we take a look at the income tax." Later he said: "We do our own forecasting of the economy, what the personal income tax or the retail sales tax, or any one of the other things may turn up."

Two very important points flow from this exchange. First, on the day before this discussion, on October 18, 1977, I asked the Treasurer the following question in the House: "Does the ministry do independent forecasting, its own forecasting, about the provincial take on income tax as well as mining tax?" To this the Treasurer replied: "We do our own forecasting of mining tax. We do not do a forecast on the income tax." Those were two entirely different answers in two days. I would suggest that the Treasurer was not being honest with this House in his answer to me, and that it was only after his official inadvertently gave me the facts that the Treasurer told the estimates committee the truth. How can we be expected to have faith and confidence in the Treasurer if we can not trust his statements in this House?

I believe, and I told the Treasurer this at the time, that he has an obligation to make an apology to this House and to myself for the deliberately incorrect answer that he gave me at that time.

Mr. S. Smith: Hear, hear; half a billion dollars.

Mr. Peterson: The second point arising from this exchange concerns Mr. Allan's assertion that the federal government is "all screwed up" in its predictions, and has been told so since 1970. I later asked Mr. Allan if he told the Treasurer there was a risk in putting that particular budget number, the income tax revenue based on federal figures, in his budget. He replied: "I suggested that we couldn't believe that the income growth could be nearly as high as that being projected by the federal government"; and the Treasurer added: "What he is saying is that he was pessimistic that the incomes would generate that amount of taxes."

If the Treasurer and his senior advisers have so little faith in the federal government figures, how can they in good conscience base their annual budget revenue forecasts on them? Since they have doubts and since they do their own calculations, why does the Treasurer not act responsibly and at least give us the numbers he thinks are correct and the revenues he believes will be generated, based on these figures?

What is the point of doing an expensive provincial forecast, which he believes is correct and which has apparently proved reliable over the last several years, and then ignoring it and calculating budgetary revenues on the basis of figures he does not believe are correct and have not been very reliable in the recent past? As I said, the very least the Treasurer can do is to inform us of the discrepancy and say what, in his opinion, we can in fact expect the revenues to be.

It is amazing to me, given this record, this blatant discrepancy in just a two-day period, how any sophisticated observer of the budgeting process in this province can have very much faith in the figures. The record, frankly, doesn't warrant very much faith. I think the Treasurer's credibility is increasingly going to be an issue in this House and in this province.

I want to discuss an area of very great concern to me. I have spent a lot of time looking at this and a lot of time studying it. It is the distortion on the capital markets by the access this government has had to public service pension fund money. It's a difficult area, it is complicated and most people won't understand it. It may not be an area of broad public concern, but we have to make it an area of public concern, because it shows very clearly how we have sold out our future options and how we have really reduced our flexibility. Starting in the years 1982 to 1985, when we have to go back to massive return payments of capital for the amounts we have borrowed in the past six or seven years, we are going to have a much worse time than we have today.

The province currently owes our pension funds about $12 billion dollars, made up as follows: Canada Pension Plan, about $7 billion; teachers' superannuation, $2.5 billion; OMERS, $1.2 billion; public service superannuation fund, $1.1 billion. These totals increase every year, as do the interest payments. Over the decade to March 1, 1977, interest was over $2 billion for CPP, over $600 million for teachers' superannuation, and almost $300 million for OMERS. This year the interest on our public debt soared to $1.2 billion.

The province has appropriated this large pool of capital funds, which has earned a lower rate of return than it would have, had it been invested in the Canadian capital market. Each year the Treasurer has spent an amount equal to revenue plus the amount available for borrowing from internal pension funds. I would suggest that this is not good fiscal management.

Last year the Ontario Economic Council endorsed our view that the Treasurer has no incentive to balance the budget any closer than the level of provincial expenditures plus the amount available for borrowing from the pension funds. The council's report singled out as the most important development affecting Ontario's finances in the next decade the dramatic reduction in the future availability of non-public funds, strongly suggesting government financing will be complicated in the 1980s by a decline in net financing from these sources.

Deceleration of growth of CPP funds has raised many questions on alternative financing methods, the most obvious being a contribution rate increase. Even this would only postpone, not eliminate, the day when the province could no longer rely on the CPP as a net source of new finance.

The council warned that provincial governments might respond to an increase in available funds by increasing provincial expenditures. That has been the story in the past. It's been an availability-fed demand—anything that's available, they spend. This distortion in recent budgeting is probably the most critical we've faced in the history of this province.

The council noted that the province pays an interest rate on CPP funds equal to the yield on long-term government of Canada bonds, below what the province would have to pay in the public market. The advisory committee of the Canada Pension Plan estimates this interest subsidy to be about 1.12 percentage points, and has recommended that provinces pay interest on these funds at a rate commensurate with the yield offered on securities sold on the open market.

This year, in a study on business investment in the province, the council stated that: "As the level of investment gradually accelerates, led by energy and resource developments, the need will arise to redirect a larger percentage of domestic saving from the government to the private sector and from short-term investment instruments to long-term investments more suitable for financing long-term capital investments.

"An increased flow of private savings from the public to the private sector could be encouraged in several ways. The largest flow to the government sector occurs through the medium of the Canada Pension Plan. Consideration should be given to depositing at least a portion of the net contributions in a special trustee fund in each province to be available to the private sector on a competitive bid basis. To ensure the maximum availability of such funds to finance business capital investment it might be desirable to limit the use of such funds to equities or debt with a term of 100 years or longer."

Business capital expenditure dollars have always been high-powered. They create additional employment income and output demand in other sectors of the economy. Yet available funds for business investment may become more and more scarce in the future because of the growing burden of providing adequate pension benefits.

Not only will government savings in the period ahead be biased downward by a decelerating rate of net savings from government-operated pension funds, but there will also be a downward bias in corporate savings arising from the accelerating costs of funding corporate pension plans and the large outstanding liability represented by the unfunded portion of these plans. That is a great worry, Mr. Speaker.

Thus the picture emerges. Vast amounts of government-operated pension fund dollars must be redirected to the open market to stimulate the efficient growth of our business sector. Also, there is a danger that available pension funds will become scarce in the years ahead, due to the trend toward indexing benefits in line with inflation—in itself reason enough to emphasize placing those funds on the open market.

The trend toward indexing increased pension funds benefits in line with inflation has forced Canadian pension funds to take measures to ensure that they are maximizing the rate of return on total fund investments. An increase of even one per cent in the fund's rate of return can greatly increase the value of the fund and its ability to meet future payments, according to the estimates of investment measurement analysts.

With the exception of a portion of OMERS funds, government-operated pension funds have been invested in non-marketable province of Ontario debentures at preferential interest rates. The public service superannuation fund in Ontario doesn't even go that far. It is deposited with the province's consolidated revenue fund and the net increase in the value of the fund at year end is given interest at the current long-term, 25-year bond rate issued by or guaranteed by the province. On March 31, 1977, the overall blended interest rate on all funds in the PSS account stood at 7.94388 per cent. The balance of the fund at that time was about $1.1 billion.

A joint study group looking into the investment policies of OMERS concluded that the funds should be invested in a broader range of Canadian securities to obtain a higher rate of return. We have endorsed this position, and, in fact, urged the government to follow this course a year ago. We are pleased to see that the Treasurer has seen fit to follow this course, even if it is in an extraordinarily moderate way.

[4:15]

It's just unfortunate that he delayed so long in deciding that these pension funds should be allowed to assist in the capital financial expansion projects of Canadian companies. If the funds had been available 10 years ago, we might have seen a more prosperous provincial economy. We would have seen less unemployment. We would have seen more real income. Studies have said that we are undercapitalized in this province—that we haven't put the money into capital that we need. This is one of the reasons we are not competitive on an international basis today.

In addition we would have seen a richer set of pension funds for our province, as evidenced by the rate of return on OMERS that is earned in the public market.

When we look back 10 years I can tell you the historians are going to be very critical of one Darcy McKeough. A historical look at Ontario's financial methods reveals that the province has relied almost 100 per cent on in-house pension funds to cover its deficit virtually every year. If the contribution rate remains unchanged, the Canada Pension Plan will run out by about 1982, by which time payouts will have risen to equal contributions, and the surplus cash flow for provinces will become negative.

The Treasurer has suggested doubling the contribution rate. In other words, he would like Canadians to double their payments to CPP, to subsidize a preferential borrowing rate to his government to gratify his spending desires.

The Treasurer has argued that the province has incurred a string of deficits for capital spending purposes—generally in long-lived assets. Here is his argument that all this money has gone into plant and capital.

Mr. O'Neil: The Conservatives have a great attendance over there.

Mr. Peterson: Total non-public borrowing over the last five years has been $5,271 million. Total capital investment for the same period has been $6,835 million.

The capital investment profile includes transportation vehicles—predominantly GO vehicles and subways, taking in streetcars and buses, with an average life expectancy of 20 years. Land is also included in this figure that he tries to justify. We have spent $614 million on land in the past five years.

Finally, there are financial assets. Mortgages, OMC, commercial loans for the development corporations, investments in Ontario Northland, UTDC, and equity investment in Syn-crude.

I challenge the Treasurer's argument. We question the validity of including some of these assets as long-lived, or whether a normal financial accounting would show them as revenue producing. We question the land banking expenditures. If we remove from the total figure transportation vehicles of $191 million, land purchases of $614 million and financial assets of $942 million, then capital investment over that five-year period would be a little over $5,088 million—less than the amount of the non-public borrowing over that period.

The Treasurer has expressed the belief that non-public borrowing from internal funds has been used to finance the creation of a productive and necessary capital stock. In my view, there is nothing productive about the 3,000 acres of land lying idle in the Kitchener area that the government may not even want any more, some 10,000 acres at Edwardsburgh, 20,000 acres in North Pickering, 13,000 acres in South Cayuga, or another 13,000 acres in Townsend.

In addition, consider the schools, libraries, universities and hospitals over the past five years that have taken $1.2 billion out of the Treasury. We are now finding the government turning around and wanting to close these institutions. They are now using a different formula—four beds per thousand—than they were then.

We are finding that we have an overbuilt system with declining enrolment they didn't anticipate. And the buildings that we do have are in the wrong place. It is simply an overbuilt capital system. The Treasurer tries to justify his spending habits on that story, but it is a very phoney argument. I think when we see the capital expenditure we made that are no longer necessary, that we are overbuilt, again history is going to judge this Treasurer very critically.

This year the Treasurer intends to spend about $1.4 billion on capital investments. That is equal to about 10 per cent of the budget. Yet we face a deficit of more than $1 billion.

In Mr. Roberts' era, he made capital expenditures too, but he didn't go to the market to raise the money for these kind of things, he balanced current revenues and current expenditures. My idea of a balanced budget is to match current revenues with current expenditures. That is not the Treasurer's idea.

We find that in the Roberts era they had capital expenditures; they didn't have massive deficits to do it. And it is not as if our obligations for capital expenditures are going to go away next year, or in the 1980s, when they have run out of these moneys. We are always going to have a demand for capital expenditure. We are going to have to go into new kinds of technology, into waste management and solar energy and that kind of thing, but that still doesn't entitle the government to go out and borrow money.

It is my view that the only thing that should be amortized in government is a revenue-producing device like an Ontario Hydro reactor or whatever. But because there is a constant and full demand for capital expenditures, they've got to be done by up-front financing which I am frankly glad to see the Treasurer is talking about in this budget. He is going to write these off immediately rather than putting all these phoney transactions through the capital aid corporations and whatever else that he had under his control.

As I said earlier, a second problem is that reliance on these funds has contributed to expanded government spending. When these sources are no longer available, the expenditure pattern will have to be dramatically altered. Imagine the reduction of expenditure necessary in this past fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, if the government had not had access to $1.5 billion in pension funds.

Last year, the Treasurer gave us a five-year forecast aimed at a balanced budget in 1981. By coincidence that is the last year that money will be available from the Canada Pension Plan—the borrowing source which has financed the lion's share of the Treasurer's deficits, and which this year will supply him with $910 million.

While budget paper A indicates that the Treasurer is moving in the right direction, he still has not addressed himself to the repayment of the pension fund debentures which will begin from 1982. That year $74 million will become due from teachers' super-annuation fund debentures. In 1986, $20 million in CPP fund debentures will become due. But, from 1987 on, repayment of pension fund debentures will be in the hundreds of millions of dollars for every year, surpassing $1 billion in at least two of the years before the turn of the century.

In other words, over and above normal expenditures and similar to no expenditure in our budget today, starting in 1987 the province will have to find a way to deal with the repayment of hundreds of millions of dollars in pension fund debentures. There's just no walking away from it. Even if the province simply refinances these loans, they are eventually going to become due.

Already this year of the $900 million the province will borrow from CPP more than $500 million will go to paying interest on that debt. How does the province intend to meet those debenture repayments, and does the Treasurer have a plan for the financial commitments he has imposed on this province? Does he intend to refinance his debts for ever, amassing interest payments and putting off the debenture liabilities for future generations to take care of? I don't know and, frankly, he doesn't know because I have asked him this question in estimates, and he says, "Well, we will let them worry about that later."

I have a chart listing the principal amounts of the pension fund debentures which will become due in the 1980s, and I would just like to read a few of these figures into the record because they are important to an understanding of the scope and nature of this problem.

In addition to the debentured amounts, we have these massive unfunded liabilities that appear in no account sheet, appear only by way of note on the financial statement.

We have given this a very serious look and have prepared a chart into the year 2002, which takes into account, as best we can determine—and I will grant you there may be the odd little error in here, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is essentially accurate—the principal amounts of funds repayable, starting in the year 1982, and, in addition, the amounts of unfunded liabilities that will have to be paid over this 25-year period. It's all here in front of me.

In 1978—this year—we are going to have to pay back $175 million; 1979, $198 million; 1980, $198 million; 1981, $198 million. Then in 1982 when some of the debentures become due we are going to have to add an additional $267 million to our budget; 1983, $193 million; 1984, $193 million; 1985, $193 million. Then when we get to 1986 the crunch comes. That year we will have to repay capital and unfunded amounts of $213 million; 1987, $701 million; 1988, $568 million; 1989, $605 million; 1990, $638 million; 1991, $530 million; 1992, $1.013 billion; 1993, $873 million; 1994, $800 million; 1995, $1,082 million; 1996, $953 million; 1997, $1,056 million. These figures are alarming, and I don't mean to bore the members of this House with them, but it's time they knew what the figures are doing to the future governments of this province and the kind of obligations they are going to have to deal with.

Let us not forget, in the process we have dried up every available source of money that we have now. They have two choices: Either they can refinance this by going to the public markets of this country, competing with private enterprise for capital, or they can raise the tax rate. If we raise the tax rate at those times—and it is my suggestion that we're at the economic tilt point right now; we don't have any more room to move—we're going to be robbing more initiative out of the private sector in this province than we are already. We can't afford to do that.

Mr. Reid: They're bankrupting us.

Mr. Peterson: The total for capital repayments, debentured liabilities plus unfunded liabilities, is in the range of about $15 billion over the next 25 years. That's the best estimate we are able to make, and I suspect it's a pretty accurate one. I have yet to see any plan or even any suggestion of a plan by this government as to how they are going to deal with it. They are counting on an increased growth rate and a larger budget, and they'll fudge it or hide it somewhere in that budget. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, thoughtful observers of this scene are seeing a long period of slow economic growth; they question some of the principles upon which our growth has been developed in the past. We're seeing rapid deindustrialization. We're seeing that our resource base is no longer as strong as maybe it once was. These premises about the economy growing automatically are not always accurate, and a thoughtful government is going to have to start thinking ahead a little more than we have seen to date.

I think I have dealt with the pension fund problem as best as I can, given the limited amount of information that is available on it, although a great deal of work was put into it. But I commend those numbers to the Treasurer and I urge him to develop some kind of a strategy to look at them. This information gives us, in my judgement at least, the context in which we are facing a budget in 1978. The Treasurer has put forward his proposal, and I would like, if I may, to deal with those proposals in a specific way and to look at our alternatives.

In this year's budget, the Treasurer is predicting a growth rate of some 4.3 per cent, which is a questionable proposition at best. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that last year he was off by about two percentage points. As I recall, he predicted 4.7 per cent; it ended up at 2.7 per cent. We all admonished him and told him he was a dreamer and he was crazy because everyone else in the country was predicting a lower growth rate but he, of course, thought everyone else was a little funny. In fact, most of the predictions came in about right.

This year, I'll grant, he's taken a middle course on this matter. There are certain estimates higher and certain estimates lower; it's impossible to tell. I suspect it won't hit the level that he has suggested. He is relying on an increase in consumer spending of 4.1 per cent, a decrease in business investment of one per cent—and that is a real worry—an increase in government expenditures of 1.6 per cent and an increase in exports of 8.9 per cent, to drag through this growth rate of 4.3 per cent.

What he is doing is relying on the devalued Canadian dollar as a short-term crutch—for short-term assistance. If the dollar was at parity today, he would be projecting a much lower growth rate, because he wouldn't have that export advantage—and surely the experience in other countries of this world tells us that at best it is only of extraordinarily short-term advantage to have a devalued dollar. I do not criticize any government or any business in this jurisdiction for taking advantage of that, but please let us not be so naive as to think that it's going to last forever. History tells us there are very quick structural adjustments to those kinds of things, and you lose your competitive advantage very quickly.

Mr. Laughren: He thanks God for the federal Liberals every night.

Mr. Peterson: The Treasurer himself has said that the Quebec crisis is worth five cents of that to him; he's suggesting we profit from this five-cent advantage because of the unity crisis we're facing in this country.

I can't argue with that—

Mr. Laughren: That's why he's grateful to the federal Liberals.

[4:30]

Mr. Peterson: —but I would say this, that these figures should prompt him to look at the structural problems and to look at some of the more basic problems that he at least alludes to.

In past years under other premiers and treasurers we were able to deal with Ontario's basic needs and problems ourselves. We did not have to depend on the external forces to bail us out. Joint federal-provincial initiatives are valuable and necessary, but they should not be our only hope; they should not be our only refuge. We must take positive, forward-looking programs right now. Surely Ontario, as the largest, richest province, has a role.

At the first ministers' conference in Ottawa, the Premier of Ontario presented a paper outlining the need to improve the business climate and increase private investment in this country. He stated that private enterprise needs more confidence and less uncertainty if it is to risk new capital investment to improve productivity and expand employment. He stressed that the first commitment must be to manufacturing—action to bring about increasing employment in manufacturing and an increase in the share of GNP. Yet this budget offers no incentive to stimulate the private sector or arouse confidence. There is not a word of encouragement for the manufacturing sector, let alone concrete measures, and absolutely nothing for small business. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Treasurer is part of the crisis of confidence in this province.

The small business sector particularly is capable of contributing a great deal to redressing our economic problems, being labour-intensive and able to deal easily and quickly with new and changing economic realities.

The contradiction between word and action is quite unacceptable to our party. We are very happy that the Liberal message—and unabashedly we have been talking about restraint in government expenditures for a long time in this party and we will continue to talk about that and we are glad, to some extent at least, that the Treasurer has seen fit to limit increases in spending to seven per cent. We think it is a laudable objective, as is his intention to introduce sunset provisions to cover certain government boards and commissions. My leader introduced a resolution in the Legislature last fall which provided for the termination of government agencies, boards and commissions, as deemed appropriate by the standing procedural affairs committee according to specified conditions.

We again are pleased to see the government implement our idea. However, in this case, if the Treasurer intends to apply his provision only to certain boards and commissions, he should quickly indicate which ones and what criteria will be used in deciding which ones will or will not come under review. We are not persuaded that the implementation of this legislation should be selective.

As the members recall, when I was doing the budget address last year we suggested four specific points to bring government under control. We suggested management tools which could be used by this government. One was zero-based budgeting. I am glad the Treasurer has alluded to that. He had made mention of it; we have no idea what his plans are.

We talked about sunset laws that we would bring in immediately. We talked about de-regulation that we would bring in immediately and a regularization of the various devices the government has under its disposal.

Very importantly we talked about—and I am glad the Treasurer mentioned it in his budget this year, and I hope he does something about it—bringing in an economic analysis of the impact of any law or regulation on this province. Because it is very important that we don't consider any law in isolation without considering the net effect throughout the entire economy.

Those were our four suggestions in last year's budget. I am glad that the Treasurer is looking at them seriously. He will certainly have our assistance in the implementation of those measures or in any similar legislation he brings in.

I want to talk about some of the specific suggestions that the Treasurer had—suggestions that by and large are okay as far as they go but reveal, in my judgement, a tremendous absence of leadership on the issue.

If the Treasurer was serious about resource industries in this province, he would have developed a comprehensive resource plan for the present and the future, rather than tossing out a mere $5 million token gesture to the mining industry. It is a step in the right direction but a very small and isolated one, which the Ontario Mining Association feels will not adequately stimulate the new mining investment and exploration in Ontario.

Let me get to energy conservation. If the government was really serious about energy—and I think very seriously that is one of the most profound deficiencies in government policy today—the lack of a comprehensive energy strategy. Surely the Treasurer could come up with more than a rebate of sales tax on storm doors and storm windows. That is just absolutely minuscule.

I can't sortie into this whole area of energy conservation. We gave the government a myriad of good suggestions. We have in our party, I'm proud to say, the most authoritative person in this House on energy, our critic from Halton-Burlington (Mr. Reed). He will continue to make suggestions. I look forward to the day when that man is Minister of Energy so that he can bring in the kind of positive, perceptive proposals he has. I will be talking more about energy later because I think it is so important. Obviously, we don't disagree with removing sales tax on some of these little items, but it's a long way short of any kind of meaningful policy.

The tax break proposed for the travel and tourism industry is long overdue, but again there is no co-ordinated strategy. What the Treasurer gives with one hand by eliminating sales tax on hotel rooms, he takes away with the other by increasing alcohol taxes and continuing the 10 per cent tax on so-called luxury meals. As part of this package, this tax should have been reduced to seven per cent and the dollar value of exempted meals should have been raised.

We should have been looking into gas prices along Highway 401. It's the first contact that many drivers of motorized vehicles have when they come into this province and they get ripped off immediately at the gas pumps along 401. No wonder we have created an inhospitable impression to people travelling into this province.

Mr. O'Neil: It's called highway robbery.

Mr. Peterson: The government has direct control over that. Why isn't it doing something about it? We've been pushing for years to have some kind of a look at the leases under which those gas stations are held. Why don't we introduce a gift certificate program for domestic travel that is exchangeable anywhere, almost a form of currency that could be used for just domestic operations? We need an overall policy and we need something to address the $650-million tourist deficit we have in this province.

Mr. O'Neil: Hotel rates have already gone up.

Mr. Peterson: My colleague from Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Eakins) has conducted a task force on this for the last six months. He has talked to many people in this industry and he has made himself the House authority on this particular issue. He has brought a considerable number of good suggestions as a comprehensive way of looking at these issues.

He has suggested, and I support it, putting the Tourism portfolio in with Culture and Recreation. That little squirt doesn't do that much anyway, except administer a few funds ill-gotten that he gets. Why don't we put that important portfolio in there so that a comprehensive strategy can be built in that area? And why don't we turn Industry and Tourism into Industry and Small Business, an important and neglected area of the provincial economy where we would really have a chance to do something? These are some of his recommendations. I look forward to the day when he is the minister and can implement all these things.

Perhaps the most blatant evidence of an empty promise contained in the budget is the research and development proposal. The Treasurer wants a strong incentive for new jobs in industrial research, development and design and has gone so far as to tell the Minister of Finance in Ottawa about it because he feels it should be a national program. He and his colleagues must be spending a lot of time talking to their federal counterparts these days because they have passed the buck in that direction a lot. Let me reiterate: Let us start at home. Let's introduce a program for research and development here in Ontario now. If and when the federal government decides to implement a plan, then they can join us or we can join them—it doesn't matter—but we can't delay when we have the most threatened industrial base of any province in this country.

Statesmen-like positions which concentrate on the national perspective, such as that taken by the Premier and the Treasurer in Ottawa last month, are fine but they cannot replace something positive and something concrete here in Ontario. We have several ideas. We think we should use the Ontario tax credit to bring about research and development for Canadian-owned companies in this province. We are not happy about the Treasurer's sellout to branch plants and to foreign-owned companies.

Mr. Laughren: Is this a Liberal speaking?

Mr. Peterson: We think we should be encouraging indigenous Canadian-owned research and development capacity here in this province. To that end, the government can use two mechanisms. It can use the tax credits, and we should be using that. We shouldn't be given generous tax write-offs for that kind of work here in the province. There's no reason we can't expand the Ontario Research Foundation. There's no reason they couldn't be using Wintario money, or some percentage of Wintario money, putting it out to private enterprise, allocating it on a fair and equitable basis to build an indigenous entrepreneurial talent here in this province.

Mr. Laughren: Is the Treasurer getting these alternatives?

Mr. Peterson: I will be talking more about this later because I think it's critical to the financial and economic future of this province.

The Treasurer maintains that his objective of balancing the budget in 1981 remains a viable goal. In the 1977 budget, when he first introduced his five-year deficit reduction plan, he said—and I want to read this in because it shows another major abdication, another major change from his previous philosophy. In the 1977 budget paper called Towards a Balanced Budget, he talked about the five-year deficit reduction plan. I want to quote to you from that, Mr. Speaker, because it's very important. He said:

"Achievement of a balanced budget by 1980-81 assumes the continuation of this trend, but it assumes that eventual elimination of the budgetary deficit will be realized via expenditure restraint and not via tax increases."

And what did he do? He turned around one year later and increased the OHIP premiums to $271 million; as I recall, that's the figure.

During the first year of the plan, both precepts were violated. In the 1978 budget, the Treasurer asserts that "discretionary revenue increases in this budget, together with continued expenditure constraint, have put the fiscal plan back on target." These revenue increases result from tax increases amounting to $429 million in 1978. What tax increases will be required in 1979 and 1980 to keep the plan on target? What will it cost the taxpayer in terms of jobs and disposable income? In other words, what will be the cost to the economy of balancing the budget? We agree with the objective, but there are other objectives in budgeting too. We need job creation, and the question we have to ask the Treasurer is at what price is he prepared to do this? He has used only the regressive OHIP rates of 37.5 per cent.

Mr. Laughren: You are getting these alternatives are you, Darcy?

Mr. Peterson: Also, in the first year, net cash requirements increased by $300 million, or 50 per cent, rather than decreasing by $200 million, so falling short of the target by $500 million. This year the target has been revised to show an anticipated shortfall of $200 million, or an increase in net cash requirements of 22 per cent over what was actually projected. In the light of the Treasurer's recent track record, we can expect net cash requirements to grow over the year.

For several reasons, as I pointed out, it is very difficult to have faith in this Treasurer and that ministry.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we've seen a major shift in policy. The Treasurer is willing to sell off the province's assets in his desperate attempt to balance the budget. His decision to begin selling the $1 billion portfolio of mortgages held by the Ontario Mortgage Corporation to the private sector can best be likened to a firm that starts selling off the office furniture to avoid bankruptcy. This is of great concern to me because my conception, as I said earlier, is of a balanced budget to match current revenues and current expenditures.

When asked in the House last week if, in balancing the budget in 1981, he anticipated selling off provincial assets to do so, the Treasurer said, "No." He has dramatically changed his budgeting in order to hit that god of the 1981 balanced budget, with a major change in position that, I'm sure, he thought would slide through. I can tell you right now, Mr. Speaker, if he is the Treasurer in 1981 he will balance the budget, because he will have sold off the $1 billion portfolio of mortgages or whatever. I liken it to selling off the Robarts library for $50 million—assuming you can find a market for it—and then putting that money into current revenues and reducing your deficits by that amount.

If one looks at this budget carefully, on the non-budgetary side, one sees a major change this year. We are seeing more receipts than disbursements by selling off this money. The Treasurer has decreased his net cash requirement by fudging below the line rather than above line. It's a major change from generally accepted accounting principles, and accounting principles which the people of this province have become used to. That is one of the very major changes that I see in this budget, and it disturbs me.

I have never said I'm against divesting unproductive assets but I am against not bringing revenues and expenditures closer into line, and I will never accept those kinds of mechanisms as an excuse to balance the budget.

The Treasurer also intends to manipulate a deficit figure to suit his purpose and has led us into thinking the government's deficit position was better than it is.

[4:45]

Ten years ago the Smith committee on taxation formulated a rule that the province should maintain debt at the ratio of approximately nine per cent of provincial domestic products. This year's budget will lead us to believe that the net debt as a percentage of gross provincial product is surpassing the Smith standard for the first time, hitting 9.5 per cent. In fact, net debt passed the Smith standard in 1976, registering 9.7 per cent of the provincial domestic product. To camouflage this fact, the Treasurer altered one of the bases on which he reports annual net debt position. Provincial domestic product and gross provincial product are not the same standard. GPP is a broader indicator, taking into account indirect taxes and external investment income.

The advantage to the government of making this reporting change is made clear in the 1976 figures, the first year the switch was made. That year net debt as a percentage of GPP was eight per cent while the percentage of provincial domestic product was 9.7 per cent and therefore more than the acceptable level. According to the Smith standard of PDP, the figure this year is really 11.1 per cent.

The Treasurer is reported as saying that the Smith committee standard really is no longer relevant. If that is the case, why has the Treasurer gone to such lengths to deceive us? Sneaking in a change in the reporting base to make his miserable debt position appear better is irresponsible. And this is not the only change from generally accepted accounting principles or from historical principles—to alter the figures and alter what we are getting today.

Finally, increases in expenditure in the area of debt servicing—interest payments already accumulated as well as additional deficits this year—are alarming. Net debt has now reached 9.5 per cent of the gross provincial product and 72.1 per cent of annual revenue. Interest payments of $1.2 billion are now taking 8.5 per cent of the budget, an increase over last year of 15.4 per cent, the largest dollar increase in the budget.

In addition to decrease the net cash requirements he took advantage of a one-time $70 million accelerated cash flow through the payment of corporate income tax. I am not against that. That's a reasonable accounting device—it's a reasonable thing to do in the circumstances.

But let us not be deceived by his figures. Had he not flogged off the assets to the tune of $120-$125 million, had he not had this accelerated cash flow on corporation income taxes of $70 million, his real net cash requirements would be some $200 million higher than he projected. Rather than being only $200 million off his projection in 1977, as he says, in fact he is $400 million off that projection according to generally accepted accounting principles.

We are going to be watching this very closely and we are going to be pointing out as best we can, with as loud a voice as we can summon—

Mr. S. Smith: You have been caught, Darcy.

Mr. Peterson: —that these aren't reasonable in the circumstances.

The Treasurer's performance in other areas has been no less disappointing. Personal income tax revenues declined by $525 million, or 21 per cent over the 1977 estimate. Corporation income tax dropped by $119 million, or 14 per cent; mining profit taxes fell by $70 million, or 175 per cent; retail sales tax by $66 million, or three per cent; and the motor vehicle fuel tax by $17 million, or 20 per cent—some terribly shoddy budgeting throughout.

There are, however, two aspects of this budget that cause me even greater distress than what I was talking about. I want to talk about those in some length. First is the increase in OHIP premiums and second is the lack of measures to deal effectively or meaningfully with any kind of permanent job creation in this province.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are going to make it by 6 o'clock so don't despair.

The OHIP rate increase of 37.5 per cent is, in our judgement, unconscionable. At a time when pay increases are being held to six per cent, how does the government expect taxpayers to cope with this increase in health insurance premiums which total 100 per cent in two years? Two years ago a single person paid $132 per year in OHIP premiums and families paid $264 per year. In May those figures will be exactly double—$264 for single people and $528 for families.

Mr. Haggerty: What does the AIB say?

Mr. Peterson: It is a regressive form of taxation, hitting those who can afford it least and who cannot afford it equally. Even the premium assistance provisions are cruelly unfair. The taxpayer earning one dollar more than the allowable assistance amount is hit by the full weight of the increase. If premiums must be raised—and the Liberal Party believes there are far better ways of dealing with the health care system that is financially out of control—they have to be increased on a progressive, graduated basis.

Mr. S. Smith: And we mean business on this one, Darcy.

Mr. Peterson: The new premiums will be more than double those in effect anywhere else in Canada. Only three other provinces use premiums or special payroll taxes to help pay health care costs. The province with the next highest premium is British Columbia, where the annual single rate is $90 and the family rate is $225 per year. That is 34 per cent and 43 per cent respectively of Ontario's rate. Alberta and Quebec also charge their taxpayers separately for health care coverage. The other six provinces finance their programs through general tax revenues, thus eliminating all premiums.

According to the Treasurer, premiums will now cover 34 per cent of health expenditures. In Quebec, the figure is 13 per cent; in Alberta, 10 per cent and in British Columbia, 15 per cent. However, the discrepancy between Ontario and the other provinces is far greater. The Treasurer, as usual, has manipulated the figures to serve his purposes. He has not taken into account the $415 million paid by the government in premium assistance. If this figure is included, the portion of health costs paid by premiums is more than 46 per cent. No study or committee I am aware of in this province has ever recommended that premiums pay anywhere nearly as large a percentage.

The burden of this increase to every sector of society is awesome. The Ministry of Labour analysed 258 municipal agreements in 1977 and, of these, 234, affecting 97.6 per cent of the municipal employees under these agreements, provide for 100 per cent OHIP coverage. The impact of the increases on municipal budgets across the province will be significant. In Metro, the cost will be about $2.5 million. Chairman Paul Godfrey noted that Metro's 1978 budget, which had called for a 5.2 per cent increase in spending, would now have to be amended to 5.5 or 5.6 per cent. The regional municipality of Niagara estimated that the increase would cost it about $170,000; the city of St. Catharines said about $77,000 this year.

School boards will also feel the blow. The higher premiums will cost the Metro school board another $1.4 million annually. Board officials claim the tax increase would have been even higher, if they had not set aside $400,000 in anticipation of possible OHIP increases. Outside of Metro, the Lincoln County Board of Education calculated increased costs of $225,000 this year. Municipalities and school boards, already reeling under the effect of reduced transfer payments provided for under the again revised Edmonton commitment, will almost certainly now be forced to increase their property tax rates to cover this additional cost. They have been hit coming and going this year, and if they have been hit, so has the taxpayer. Hospitals, already under severe budget constraints this year, will be even harder pressed. We can anticipate staff and service cutbacks as they attempt to absorb this additional cost increase.

I had a small businessman—not exactly a small businessman, but not in big business—phone me: He said: "This OHIP increase is going to cost me about $5,000 this year. I am probably going to have to lay off at least one person to make that up because I just can't afford it in my costs." These are the real effects. We are talking about the effects on government and on the taxpayers, but it is going to have a real effect throughout the economy of this province because of the very high burden of payroll taxes we are putting upon the employers in this province.

The Treasurer, by way of reassuring us, says that almost three-quarters of the increase will be paid for by employers. However, employers cannot simply absorb such additional costs. There are bound to be adverse effects. A spokesman for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, whose members employ about 800,000 workers in Ontario, said the premium increase would cost employers an extra $122 million this year. He predicted that some companies would pass on the increase to consumers by raising the prices of their products. Others may decide it is cheaper to invest in automation than to spend the money on new workers because machines aren't paid fringe benefits, such as OHIP premiums.

Mr. S. Smith: The government is going to have to rescind it, just like the energy tax of John White.

Mr. Peterson: The self-employed will be forced to pay the entire amount themselves, in addition to the increases that will be passed on to them by the other affected sectors of society. No one benefits from this increase but the provincial Treasury. Seventy-five per cent of this year's announced tax increases will come from the OHIP boost. This will bring the revenue from OHIP premiums to a total of $1.12 billion in fiscal 1978-79, making it the third-largest single source of budgetary revenue in Ontario, trailing only the personal income tax and retail sales tax. Even the corporate income tax will bring in fewer dollars.

The Treasurer also contends that premiums retain a visible link with the cost of services. How can this be true when three-quarters of Ontario residents have their health insurance premiums paid for by employers? Premium increases do not address the problem of cost awareness, nor do they act as a deterrent to unnecessary doctor or hospital visits. How can he even talk about this visible link when anyone can go to any doctor or take advantage of any medical service in this province, without even having to show any proof or without any calculation of how many provincial services he's consuming? It's the most ill-conceived system I can possibly imagine. Very quickly, in order to provide that visible link that the Treasurer is talking about, we must use far more acceptable and responsible methods than he has ever suggested. Certainly one of them is letting every person know how much he consumes in provincial services, and not just how much he pays. I suggest that the Treasurer's visible link provided by this mechanism will be questionable at very best.

Clearly the health care system is in need of a major examination and overhaul. Raising OHIP premiums in a non-election budget is not the answer. Last week my leader asked the Treasurer to delay implementation of the increase pending consideration of a report on alternative, cheaper and more equitable methods of financing that portion of OHIP costs currently paid by subscriber premiums.

Subsequently, my colleague the member for Renfrew North (Mr. Conway), the Liberal Health critic, petitioned that the annual report of the Ministry of Health for 1976-77 be referred to the standing committee on social development so that the current system of financing OHIP can be examined with a view to finding alternatives to the present scheme. This petition was granted.

We hope that this committee will present more equitable and just alternatives to the present health financing system. It is absolute folly for the government to persist in inflicting this iniquitous burden of sharply increased OHIP fees on the taxpayers. Another solution must be found—and must be found quickly. We have got to look at more progressive ways of financing this system. We are expecting answers from this committee and we are expecting that the government is going to act on some of these answers.

I want to turn now, if I may, to another very major area of concern; that is, the absence of job stimulation measures and, to that end, we have many proposals. The absence of job stimulation measures is another aspect of the budget which is offensive by virtue of its total disregard for the plight of some 316,000 Ontarians who are currently out of work. In January the unemployment rate in Ontario was 7.9 per cent. Forty-three per cent or 137,000 of the unemployed were young people—those under the age of 25. Equally appalling, the number of unemployed in their peak earning years (25-54) who are often the sole support of families, rose by 47,000 between November and January, to 158,000, an increase of 42 per cent over two months.

Yet for the second consecutive year the Treasurer, acknowledging that unemployment will continue at about present levels in 1978, has not brought forward even one permanent job creation proposal. Again he is abdicating responsibility to the federal government. He passes the buck up to the feds and down to the municipalities—just as long as it doesn't rest with him. In Ottawa he and the Premier unveiled a paper, entitled Immediate Action for Job Creation, which proposed 10 measures, either calling for federal initiative or making no recommendations for implementation at all. We need leadership here in this province, and surely that's the government's responsibility.

Last year the Treasurer forecast 89,000 jobs would be created in 1977. Actual job creation figures show about 73,000—a shortfall of 16,000 against his own 1977 budget forecast and 27,000 against the famous Brampton charter. This year, having failed to introduce either meaningful job creation programs or measures to stimulate the private sector, he blithely predicts 101,000 new jobs will be created in 1978. Like most of his predictions, I'll have to see it to believe it.

To be fair, the Treasurer does address himself briefly in this budget to youth unemployment. He proposes to buy off our young people for one more summer. Of the 60,200 jobs projected for 1978, more than half are designed to last only 16 weeks. Only the Ontario Youth Employment Program has been expanded to run for 25 weeks. This means that most of the unemployed youth in Ontario, representing almost 15 per cent of the labour force in that age group, will be back on the job market in the fall and the rest will join them two months later.

While the Ontario Career Action Program functions year-round, the jobs are for only 16 weeks in most cases, though a very few are for 32 weeks, and carry no guarantee of future employment. The operation of this program came in for severe criticism in the report of Provincial Auditor for the year ended March 31, 1977. The report cited case upon case of poor administration and mismanagement which has resulted in financial waste and abuse of the program. Since the funding for this program will be increased by 33 per cent this year, we advise the government to clean up its act and heed the Auditor's recommendations so as to be able to reap the greatest possible return from this program.

The government's job programs for youth are not inexpensive. It will cost $2,090 to create each junior ranger job; $3,000 for each youth care for senior citizens job; and $3,685 for each job under the regular summer replacement program.

[5:00]

Given a spending increase of $13 million this year to generate an additional 12,700 jobs for youth, the government is already conceding that of the 700,000 students expected to be on the job market this summer, at least 100,000 won't find jobs, probably more. Last year, at the peak of the summer, there was a shortfall of 159,000 jobs for young people. The Treasurer admits in his budget that more permanent measures are needed, and he urges the federal government to find ways of providing them.

This government has abandoned a whole generation of young people. It has also written off the adult unemployed. The Treasurer is so callous that he dares to justify his failure to fight unemployment on the basis of maybe the most offensive statement I have ever seen in a budget anywhere. And I want to read this into the record because I find it absolutely incredible. This is what he said on page 4 of the Ontario budget: "In reading this staff study, one reluctantly comes to the conclusion that the taxpayers of Ontario would see only marginal returns to the provincial Treasury when government stimulates the economy through general measures. Nearly all of the budget dividends, arising from the resulting job creation, flow to federal coffers in the form of savings on unemployment insurance."

So he is saying that because the taxpayers here don't get anything back he has no obligation to create jobs. It is a discrepancy, because I have heard the Treasurer on many occasions arguing that there is only one taxpayer in this world, be it federal, municipal or provincial. Now he is differentiating between the Ontario taxpayer and the federal taxpayer—even though they are one—saying that there is no obligation for the Ontario taxpayer to help out with the unemployment insurance. I find it incredible that he would take that view. I would urge him to dramatically change his position on that and take some responsibilities.

Mr. S. Smith: It's a disgrace.

Mr. Peterson: Not only does he not create jobs; he is actively pursuing a policy that is costing Ontario jobs. A study, which we demanded the government undertake, to examine the impact of their program of retail sales tax exemption for machinery and equipment, estimates that last year and this year Ontario will lose over 10,000 jobs because of the exemption. I must point out that we supported that exemption. The rest of the country gains almost 18,000 jobs as a result. There is supposed to be a turnaround in 1981.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party of Ontario will hope that is true, and we will continue to support it. But I want you to recall that it was us, the Liberal Party, that insisted on that review rather than blindly take the figures that the Treasurer would seem to give in the circumstances.

The Treasurer has always contended that tax exemptions to industry create jobs. What went wrong? The answer is that the tax exemption on machinery encourages manufacturers to replace people with machines, because it costs less.

This year the loss in jobs is expected to be even greater. It is estimated that some 6,078 additional jobs will be lost in Ontario as manufacturers replace people with machines. But because of the increased productivity of Ontario industry, about 12,635 jobs will be created in the rest of the country.

We will support that, Mr. Speaker. We will be looking for some action in the very near future.

We need short and long-term solutions to this very dismal job scene today. We direct all of our efforts to the long term. We may go under before we get there. The government has abdicated its obligations to the people of Ontario for the present, in the hope that problems will resolve themselves. We need to concentrate on short-term job creation programs, and we have to that end many suggestions that I want to get into now, as well as the structural problems that I want to discuss thereafter.

For our young people, our education system and guidance facilities must be brought into line with current labour market realities. Our schools have failed to teach the skills and technology necessary to succeed in our economically-lagging province. In a recent survey by the OECA, "meeting job market needs" was selected by Ontarians as the aim of education at the elementary level by 27 per cent, at the secondary level by 45 per cent, and at the post-secondary level by 51 per cent.

We must be honest with young Ontarians about the bleak job prospects in certain areas. They must not be misled into believing that higher education guarantees higher-paying work. The traditional jobs just aren't there any more.

Why have we continued to train more and more nurses and teachers, when our obvious needs will be for geriatric care workers and environmental specialists?

To take only one example—the medical field. About 3,500 nurses graduate in Ontario each year. Even though many hospitals hire nurses on a part-time basis, unemployment in the nursing profession stands between 10 per cent and 20 per cent. Year after year, we lose a high percentage of Canadian-trained nurses to the United States and to other parts of the world. The need for improved guidance counselling has been widely recognized by professionals for at least 10 years, as has the vital necessity of extensive and accurate manpower planning. Surely the government has the facilities and available information to project future employment needs. Students wishing to take specific courses should be made aware at the outset of their chances of obtaining a job in their chosen field. Graduation day is no time to learn that through a lack of knowledge of future job prospects one has made the wrong choice when one entered university or community college.

All students must be provided with this information before they embark upon a course. They must be made aware of the prospects of finding employment in the career of their choice. No punches can be pulled in this connection. Enrolment must be encouraged in areas where there is an identified shortage and limited in areas where there is a surplus of qualified people. Let us not forget the approximately 73 per cent of Ontario's young people who don't go to university or community college. They desperately need help to bridge the gap between school and work and to contend with the want ads that state "experience required." They need a chance to acquire skills which will enable them to earn a living in today's competitive world.

Since 1963, at about the time the Premier became Education minister, five government reports have strongly recommended expansion of alternatives to formal, institutionalized education and training. In this year's Throne Speech, the government spoke of giving the highest priority during the year to evolving a training program geared to the manpower needs of industry. After some 15 years of study—of talk—there is still no definite plan and no program. The situation cries out for more action, and all we are offered is more talk.

The existing apprenticeship program in Ontario is little known, badly organized, inconsistently funded and not broadly applicable. During the last election campaign, we in the Liberal Party came forward with a proposal for an improved and expanded program. We proposed that employers wishing to train apprentices would register with the industrial training branch of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, which would establish and monitor standards for training programs. Applicants for apprenticeship would also be registered and directed to potential employers, who would themselves decide which applicants are acceptable for training. This matching service would be a substantial improvement over a situation where each potential apprentice must, without assistance, seek out an employer to provide training.

During on-the-job training, the apprentice would be paid by the employer at a salary level which gradually increased towards the amount paid to fully-trained persons in the particular occupation. Each year the apprentice would return to a community college for a period of three to four weeks for classroom instruction and examinations. During this time, federal financial assistance would be available to many apprentices under the Adult Occupational Training Act.

The program would be promoted through guidance counsellors in the schools and through Canada Manpower centres. Employers would be urged to take advantage of the excellent opportunities to hire and train reliable, comparatively inexpensive and increasingly skilled apprentices. The industrial-training branch would ensure that no employer abuses the program as simply a source of cheap labour.

At the end of the training period, an apprentice would receive a certificate of apprenticeship, acknowledging that he possesses certain defined skills and knowledge. At that point, he may choose to remain with his present employer, he may seek employment elsewhere or he may even establish his own business.

As an integral part of this program, a labour market information service would be established to determine future manpower requirements as well as a vocational counselling service to ensure that young people are fully aware of their job prospects and opportunities in various occupations. How many high school students are aware that present forecasts to 1982 indicate a high demand for electricians, machinists, carpenters, plumbers and skilled workers in manufacturing?

While we believe this basic plan would meet the training needs of many occupations, we realize the special requirements of the various skilled and technological trades must be taken into account. The recent study commissioned by the Industrial Training Council concluded that "on-the-job training lacks consistency, uniformity, and standards." On-the-job training costs were found to be quite high, due partly to loss of productivity because a journeyman's time is taken up with coaching the trainee. The study also indicated a very high turnover rate. Only about 29 per cent of those who begin a training program ever become graduate journeymen.

Clearly, an intensive, longer initial period of community college classroom instruction and examinations would be a tremendous asset for many skilled occupations. Possibly, a front-end community college term of six or nine months would be appropriate, followed by on-the-job training, interspersed with annual three to four week sessions at college.

An extensive and effective apprenticeship program is not only important to meet the needs of young people in today's competitive job market, it would also help to alleviate what is fast becoming a serious shortage of skilled tradesmen and artisans in this country. This shortage has developed because many of the highly skilled immigrants who came to Canada from other countries are approaching retirement age.

Last year, a confidential study of 15,207 skilled tradesmen in Toronto, Hamilton and Guelph showed that 87 per cent were more than 40 years of age, while only 2.6 per cent were 30 to 35. It's interesting to note that 73 per cent were foreign-born and 72 per cent were foreign-trained.

If this country—if this province—is to survive and prosper, we desperately need to benefit from the talents and skills of all of our people. We cannot risk losing great numbers of Ontarians to other provinces and other countries because there are no career opportunities at home.

Our proposed apprenticeship program is one way of increasing our skilled labour force, and preventing a brain and talent drain out of the province. Increased research and development would improve our economic and manufacturing position, and at the same time provide challenging career opportunities for Canadians.

We would introduce without delay a 100 per cent tax credit for companies' investment in research and development. The government's proposal in the budget would appear to be hanging fire until the federal government makes a move. We would implement such a program immediately. However, only Canadian-controlled companies would qualify for the scheme, contrary to the Treasurer's view.

We believe we must be concerned about a branch plant economy. We believe we must develop an indigenous research and development capacity here in this province. Only research and development carried out in this country, by Canadians, will result in real benefit to Canadians.

Mr. Laughren: How do you vote federally?

Mr. Warner: He doesn't.

Mr. Peterson: We certainly don't vote NDP, I'll tell you that.

Mr. Laughren: That wasn't an answer—

Mr. Peterson: Provision of R and D support to branch plant companies usually results in the export of the end product of the technological innovation to the parent firm.

If the Treasurer is not going to use Ontario funds for health care and other things, why don't we put a percentage of them into research? That's compatible with health research plans and everything else. We need to beef up, in terms of grants through the Ontario Research Foundation—

Mr. Cassidy: There you go gambling with our industrial future.

Mr. Peterson:—and that's a meaningful and important place. There is that mechanism in place whereby we could start operating immediately. We must have the courage and the imagination to identify these areas, and to encourage research and development. Ontario and Canada are far behind other jurisdictions in this field.

Mrs. Campbell: You'd better wait until he comes back. He's gone out to find more answers.

Mr. Haggerty: He's gone out to borrow more money.

Mr. Peterson: With the surplus of bright young minds in Ontario we have a tremendous opportunity to pioneer in new areas of manufacturing and economic activity, in the development of renewable energy, waste management techniques and environmental protection.

We are all well aware that the days of cheap energy are over. At this time of high unemployment, we have a unique opportunity to combine an effective job creation program with energy conservation measures, which are very important in view of the rapidly escalating energy prices and possible future energy shortages.

Some more of our job creation suggestions: We would institute compulsory insulation standards for all new buildings, residential and commercial, combined with a comprehensive program of thermal upgrade, retrofitting and insulation for all existing structures—certainly retrofitting of all public buildings.

These energy conservation measures would create many job opportunities. This work is highly labour-intensive. The technology is available; the side-benefits in fuel saving are enormous and would, on their own merit, make implementation of these proposals well worthwhile.

Incidentally, to encourage public acceptance of such a plan, we would amend the Assessment Act to ensure that no property tax increases would result from energy conservation alterations to buildings, be they residential or commercial.

To further stimulate job creation in the construction industry we would invest pension funds in the private sector. We talked about that earlier. This would lead to increased residential construction, creating construction jobs and employment in industries which serve the construction industry.

In order to encourage further investment and development, we would reduce red tape and planning delays. We would curtail the power of the Ontario Municipal Board to review zoning bylaw decisions of municipalities with demonstrated planning capability.

This party has advanced for some time, and will continue to advance, the cause of Ontario's small business. That provides a tremendous opportunity to strengthen our economy and to increase job opportunities.

In pursuit of a viable "buy Canadian" policy, we would, as stated earlier in our policy paper New Directions for Small Business, set a target of 40 per cent of government contracts and subcontracts to be awarded to small business within a three-year period. The most effective way to help small business is through our purchasing power—to buy from them. That's what they want. That's far more effective than any other device we can employ. We have that mechanism in place, through my associate's bill, and we look forward to that bill becoming law in this province.

Mr. S. Smith: Darcy's committed only to big business.

Mr. Peterson: Needless to say, we would endeavour to follow a "buy Canadian" policy right across the board for all government purchases as much as possible.
[5:15]

Finally, in the last election and innumerable times since, our party has proposed the creation of much-needed jobs by paying 20 per cent of the salary for each additional worker hired by a small business. We would do this up to a net gain in previously unemployed people of 10 persons per firm for a three-year period for salaries up to $10,000 per year.

Mr. Eakins: Common sense.

Mr. Peterson: With some 316,000 Ontarians out of work, with our manufacturing industry in a state of critical decline, with our huge trade deficit and our dismal record in research and development, we believe it is time for government to start to pay attention to the backbone of our economy—to the small businessman.

Small businesses are more labour-intensive than larger operations and can create more jobs more cheaply and more quickly. They are our best hope in our fight against rising unemployment. Small businesses, because they are less closely tied to international market forces, have a better chance of counteracting the effect of world-wide recession. They can, for instance, improve our balance of trade position by substituting Canadian-made products for imports.

Small businesses are generally more energy efficient than large capital-intensive firms. And this is crucial at a time when we must learn to conserve our energy supply, and increase our efficiency.

Inevitably, energy price—and, in fact, energy supplies—are going to have a major impact on the future of this economy, and country, domestically and in the international arena. Rising costs are making large, highly-automated capital and energy-intensive centralized enterprises less viable. This country's future economic development, the standard of living of all Canadians, will depend to a large extent on our ability to become more self-reliant and conservationist.

New technology, such as solar heat, lends itself to small operations and small-scale equipment, with a considerable potential for export to other countries, particularly developing nations.

Small businesses provide much more fertile grounds for innovative research and development in the often shifting environments of government and large corporations where risk taking is often overcome by inertia. Yet government policies generally leave small businessmen at a serious competitive disadvantage. Fast write-offs in equipment and machinery, for instance, tip the economic scales in favour of capital-intensive big business, and the whole system of payroll taxes—contribution to workmen's compensation, and unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan, and, yes, OHIP—also hits hardest at the labour-intensive small business.

In order to enable small business to continue and to expand its role in the economy, government must provide assistance through incentives and programs specifically designed to ameliorate the problems facing this sector. Such action is long overdue. We have the answers to that question. We are desperately hoping that this Legislature will follow our lead. The time has come when we must make a definite and a firm political commitment to such a small business policy.

We are looking forward to the clause by clause debate of that bill early this session. In that bill, we attempt to redress some of the ills that we have in the society. We will be prepared to amend that bill to redress some criticisms shown against that bill. The bill, as I mentioned earlier, establishes a target of 40 per cent of government purchases, contracts or subcontracts to be placed with small businesses which are defined as independently-owned or operated and not dominant in the field.

At present, the government does not even know how much of its business goes to these firms because they group them together with branch plants operating in Canada.

Also, the bill establishes a small business subcontracting program to ensure that small businesses are considered fairly as suppliers and subcontractors to recipients of large government contracts. Any firm awarded a government contract of over $500,000 would designate a small-business liaison officer for this purpose. The bill provides that a small business liaison officer may already be a member of the firm and most firms would not likely employ an additional person for this purpose, although we did not want to interfere with any firm that may decide to do so.

The bill establishes a small business committee of the Legislature to review and report on all aspects of small business activity warranting legislative action. This committee would, of course, receive commissions from interested businessmen and others. The bill empowers the ministry to encourage small businesses to form co-operatives for the provision of central services or the purpose of jointly obtaining raw materials, equipment inventories, supplies or benefits of research and development or to undertake and use applied research.

Very importantly, the bill gives preference to Canadian-owned and managed business in the allocation of research grants and loans by the government, and requires the minister to assist small business to obtain government contracts for research and development.

There are two aspects of the bill that have been particularly controversial. I was going to discuss these today but the time is running a little tighter than I would like it to and I'll probably have to leave them out. But when that bill does come to committee, I am sure that our member, the fine member for Victoria-Haliburton, will have many ideas on how to amend this bill to improve it and to answer some of the objections that have been expressed.

I just want to say one thing: The new minister has taken very strong objection to this bill, saying it will involve a very large bureaucracy and it's going to take a great deal of time in handling this. We can tell from the American experience that this is not the case. It has been operational there for 25 years; it has been successful and it is running well. Surely there's enough experience there that the minister shouldn't be so hesitant; he should stretch a little bit and use his imagination and creativity to make this a workable proposition in this province.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity that I have had to point out some of our specific job creation mechanisms, both for the short term and for the long term—some of them hitting the structural problems and some of them to create work tomorrow—because it is our view that this has got to be a high-priority objective. Sadly, it has been neglected by this government.

Mr. Bradley: All of them beneficial.

Mr. Peterson: I have two more areas that I want to deal with, and I'll try to be considerate of the members; they've been sitting here a long time—the ones that are here. I want to talk about structural problems. I want to talk about things that we think need to be done immediately.

It is interesting that in all the banter and exchanges we have had with the Premier over the last week since the budget, he has kept saying, "We'll be interested in your solutions; we'll be interested in your ideas about how to handle some of these problems." Mr. Speaker, as specifically as we can do, we have presented some of those ideas here.

As I said earlier, energy is an area that concerns us a great deal. We think we can make major inroads into assisting job creation and building a better economy in this province if we attack this problem squarely on the nose. The critical factor in determining the future course of Ontario's economy is the supply of energy.

Traditionally, energy consumption in Ontario has accounted for about 30 per cent of all the Canadian consumption. Canada, incidentally, now uses more energy per capita than any other country in the world: 350 million Btu, compared with 145 Btu in Europe and 335 Btu in the United States.

A full 80 per cent of the province's energy is imported. Provincial oil production meets less than one per cent of our requirements. Almost all our oil and more than 90 per cent of our natural gas come from western Canada. Most of our coal comes from the eastern United States.

For 1977, out-of-province energy costs have been estimated at $3.9 billion—that's $3.9 billion directly transferred from the Ontario economy to the United States and western Canada to create jobs there. All of this increases our cost of living here. We must move to rectify that very large number.

Ontario's total provincial expenditure on energy in 1976 was about $7.5 billion; divided by sector, that figure breaks down this way: transportation, $2.9 billion residential, $1.3 billion; commercial, $1.1 billion; industrial $1.9 billion; losses and own use, $0.3 billion.

The government has estimated that oil and gas price increases in 1975 had a substantial effect on Ontario's economy: A $1.50 increase in oil prices raised the consumer price index for Canada by 2.3 per cent on a full-year basis, and a $1 increase in the price of a barrel of crude oil reduced gross provincial product by $100 million in 1961 constant dollars. Every $1 increase in the wellhead price of oil, along with respective increases for natural gas, means $450 million flows out of Ontario per year.

Energy price increases have had a significant effect on economic growth in Canada and other industrialized countries. For example, in 1974 it's estimated oil price increases accelerated inflation by 3.5 per cent; a further 4.4 per cent inflation occurred as a result of 1974 price changes being delayed into 1975 and 1975 price changes. Indications are that in the long run, when energy costs double, there is a five per cent increase in the cost of manufacturing output in Canada and only a three per cent increase in the United States.

The days of low-cost energy are fast disappearing. By the mid- to late 1980s there probably will be a constraint, either physical or political, on the world's crude oil supplies. Prices will be forced upward; our economy will once again be jeopardized. The major oil companies estimate that oil will come off the tar sands—out of the Syncrude project—at about $20 a barrel. At present, the price per barrel of oil in Canada is about $11.75. World price is about $15.10 Canadian. Let's not forget that due to OPEC control of a large percentage of world oil production overnight shortages could occur and could be deliberately created.

There is no question that Ontario will face serious energy supply problems within the next decade. Last year the Ontario Economic Council stated that movement of domestic energy prices toward world prices would stimulate domestic supplies, encourage conservation and the development of new technologies. The council warned that if these technologies are not forthcoming, increased reliance on imported energy would lead to further depreciation of the Canadian dollar and higher energy prices in Canada. We were also warned that policies designed to prevent adjustments to the higher energy price would create distortions elsewhere in the economic system.

The Premier takes great delight in running around this province. I remember in the last campaign he was in the great riding of London Centre with the defeated Tory candidate saying that the Liberals are advocating putting the price up to the world price. "If the price of your heating oil and gasoline goes up, you can blame David Peterson, your provincial member," he said. That is so much nonsense it's incredible. The Premier would rather bury his head in the sand and deny these things are going to happen. We don't favour an increase in the price any more than anyone else does, but we must understand the inevitable, and it's going to come. It's our very strong view that we must take a defensive strategy, being as we are high consumers and being that we have very little indigenous resource here.

Mr. Cassidy: It's like the Liberals opposing wage and price controls in 1974.

Mr. Peterson: We need a very strong defensive strategy based on conservation and based on renewal. Does the leader of the NDP have something to say?

Mr. Cassidy: That's like the Liberals opposing wage and price controls in 1974.

Mr. Peterson: That wasn't a very high-calibre interjection.

We could reduce our problems to a great extent by cutting back on our energy consumption. It has been estimated that one megawatt of electricity can be insulated for half the capital cost of generating one megawatt. Each year the energy bill for government buildings in Ontario is estimated at over $200 million. This could be substantially reduced. A 20 per cent saving in the residential sector would save some $260 million. A recent study of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources indicates that a primary energy demand growth rate of two per cent a year is clearly attainable, if extensive conservation measures are implemented. Historically, Ontario's annual growth rate in energy consumption has been five per cent. Reducing this to two per cent would mean a saving of approximately $900 million a year by 1980.

In 1975, four industries—pulp and paper, industrial chemicals, smelting and refining, and iron and steel mills—consumed 43.6 per cent by value of energy used in Ontario manufacturing. That year the manufacturing sector, which employs 923,000 people, used in excess of $791 million in energy, an average of about $860 per employee. That year, by comparison, the cost of energy consumed in pulp and paper mills averaged out to approximately $3,958 per employee. To demonstrate the effectiveness of energy conservation, according to the office of energy conservation, some Scandinavian pulp and paper producers operate on zero net energy through efficient production techniques and by making their own energy—by burning bark and chips, for example.

We in the Liberal Party have recommended a comprehensive compulsory set of standards to ensure these kinds of things. We want compulsory insulation standards for all new buildings, residential or commercial, thermal upgrading, retrofitting and insulation of all existing structures. If we brought our existing housing stock up to 1975 federal standards, we could save 36 per cent of our residential heating bill or the equivalent of 824 million gallons of oil, which would mean well over $400 million annually. That would cover OHIP premiums right there and the Treasurer wouldn't have to worry.

Another major factor in the solution of our energy problems is development of renewable energy sources, such as energy production from industrial and renewable waste, biomass production, solar energy and methanol. Conservation and the development of renewable energy sources are opposite paths from the development of conventional energy sources with an expanded nuclear component. Unfortunately, neither the federal nor provincial government has seen fit to acknowledge the urgent necessity of choosing these alternatives as opposed to the conventional and less realistic approach.

Ontario's commitment to renewables and conservation is totally inadequate. For 1977-78 it is roughly $5.15 million. The provincial office for energy conservation has a base budget of $4.3 million. It's not a very substantial sum, given the size of the province.

Last year the government of Ontario scrapped its low-interest loan program for home insulation and its policy paper, Ontario's Energy Future, does not accord high priority to conservation or renewable energy sources. The paper anticipates that only two per cent of energy requirements will be met by renewables by the year 2000. The United States, by comparison, has set a goal of 25 per cent of input from renewable resources by that date.

Even a conservative figure of, say, six per cent of Ontario's energy needs being supplied from renewables by the year 2000 would save us some 60 million barrels of oil. Based upon the predicted price for next year of $14 per barrel, this would mean a saving of $840 million. I have to use these numbers to show that there are profound economic advantages to our province's taxpayers by instituting this kind of program immediately.

Last December, the former Minister of Energy told this House that the budget for renewables in 1978-79 would be $4.4 million. In fact, it is only $2.4 million, approximately the same amount spent by the Ministry of Government Services last year on long-distance phone calls. Long lead times are required for development of new sources. The government's present allocation of funds would not even permit development of alternative energy sources sufficient to supply two per cent by the year 2000.

No doubt this totally inadequate budget reflects the extent of the government's commitment to renewable energy source development. Compare this pathetic commitment with the estimate of $180 billion of new energy investment required in Canada by 1990, equivalent to 5.2 per cent of the gross national product, as opposed to 4.5 per cent at the present.

We are all aware that the high unemployment threatens the stability of our province. Greatly increased efforts in conservation and renewables would minimize Canada's and Ontario's reliance on oil imports and slow down the demand for capital for high technology energy development, whether for new oil and gas supplies or nuclear power. This would free resources for other capital projects, for creating more jobs and for providing more economic opportunities.

US figures indicate that solar technology will provide about 2.5 times more jobs per unit of energy than nuclear. The Science Council of Canada estimates that sales of $50,000 in renewable energy technology equipment results in one person-year of employment. By comparison, the investment in the petroleum industry per employee is about $108,000. Moreover, conventional energy sources involve placing our energy production in the hands of fewer and fewer people.

One of the most important economic benefits to be derived from immediate implementation of a conserver-renewable source energy strategy is that the investment required can be channelled into jobs that will be created here and into products that can be manufactured here in Ontario. As the Science Council has stated, "A conserver approach will lead to the introduction of new technologies, new opportunities for Canadian business, and unprecedented challenges to the entrepreneurial spirit."

The greatly increased employment opportunities created by a conserver-renewable source energy program will help to offset the negative effects of rising oil prices in this connection. The government has not developed a program which produced any significant results. The Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs has estimated that as a result of the price changes that year, Ontario lost 22,000 jobs in 1974, 16,000 jobs were lost in 1975 as a carryover, and 19,000 jobs were lost as a result of 1975 price increases.

We have a number of specific recommendations to make on this question of energy conservation. My colleague, the great member for Halton-Burlington, has talked about some of these things. I think it's important that we give these suggestions to the government at this time for their consideration, because I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, we would enact all of them very quickly if we were the government:

1. The institution of compulsory insulation standards for all buildings.

2. All energy consuming devices, including houses in this province, would be energy efficiency rated.

3. The production of low-grade heat by the use of electricity to be targeted to off-peak hours through incentive pricing. If there is sufficient demand, we know we can reduce demand on this system by at least 20 per cent.

4. The hydraulic division of Ontario Hydro to be moved into the conservation program and Ontario Hydro to be directed to appropriate sufficient funds to develop the remaining hydraulic pump and power storage facilities in Ontario in keeping with proper environmental concerns and the government encourage the private sector to develop those sites which are of no interest to Ontario Hydro.

5. The energy pricing structure to be changed to promote conservation and to more truthfully reflect the cost and the "lifeline concept" for electrical pricing to be adopted in Ontario. The lifeline concept is a reasonable fixed price for basic family electricity needs. Hydro rates are increasing so rapidly that senior citizens and people on fixed incomes will soon be unable to afford electricity for even essential purposes. A basic minimum allotment would be established for all residential customers. For those who use little electricity, hydro bills would be low. For people who use more than a minimum, they would pay progressively more as consumption rises.

Mr. Wildman: That's a good idea.

Mr. Peterson: 6. The government should subsidize co-generation units by industry to the extent of cost savings realized through the reduced need for transmission lines.

Mr. Speaker, I just got a very rude note from my colleagues here. "We'll stick it out to 6 o'clock, if you buy us dinner"; signed by an unattractive number of my colleagues. Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to lock all the doors of this House right now? I don't want anybody weaseling out at the last minute.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: We'll take up a collection if you'll stop now.

Mr. Nixon: Listen, you'll learn something, Harry.

Mr. Peterson: Suggestion 7. The government should make a major commitment to renewable energy source development.

8. All Ontario Hydro's future thermal expansion should be tied to the utilization of cooling water.

9. The Ministry of Energy and the Ministry of the Environment to combine to facilitate the construction of energy-producing units from combustible garbage—that might even include some of the cabinet members over there who are making a fuss.

10. Cutting rights agreements for wood fuel should be developed by the Ministry of Natural Resources in order to convert those species and qualities of trees considered undesirable for other forms of processing into usable products. These rights may apply to those areas where timber cutting rights are currently held and where timber has previously been cut, and be allocated to individuals on as highly dispersed a scale as possible, recognizing that good management in the forests is better served by the cleanup of undesirable species.

11. The government to study immediately the use of wood distillation for the operation of remote generating facilities currently operated by diesel power, and the application of such direct installation for other internal combustion use.

12. Tax exemptions for energy conservation to extend to all forms of heat reclaimers, chimneys and any renewable methods of producing energy.

13. Insulation of renewable energy equipment such as solar panels or insulating materials should not increase the tax assessment of a property.

14. That various incentives for energy conservation of renewable energy generation for homes, farms and businesses be found, such as tax credits and low-interest loans.

15. Careful study having been given to the use of methanol for fuels for auto transportation, the government should construct a pilot methanol production plant, using biodegradable waste—such as government reports and some of the budgets that it has produced in the past.

Those are just some suggestions; there are so many more. We have talked about them at great length and we will continue to talk about them. I just want to make this point: Apart from the ethics involved, apart from the fact that this is the way the world is going to have to go, and particularly Ontario, there is a more important point that may appeal to the Treasurer's crass nature; we will actually save money.

In the long run it will be to Ontario's benefit. We will actually create more jobs. It is in our financial self-interest, apart from anything else, to do these things. I would urge him, in his great strength in the cabinet, with his great sense of charity, with his great leadership, to use his good offices to provide that kind of thing; because when he has the numbers, he will understand that it is in his interest. I am hopeful today that through the sheer power of my oratory I have been able to convince him to embark on some of these kinds of programs.

I have a little more here I would like to mention, although we are running out of time. Do I hear from my colleagues that they want to hear a lot more?

Mr. Nixon: Hear, hear; give them the full load.

Mr. Peterson: As you can see, Mr. Speaker, we have been trying to be positive and constructive today, and to lay out some of our specific suggestions to some of the structural problems facing this provincial economy. I want to talk about industrial policy or industrial strategy or some kind of vision, some kind of place that we have got to start moving the Ontario economy, in our judgement, immediately. I want to just take the last few minutes to give this House the outline of that particular strategy.

The Science Council of Canada has suggested we are now witnessing sluggish industrial development, perhaps even a de-industrialization of Canadian society. How did this happen, where did we go wrong?

Mr. Wildman: Did you say sluggish industrial development?

Mr. Peterson: The answer lies in the history of Canadian industry, its development in this century, its desire for and dependence upon foreign investment. Canadians encouraged foreign investment, and it served to facilitate and quicken the growth of the Canadian economy in the early decades of Confederation.

Until the First World War, British portfolio investment predominated. However, since the 1920s American investment—initially portfolio and then direct—increased and replaced British investment in Canada. This development is significant, because while portfolio investment implies ownership, usually through the buying of shares or bonds, but not control, direct investment invariably leads to both ownership and control.

Today 57 per cent of Canadian manufacturing is under foreign control. The latest data available for Ontario from Statistics Canada shows that 61 per cent of the province's manufacturing sector was foreign-controlled in 1972. All indications are that the current figures would be worse not better.

Much of this control is in the hands of American multi-national corporations through branch plants established in Canada in order to overcome the tariff barrier to goods entering this country. Designed to serve the domestic market, they frequently discourage the emergence of Canadian-owned firms in the same industry.

The essential problem of a branch plant economy such as ours is that we cannot control it, and the economic objectives of the multi-national corporation seldom coincide with those of Ontario or the rest of Canada. As the report of the task force on the structure of Canadian industry in 1968 found: "A parent firm may expect its subsidiary to behave in such a way as to maximize the global profits of the multi-national enterprise rather than the profits of the subsidiary itself. The interest of the host country, however, is in maximizing the efficient growth of the subsidiary."

This concern of the parent firm may, for example, require a normally financially successful subsidiary to show a loss for a number of years, permitting the parent to be the locus of profit accumulation. Since transactions between parent and subsidiary occur within the firm, rather than within the marketplace, intercompany prices and profits are open to considerable manipulation by the parent firm. Profits may be expatriated, and their tax benefit lost to this country. The effect of a branch plant economy on the structure of domestic industry is by now well established—too many firms producing too many product lines at high unit cost.

Mr. Wildman: Are you against the branch plant economy?

Mr. Peterson: However, foreign multi-national corporations are not interested in development of Canadian world markets or in making the Canadian economy more efficient and globally competitive. This would be a direct contradiction of the purpose for which a branch plant was established in the first place.

Mr. Wildman: At the behest of the federal Liberal government.

Mr. Peterson: Above all, a branch plant economy inherently entails low levels of research and development undertaken by subsidiaries in Ontario. Canada spends far less on R and D and is far more dependent on foreign sources than most countries in the western world.

Mr. Wildman: It's a federal Liberal policy.

Mr. Peterson: As a result, our economy grows slowly these days and does not develop. In 1973, Canadian spending on R and D equalled only one per cent of gross national product, ranking 14th on a list compiled by the OECD. The United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany ranked at the top with 2.4 per cent, 2.1 per cent and two per cent respectively, while only Ireland and New Zealand ranked below Canada.

Largely as a consequence of this low level of spending, entrepreneurial skill and expertise are inhibited. For the multi-national, it is more economical to develop technology at home, exporting know-how and professional managers to its Ontario subsidiary. This may initially appear to have some advantages for us in terms of receiving a ready-made package and, therefore, not needing to invest in such development ourselves.

Mr. Wildman: Would that you would speak to your federal counterparts.

Mr. Peterson: However, in the long run this process serves to increase our dependence. Why are you yapping so much back there?

Mr. Martel: It is your party that brought it in.

Mr. Peterson: It hinders our ability to initiate future independent research and development, for we have neither the base nor the expertise to build on. Because technology is supplied directly to the subsidiary, we may ultimately receive no usable benefit at all. Further, the subsidiary often receives only a part of the total production package, thus increasing its dependency. Frequently, the package is old or mature technology because technology sales to subsidiaries tend to occur in the late growth or mature phases of the production life cycle. Technology received when it is mature is often deprived of the skill-intensive stages of product and process development.

Industrial R and D in Canada has been largely marginal and applied, rather than innovative or basic work. This has wide repercussions for our international position. As the report of the task force on the structure of Canadian industry observed: "Power accrues to nations capable of technological leadership, and technological change is an important source of economic growth." The lack of indigenous, innovative industrial research and technological development in this country, and especially this province, has placed us at a distinct disadvantage in terms of global competition.

Another consequence of the small amount of R and D done here has been the emigration to the United States of Canadian-born, Canadian-trained scientists and engineers. This is a circular problem—a vicious circle. Lack of ongoing research work eventually compels Canadians to seek better opportunities elsewhere, yet we need these experts to rectify the problem.

Ontario's industrial structure must be strengthened and time is of the essence. We do not believe that nationalization or buying out foreign-controlled manufacturing enterprises are viable solutions. Independent, Canadian-owned and controlled companies must be encouraged, developed and supported with the full extent and power available to government. Our policy paper on small business suggests many mechanisms. Government leadership and assistance are crucial in the context of cohesive industrial strategy. We do not have the resources to waste. John Shepherd, executive director of the Science Council of Canada, has pointed out the difficulties which will result from uncoordinated or inadequate planning.

In the boom years of the 1960s, government-sponsored R and D programs were developed with little regard for existing industrial capacities or potential markets. Even in that golden decade, we steadily lost market positions at home and abroad. "In this context there seems to have been little appreciation of the relationship between technology and the entrepreneurial function, or between innovation and the industrial structure, or between the entrepreneur and the business environment.”

By the end of the 1960s government, sceptical about the payoff for R and D, reduced its expenditures. Industry reacted to market uncertainties and to the curtailment of government support by cutting back its own R and D spending. The resultant loss in potential development is tragic. A co-ordinated, comprehensive strategy must be developed in consultation with the private sector and put in place immediately. The components must be clear; the sector and their potential must be identified. Ideally, we need several years' lead-time before initiating any moves to free trade as a result of the GATT negotiations. This is unlikely. We must, therefore, do as much as we can as quickly as we can.

The Liberal Party has long called for a clear and comprehensive industrial strategy for the province of Ontario. Regrettably, this government's performance at the first ministers' conference in Ottawa, and its Throne Speech, amount to an abdication of responsibility for such long-term planning to the national level. The federal government, in its turn, seems content to rely on internally produced selected sector profiles which are more descriptive than prescriptive, and do not provide a comprehensive context or strategy. We believe a national industrial policy is long overdue. Time is running out, and we cannot risk further delays. We are prepared to address ourselves to these issues.

The emphasis of an industrial strategy for Ontario must be on the manufacturing sector. However, we realize the important inter-relationship between this sector and the resource and service sectors. These very connections stress the crucial role of manufacturing. In recent years the secondary manufacturing sector in Ontario has declined rapidly; and as it goes, so goes the capacity to add value in our resource industries and viability to our service sector where one and a half jobs are lost for each manufacturing job that disappears.

According to John Shepherd, 450,000 manufacturing jobs were lost to the Canadian economy between 1970 and 1977. Without a well-developed manufacturing sector, the service sector will not mature and will thus be deficient in the quantity and quality of its work it is able to offer.

Many of the services provided by the service sector are directly or indirectly provided to the manufacturing and resource sectors. If Canadian manufacturing is allowed to become insignificant, the prospects for a healthy service sector are slight.

In the past we have relied heavily on our resources as the basic strength of the provincial economy. We can no longer afford to do so. Canada and Ontario are becoming resource-deficient, particularly in the area of energy. The layoffs at Inco and Falconbridge have shown clearly the danger of reliance on our resource sector to the exclusion of the manufacturing and service sectors. We must have a more diversified economy.

It is noteworthy that $1 worth of resource products typically embodies 6.5 cents worth of wages, while $1 worth of manufacturing goods generates 20 to 35 cents in wages. Therefore, by following a policy of over-emphasizing resource exports, for every job created by resource exports, the Canadian economy may lose the potential for anywhere from two to five jobs in the manufacturing sector.

Mr. S. Smith: Very sobering thoughts.

Mr. Wildman: Talk to Jack Horner.

Mr. Peterson: The interconnections are evident as is the importance of secondary manufacturing as the focal point. A study by the federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce points out: "The importance of the manufacturing sector is highlighted in that it purchases over one-third of the primary products as inputs, over one-half of manufactured products, three-quarters of repair construction, 15 per cent of utilities and more than 16 per cent of services." Another study demonstrated that 60 per cent of service industry output went to consumer demand. Incomes generated in the goods-producing sector play a major role in stimulating consumer demands for these services.

Mr. S. Smith: If there is one word we need in our industrial strategy, it is "manufacturing."

Mr. Wildman: Talk to Jack Horner.

Mr. Peterson: Some 923,000 people, or 25 per cent of the Ontario work force, are directly employed in manufacturing which contributes 29 per cent to the provincial domestic product. Fifty-one per cent of the national sales take place in Ontario. The importance of the sector to the health of the Ontario economy is obvious, as are the reasons for its precipitous decline. There was a loss of 27,000 jobs in manufacturing in Ontario between 1974 and 1976, and officials of the provincial Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs forecast a continuing decline in the share of employment derived from this sector.

What is needed now, what has been lacking in this area, as in so many others, is government leadership. And I am sure you would agree with me on that, Mr. Speaker. It is not enough for the government to say that it is up to the private sector. The government must create a climate of confidence. More important, in consultation with business and labour groups, it must clearly chart out the course it wishes the economy to follow and actively support that course with all the resources at its disposal. The time for drifting is long past.

Mr. S. Smith: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Peterson: The primary objective of industrial strategy must be job creation; decent jobs providing a reasonable standard of living and leaving some kind of environment for our young people today and for the generation that follows.

In January of this year there were 316,000 unemployed persons in the province of Ontario, a rate of 7.9 per cent. In 1977, 282,000 more people were in the labour force than there were jobs available. This situation can only be expected to worsen when about 200,000 young people are entering the labour force every year until a peak of about 214,000 is reached in 1981.

A strong, innovative manufacturing sector provides for a whole range of jobs, from highly-skilled technicians, engineers, scientists and craftsmen, through white-collar professionals to semi-skilled and unskilled workers.

Second, an industrial strategy must promote an indigenous research and development capability. Its seminal role was recognized in the 1976 International Economic Report of the President of the United States in which he said: "Technological innovation is the primary determinant of economic growth and competitiveness." To remain internationally competitive in a world that has undergone dramatic structural shifts and changes in the post World War II period—with competition between the industrialized nations of the west intensifying at unprecedented rates and with rapidly industrializing Third World countries entering the fray—technological innovation is the only answer.

Mr. S. Smith: That's right. Manufacturing and technological innovation.

Mr. Peterson: It is the only payoff.

Mr. S. Smith: That's the answer.

Mr. Peterson: Technological change today is concentrated in the secondary manufacturing sector.

Mr. S. Smith: I hope the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) is listening to that.

An hon. member: He's reading the comics.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: You're right. It's coverage of your convention.

Mr. Peterson: It is fast becoming our only advantage vis-à-vis the very inexpensive labour supply of the Third World countries. However, as I said earlier, it is an advantage not readily available to Canada. It will be difficult for Ontarians to become technological innovators on an international scale. It is to a great extent a new game for us. It is, however, imperative for us to achieve this objective.

Mr. S. Smith: The Treasurer is beyond redemption but the Minister of Industry and Tourism should listen.

Mr. Peterson: I'm glad the Minister of Industry and Tourism is here today because he is quite new in his portfolio and I have actually had a couple of months more experience—

Mr. S. Smith: He still has a chance to learn; the Treasurer is beyond redemption.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Don't get mean fellows. I am trying to be sweet and lovable, but I can change.

Mr. Peterson: The impact of technology on industrial performance is clearly demonstrated in a comparative analysis of US technology-intensive manufacturing industry versus all other manufacturing, undertaken by Michael Boretsky of the US Chamber of Commerce. He found that technology-intensive industries experienced—and it is very important to understand this—45 per cent faster growth in output, 88 per cent higher growth in employment, 38 per cent greater growth in productivity and 49 per cent higher growth in exports.

Mr. S. Smith: John Rhodes is the velvet hand in the iron glove.

Mr. Peterson: Similarly, American economist E. F. Denison has estimated that technology accounted for 45 per cent of US economic growth from 1929 to 1969.

More recently, at a Financial Post conference on research and development, Dr. Thomas Vanderslice, senior economist US General Electric Co., released the findings of a study commissioned by his company to gauge the impact of R and D on the economy. The key findings were—

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I don't know whether this is a speech or a chant.

Mr. Peterson: 1. High-technology industries grew nearly three times as quickly as low-technology industries; 2. Productivity in high technology was twice that of the low; 3. High-technology industries were more inflation resistant; and 4. Employment in high-technology industries in the US has been growing almost nine times as fast as the low-technology industries.

Mr. S. Smith: Manufacturing, technological innovations research and small business; that is the answer. But you don't even know the question.

Mr. Peterson: According to Vanderslice: "The same kind of favourable ratios prevail in terms of international trade. The positive contribution of high technology products is up to a plus of over $25 billion a year."

Mr. Wildman: We all agree.

Mr. Peterson: "By contrast, the US trade balance in products of low technical content is down from a breakeven in 1960 to a $16 billion deficit."

Mr. Nixon: Shame.

Mr. Peterson: The Ontario government must lead the way to technological growth by putting personnel as well as financial resources and incentives at the disposal of the private sector. Government must also assist in making choices. We cannot compete in everything. Together with the private sector, we must pick areas in which to concentrate our efforts.

Third—and I am drawing close to the end—an industrial strategy must generate and support indigenous entrepreneurial and managerial talent. This objective is linked to the research and development goal. Technological change takes two forms: The design of new or improved products; or the development of processes to increase productive efficiency. In both cases, the impetus to change usually comes from the entrepreneur—the person who has the ideas, is willing to take risks, both financial and personal, and has the managerial ability to see the project through.

Entrepreneurs are crucial to the survival and growth of small business, and an intrinsic part of the makeup of small and medium-size enterprises. Two separate studies commissioned by the United States Department of Commerce found that: 1. Out of 61 important innovations and inventions selected randomly from all possible choices during this century, more than half were the work of independent inventors and/or small firms; 2. of major inventions from the decade 1946-55, more than two-thirds were the results of work by independent inventors and small companies.

Ontario does not have a thriving entrepreneurial class, and we must develop one. The Liberal Party outlined the steps necessary to foster the growth of entrepreneurial skills in our policy paper New Directions for Small Business and our bill; we think that is one of the answers to this very difficult question. Small businesses are very crucial in that that they are labour-intensive. The small business sector employs between 50 and 60 per cent of all working Canadians.

The final objective of our industrial strategy is to support rationalization in selected areas. In some instances mergers are the most appropriate mechanism. We believe that a healthy economy should consist of a mix of small, medium and large firms, since each enterprise has a different optimal size in terms of efficiency and effectiveness depending on its product and the market it serves.

These, then, are the goals of an industrial strategy for Ontario. They provide a framework within which a strong manufacturing sector, with a capacity to compete internationally can be developed in Ontario. It is not a question of choice, it is a question of economic necessity. I would say to the Treasurer, don't be staggered by the size of the task, he must start immediately.

Members will all be happy to know that brings me very close to the end. I thank you for the opportunity of participating in the debate. We have tried to be constructive. Since I have been elected to this House, the party under the leadership of the member for Hamilton South and the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk has always tried to be constructive and provide a plausible and possible alternative. We are not in the habit of introducing spurious motions of no-confidence; we aren't in the habit of blocking first reading of various pieces of legislation just to get a little free press; that isn't our style.

Mr. O'Neil: Tell him how it is.

Mr. Peterson: We consider ourselves the alternative government. Frankly, we have no competition for that particular role, I hasten to add. That is why we are not, at this time, going to introduce a motion of no-confidence.

Mr. Martel: Aw, bring the government down.

Mr. Peterson: We reserve our right to do that.

Mr. Martel: Bring them down.

Mr. Peterson: The very troubling issues of the economy and the lack of permanent job-creating measures—

Mr. Martel: More huffing and puffing.

Mr. Peterson: —and particularly this OHIP matter, are of very serious concern to us.

An hon. member: You're on automatic pilot.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Here is your chance to pump some money into the economy, have an election.

Mr. Peterson: We have taken the leadership in putting this matter, which has not been reviewed by a legislative—

Mr. S. Smith: Move a vote of no-confidence. Bring the government down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Peterson: Would you bring my leader to order please, Mr. Speaker?

We have taken the leadership in putting this matter, which has not been discussed by a legislative committee of this House for 10 years, we have assumed leadership in sending it to that committee. We are going to make constructive, positive suggestions in that committee. If the government does not see fit to mold their views somewhat, to change somewhat, to the suggestions of this committee, then believe me, no fooling around, we are prepared to introduce a motion of no-confidence and we will live with the results of that. At this time, we are going to give the government, as we have tried to do today, the benefit of our advice, the benefit of our assistance, towards building a positive kind of a program for this province.

Mr. Warner: The Treasurer is chuckling.

Mr. Peterson: In our opinion, it is not to the benefit of the people of this province to go to the polls tomorrow or have an election immediately. The government learned that lesson last time, and we don't think it's the answer to these problems.

Mr. Wildman: You more than bend over backwards.

Mr. Peterson: It is only by working creatively and effectively together that we can progress, and in order to do that the government's going to have to be a lot more receptive than they have been in the past.

Mr. Nixon: Oh, a lot more.

Mr. Martel: You're in danger now, Darcy.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity of participating.

On motion by Mr. Martel, the debate was adjourned.

On motion by Hon. Mr. McKeough, the House adjourned at 5:58 p.m.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

COMMONWEALTH BOXING CHAMPION

Mr. Makarchuk: Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had the opportunity in this Legislature to honour the Commonwealth. Today, with the consent of the members, I wish to introduce to them a distinguished guest, Gary Summerhays, the Commonwealth light-heavyweight boxing champion who is in the Speaker's gallery.

Mr. Summerhays, who, of course, hails from Brantford, won the Commonwealth title in a bout in Melbourne, Australia, defeating Tony Mundine, the reigning Commonwealth champion.

Mr. Martel: He will sock it to you.

Mr. Makarchuk: In discussions yesterday with the Australian council, I was advised that our man in Australia was definitely the underdog in view of the long record of victories scored by the defeated champion. I'm sure all members would agree that the victory is a credit to Mr. Summerhays and it is something of which all of us can be proud.

Accompanying Mr. Summerhays is his wife, Teresa. Also in the gallery with the Summerhays is the coach and manager and another well-known Brantford resident, Mr. Frank Bricker. Mr. Bricker has been coaching boxers of all ages for many years. His record of coaching and managing a series of successful boxers is probably unmatched by anybody else in Canada. When you combine Mr. Bricker with Mr. Summerhays you have an unbeatable combination, and if anybody would like to dispute that, they'll probably take care of you in the hallway. With Mr. Bricker is his wife, May.

Mr. Warner: He should take on the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough).

Mr. Makarchuk: I also wish to acknowledge at this time the contributions to the winning of the title by members of Branch 90 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Brantford, who provided the encouragement and training facilities for boxers trained by Mr. Bricker. I'm sure the members will join me in extending to them our congratulations and wishing them more success in the future.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTRY

CROWN TIMBER ACT

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, later today I will introduce amendments to the Crown Timber Act. These amendments are, for the most part, based upon the report of the timber revenue task force. Detailed discussion and analysis following public review of this report has resulted in some amendments to the original recommendations.

The purpose of the amendments is to accomplish two principal objectives. First, they will enable the establishment of a system of Crown charges that is responsive to the cyclical nature of the forest industry. Second, they will ensure that revenue from the cutting of Crown timber is generated in an equitable manner.

Specifically, the Crown Timber Act will be amended to authorize regulations to be made under which the Crown dues to be paid by order in council licensees will be indexed to commodity selling price indices and will be responsive to such indices.

In addition, the Crown Timber Act will be amended to amalgamate the present management charge and forest protection charge into a single area charge. Currently, the management charge and forest protection charge are $27.60 for each square mile of productive forest lands under licence. By regulation, the amalgamated area charge will be fixed effective April 1, 1978 at $41.40 for each square mile of productive forest land under licence, and will increase at the approximate rate of 10 per cent per annum for four years.

The proposed amendments to the Crown Timber Act will also enable regulations to be made under which compound interest of one per cent per month will be charged on overdue invoices for Crown charges. The regulations will also prescribe an objective rule for determining the due date of an invoice. Generally, invoices for Crown charges will be payable on the last day of the month following the month in which the invoices are prepared.

These amendments will provide better protection of the Crown revenue and are in line with currently acceptable business and accounting practices.

A great deal of thought has gone into the foregoing matters. However, we recognize that there may be certain adjustment problems for individual firms during the early phases of implementation. It is our intention to closely monitor the effects of these amendments to determine if they create deterrents to good forest utilization practices or operating procedures. Should these occur, steps will be taken.

ORAL QUESTIONS

CIVIL SERVICE COMPLEMENT

Mr. S. Smith: If the Premier (Mr. Davis) won't be in, I'll ask the Treasurer a question. Referring to table 7 of budget paper C, would the Treasurer care to explain to us how it is that he has been referring to a reduction of over 4,000 people in the civil service over the years since 1971? In fact, the Premier spoke to the Canadian Society of New York on May 17, 1977 and said: "We have increased government efficiency and in the last three years reduced our civil service by 4,200." Can the Treasurer reconcile that with table 7 of budget paper C which shows only a reduction of 1,350 since March 1, 1975, when the Premier has made a claim of 4,200?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The Premier and I—and I think members generally—have referred in the last couple of years to complement positions within the civil service. The complement positions at any given time were perhaps never all filled, but there was a reduction of something like 4,200 over a three-year period or two and a half-year period in the approved complement positions.

Members opposite and others also put questions on the order paper from time to time concerning contract staff, unclassified staff. In last year's budget, although it may have been separately, I believe the Chairman of Management Board (Mr. Auld) indicated we were switching over to an entirely new system of dollar control and not just complement control.

The figures which are available in table 7 were not available before. For a whole variety of reasons, we didn't have a complete spotlight on the number of people working at any given point in time. What the board does now—I think on the last day of each month—is take a snapshot, as they call it, on the number of employees, full- or part-time, contract or otherwise, within each ministry. That, in turn, happens within each institution or office of the government. The figures, which are very gratifying, would indicate, that although it was suspected people were simply reducing their classified staff and increasing unclassified staff, this has not happened.

Since March 1, 1975 to December 31, 1977, two years less two months, there has been a drop in total employment of 1,350. These figures were collected on a yearly basis to begin with and it is only within the last 15 months that the board has been collecting the monthly figures.

I can give members a further figure, for example, as of the end of January. The total figure which includes "other," that is, provincial police, uniformed security guards and so on, is now 84,613 as against 85,994 in December or as against 85,096 at the end of January 1977. If the member is interested, the Chairman of Management Board, I am sure, either as I say in the budget or subsequent to the budget, explained the full details of the switches that were being made.

The simple answer to the question, the quick answer, is that the Premier or others were talking about approved complement positions whereas this table for the first time refers to total staff at any given moment on staff.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary, does the Treasurer not agree that it is somewhat misleading for the Premier to speak in New York of "having reduced our civil service by 4,200," when by the Treasurer's own admission now the only reduction has been 1,350 and the remaining 2,900 people who are no longer there were never there in the first place? He is eliminating nothing from nothing.

Mr. Mancini: Right on.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, I don't feel that it is inconsistent.

Mr. Roy: In the used car business it is called puffing.

[2:15]

Hon. Mr. McKeough: If the member would examine the words used, he would find the words "complement positions" as opposed to "staff."

Mr. S. Smith: Not in the Premier's statement.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We recognized in making this change that there would be some confusion. I recognize that the Leader of the Opposition is embarrassed by these figures—

Mr. S. Smith: Oh yes, embarrassed at having you as Treasurer.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —because during this same period, his kissing cousins in Ottawa have gone on and on and on, adding staff.

Mr. Ruston: Is that the best you can come up with?

Mr. Bradley: Passing the buck again.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Leader of the Opposition with his second question.

Mr. S. Smith: I was hoping to ask a question of the Premier but failing that the Minister of Labour (B. Stephenson) and failing that the House leader (Mr. Welch). Who will be acting House leader?

An hon. member: Ask the Treasurer again. He's accessible.

Mr. S. Smith: No, it has nothing to do with the Treasurer. Who would be acting House leader in the absence of the House leader, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The House leader was here, and will be back.

Mr. S. Smith: I'll wait for him to return for my second question.

An hon. member: You just used up the question.

Mr. Cassidy: I would not want people to feel that my suit was deceptive, Mr. Speaker, so I want to put this button on because as a good New Democrat would say, "No taxation without legislation." And for members opposite who wish one, the member for Scarborough-Ellesmere (Mr. Warner) will be happy to provide a supply at $1 apiece.

Mr. Lewis: What do you mean at $1 apiece? For Tories it is $2.

Mr. Cassidy: That's right, whatever the market will bear.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Cassidy: I have a question for the Treasurer. Is the Treasurer—and the government—now prepared to reconsider the announced increase in our health tax—in other words the OHIP premium increase—given that a worker earning the Ontario average wage of $13,400 will pay 8.4 per cent of his net income after taxes in health premiums whereas a person earning almost twice as much—$25,000 a year—will pay only 3.8 per cent of his net taxable income for the same coverage?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: First of all I think we should all recognize that today is the leader's reply to the budget speech, and I want to congratulate him on wearing a threepiece suit again. I never thought we'd see it again. It really is very stunning and the orange button just sets it off beautifully.

Mr. Martel: We rent them, Darcy.

Mr. Makarchuk: The clothing rental industry is a growth industry.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the figures in that question under advisement.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary then: Does the minister not agree that a tax that takes more from people the lower the income they have, right down to the poverty line, is completely contrary to the principles of a fair and equitable tax system?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member, I assume, is a member of the public service and has his premiums paid in full through the Office of the Assembly. This means that whatever his marginal rate is—and I assume that it must be 70 or 80 per cent—they would have to pay him a lot to take that job, one way or another—

Mr. Martel: That's why they pay the Premier so much.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—therefore you are being taxed at a heavier marginal rate on that taxable benefit. Those who pay a low marginal rate, if they're receiving their benefit in full from their employer, obviously are taxed at a much lesser rate.

Mr. S. Smith: And if they pay it themselves, God help them.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The difference is exactly the same as it would be if the money were paid out in the form of income and tax levied off it.

Mr. Lewis: Talk about sophistry.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Does the Treasurer not understand that employees whose employers pay their premium will lose this in wage increases, and that employees who have to pay the premium themselves will be having to pay out a rate of health premiums which is higher than the total of the federal and provincial tax combined at modest rates of income?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I read the Globe and Mail—good Lord, I read it three days ago and I'm glad the member has got around to reading it.

Mr. Martel: I didn't think you could after the budget.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: There are certain notch problems.

I have replied extensively to the Globe and Mail today. I invite the leader of the third party to read that letter and then we'll discuss it again.

Mr. Cassidy: Final supplementary: In view of the fact that premium income provides only 10 per cent of health costs in Alberta, 15 per cent in British Columbia, and 13 per cent in Quebec whereas the Treasurer, on behalf of this government, intends to collect 34 per cent of health costs through premium income in this province, does the Treasurer not agree that Ontario therefore will have the most regressive system of health premiums in all of Canada?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, no, I do not agree.

Mr. Cassidy: The facts belie you.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: My colleague the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) points out that the premiums will pay about 28 per cent of the total health bill or a third of the insurance services. I think one might look at the tax rates in some of the other provinces. If the member wants to move to the provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba during their erring Socialist days when they put on rates of income tax which crippled both those economies, then let him go.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We pride ourselves on having the second lowest rate of income tax in Canada, and we aim to keep it that way.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: No. A new question.

Mr. Cassidy: Ultimate final supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: New question.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have a new question of the Treasurer. With the announcement by Statistics Canada today that there are one million people unemployed in Canada, and 326,000 men and women now unemployed in this province, is the Treasurer prepared to reconsider his refusal to introduce any program of permanent job creation in his budget?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, obviously I am disturbed by the unemployment figures which were released today and which show a small deterioration in the figures from January in Canada as a whole and marginally here in Ontario. I think one must remember, and bear in mind, that on an actual basis—and, for that matter, on a seasonally adjusted basis—unemployment figures in both Canada and Ontario typically peak during January, February and March; February and March, I think would be more correct, generally speaking. We are seeing the results of the fact that we are at that particular time in the calendar year. I said in my budget that I thought we would have a small decrease in the number of unemployed. Obviously I did not expect that to happen in the month of February, nor do I.

Mr. Cassidy: It won't happen with your budget either.

Mr. Deans: Which month?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I know the member wants us to spend more to create jobs; whether by borrowing or raising taxes, he has never made clear.

Mr. Warner: You have no plans for jobs.

Mr. Martel: You are not among the unemployed. You wouldn't know what it is like.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I rejected that course of action last Tuesday night, as we rejected it a year ago. I would point out to my friends that governments right across this country have rejected that course of action. The easy thing to do, of course, would be to say, "Sure, we'll run up the deficit. We'll run up our cash requirements by several hundred millions of dollars." But somebody will have to pay that bill.

Mr. Renwick: The hard thing for you to do would be to care about any people who are unemployed.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I'm not prepared blithely to leave that bill to future generations.

Mr. Martel: There are 326,000 unemployed now.

Mr. Mackenzie: The unemployed are paying the bill now.

Mr. Foulds: Try balancing the economy as well as the budget, you clunk.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would point out that even in February, employment rose in Ontario by about 16,000, which was not enough to absorb the growth in the labour force, which was some 27,000.

Mr. Warner: You are a picture of perpetual failure.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The number of unemployed increased on an actual basis by some 10,000, but I would point out to the member that, since February a year ago, the actual number of jobs in Ontario has increased by 98,000 and, on a seasonally adjusted basis, 101,000 additional jobs have been created in Ontario since February 1977.

Mr. Mackenzie: What do you figure on a structural basis?

Mr. Cassidy: Tell that to the people of Sudbury.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think that's pretty good, considering the conditions that we have in the country and the world economy.

Mr. Warner: You helped make it so.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't rest on that; but I'm honest enough, and we in this party are honest enough, to say that the growth in jobs and employment will come through the private sector and not from make-work programs which the member advocates.

Mr. Cassidy: Tell that to the unemployed. I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. How many people must be unemployed in this province before the Treasurer will reconsider his complete refusal to undertake any job creation programs for Ontario?

Ms. Gigantes: How low can you go?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I can think of one who I would like to see unemployed but he just got his job; so I don't know that I would do anything about that. I don't want to see him unemployed.

Mr. Cassidy: I will be here after you have gone.

An hon. member: Keep them around, we need them.

Mr. Warner: The Treasurer really should resign; he is totally inept.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I recognize the keenness with which the members of the third party particularly attack this problem; that is their right and it is my duty to defend our position, and I shall do so.

Mr. Laughren: Defend it. That's right, exactly right.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: While I am on my feet, though, I have to take exception to yesterday's Star which reported on—

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: This is a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday's Star was reporting on a meeting of the Toronto Teachers' Federation; it was on their brief to the pension commission. I quote:—

Mr. McClellan: Make a hat of it and put it on your head.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —“The brief blames the enrolment crisis on failures of government policy, arguing that economic uncertainty, high unemployment and staggering inflation have led to a climate where people do not want to risk having children.” I will take a lot on my shoulders, but not that. I object to that statement.

Mr. Laughren: You are very funny, Darcy.

Mr. Cassidy: A supplementary: I want to say that the Treasurer's compassion has all the character of Marie Antoinette and shouldn't be permitted here in this province.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Do you know her well, Michael?

Mr. Cassidy: Is the Treasurer saying that when one out of every seven young people in this province is unemployed, when one out of 12 men in this province is unemployed and one out of every 11 working women in this province is unemployed that the situation is not serious enough to justify any reconsideration of his determination to do absolutely nothing about the unemployed?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I brought in a budget a week ago and I don't propose to change it a week later.

Mr. Warner: Disaster.

Mr. di Santo: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Leader of the Opposition now have a target?

Mr. S. Smith: Yes, and just before I make mention of my second question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of this House that tomorrow is the fifth anniversary of the happy event whereby the member for St. George (Mrs. Campbell) and the member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. Riddell) first took their seats in this chamber.

Mr. Sweeney: And you guys have been running ever since.

Mr. Ruston: Put them on the run, Margaret.

Mr. S. Smith: That was, of course, the start of the long road upwards which we have gradually been making progress on, and we trust we are still heading in the right direction.

Mr. Warner: You are always headed to the right.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: You lost a seat in the last election.

Mr. S. Smith: There has been the occasional setback.

Interjections.

HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

Mr. S. Smith: A question to the Premier, regarding the matter of the report of the Human Rights Commission of Ontario, entitled Life Together, a report which all of us have now had a chance to study carefully. Would the Premier undertake to provide some forum in the Legislature for us to discuss this report with all its implications, particularly the changes in the code but also the changes in reporting, the changes in financing, the changes in staff and so on recommended in this report? We in the Legislature can then have the opportunity to discuss it, as the outgoing chairman of that Human Rights Commission would have wished us to do.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would have no reluctance to a discussion of the report in the House. The government is presently evaluating the report. I think there are some aspects of it that may find their way into possible amendments, which might provide the opportunity for the kind of discussion the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting. If there are no proposed legislative changes during the course of the spring session, assuming that the work is going along relatively well, I am sure we could find an afternoon or evening to discuss the contents of the report.

I think it's a very constructive document. There will be some in your party who do not share some of the recommendations in that report. There will be one, at least, who will, and I know that the member will want to have that sort of discussion with people able to offer their totally objective points of view on some of those issues—

Mr. Reid: Yes or no?

Hon. Mr. Davis: —and I think that some discussion of that nature might be helpful, but I would just ask the Leader of the Opposition to be patient for two or three weeks to see whether there is an opportunity, perhaps through proposed legislation, where we can do that.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary—and given the concern that exists, and rightly so, about racism, as well as about the problems of minorities defined in other manners, and despite the probable amendment that I think the Premier is referring to, and which has to do with the handicapped and their inclusion in the Human Rights Code, I do hope that he will have a chance to discuss the whole report.

May I, by way of further supplementary, ask the Premier for his comments on two particular recommendations? The first one is that an annual report should be prepared and tabled in the Legislature, detailing all the activities and the progress of the commission; what is his feeling about that? Secondly, what does he feel about the recommendation, “that it become an established practice for the Premier to consult with the Leader of the Opposition before recommending the appointment of the chairman of the commission”? I would like his opinion on that last category, inasmuch as there was no consultation whatever with regard to the most recent appointment.

Mr. Martel: Why don't you make him deputy prime minister?

Mr. McClellan: Give him a seat in the cabinet.

Mr. Lewis: We could strike an all-party committee to look into this.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have known the prime author of this report and his very constructive approach to a number of these matters, and as well, the conciliatory way in which he approaches some of his recommendations. Firstly, on the suggestion that there should be an annual report tabled, I would have no reluctance in discussing that with the commission. If it makes sense, I certainly would have no objection to it.

I sense that the author of the report really was looking at the appointment of the chairman of the Human Rights Commission as something comparable to the way the Ombudsman of this province is appointed. I would say with respect to Professor Symons that while I agree with a number of the recommendations, I think it is fair to state that the Human Rights Commission does not fall in the same category as the Ombudsman. There is no question that if there are difficulties in terms of the administration of that commission, if there are difficulties in terms of policy as it relates to the commission, I think it is fair for the members opposite to raise those with the government, which has the responsibility ultimately for the determination of, first, the people; second, the legislation; and third, the general direction the Human Rights Commission takes. In that the government must assume that responsibility under our system, I think it is only appropriate that the government assume the responsibility for the chairman and for those who are appointed to the commission.

FLECK MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Mr. Riddell: A question of the Solicitor General: In view of the rather unfortunate incident which occurred at Fleck Manufacturing Company this morning where there was considerable property damage done by UAW members from outside the area; and in view of the number of workers who expressed concern to me this morning that they wanted to go to work but were certainly reluctant to jeopardize their safety by crossing the picket line without police protection; and in view of the fact that I indicated in my question to the Premier yesterday that the picket line was going to be reinforced this morning by workers from Talbotville, why did the Solicitor General not take steps to reinforce the police force in order to keep order at the plant? And what does he intend to do to prevent further violation of the Criminal Code in connection with this particular strike?

Mr. Martel: Now there is a friend of labour; that whole group.

Mr. di Santo: They're worse than the Tories.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: There was an incident this morning. I understand the incident related to a number of people in a car who were not employed at the plant. Apparently the pickets mistakenly thought they were employees trying to enter the plant, but they were apparently employed at a firm, Protective Plastics, which has a plant near the Fleck plant. That was an unfortunate occurrence.

Mr. Breithaupt: Would it have been all right if they were employed?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The police were informed, of course, that there would be a number of extra picketers attending at the plant today, and it was decided by management that the plant would not be open. In view of that, there was no necessity of reinforcing or adding numerous police officers in the area of the plant this morning.

Mr. Riddell: Supplementary: Is the Solicitor General indicating that mobs of people can come and do considerable property damage, even though the plant is not open? As I understand it, there was assault on two press people. Is the minister indicating that this can go on and the police can just stand and watch it happen, even though the plant isn't in operation?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: No. There were a number of police officers there. I believe there were about six or seven police officers there. As for the incidents to which the hon. member refers, there is a possibility that charges will be laid.

Mr. Renwick: Supplementary: Upset as I am by the comments made by the member for Huron-Middlesex, I address my supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Will the Solicitor General instruct the OPP that their obligation with respect to the picketers on lawful strike at that plant is to provide them with an opportunity of communicating with those who are trying to break the strike?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The Ontario Provincial Police are quite aware of their responsibilities and duties in respect to a picket line.

Mr. Renwick: Further supplementary: Will the Solicitor General advise this House in what way a person on lawful picket, on foot, can inform persons in vehicles about the reason for the strike and why the strike is taking place?

Mr. S. Smith: Not by turning a car over.

Mr. Rotenberg: You can't stop people from working. You talk about unemployment; let them work.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I think any employee attempting to enter the plant by way of using a motor vehicle or a bus is quite aware of the fact that that plant is on strike and that the picket line is there in order to inform the employees that the plant is on strike. I'm not aware that the picket line has been unable to communicate in some way with the employees inside that plant.

Mr. Renwick: Oh, come off it! How do you communicate with a bus escorted by police?

An hon. member: Does that give them the right to obstruct?

Mr. Reid: Supplementary: Can the Solicitor General tell the House if, as a result of what happened this morning, any charges have been laid against anyone?

Mr. Deans: He already answered that.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I already answered that for the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex. There is the possibility that charges will be laid, yes.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Warner: I have a question for the Treasurer. Before I put it, I wish to present the Treasurer with a button entitled, "No taxation without legislation." I'm sure he'll wear it in good health.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: When are you dumping the tea in the harbour?

Mr. Warner: Does the Treasurer now admit clearly and unequivocally that he has no intention of lowering the OHIP tax increase nor of making the committee to which the health tax had been referred a meaningful exercise and that the committee will not be relevant and will have no effect upon his decision?

Mr. Rotenberg: Send buttons to the members for Wentworth and Scarborough West too. They haven't got one.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I obviously have and will continue to have a great respect for committees of this Legislature. I will look forward to their deliberations in this area with a great deal of interest. I listened yesterday to the financial critic from the Liberal Party. I didn't hear any suggestions—just a lot of rhetoric. But it may be that the committee will have something positive to say.

Mr. Kerrio: That makes us even.

Mr. Warner: Supplementary: Perhaps the Treasurer could explain why the order in council which now makes the premium tax a law in the province of Ontario was signed yesterday. Why did he go ahead and sign that, knowing that he is undermining whatever work the committee could have done?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think the member is somewhat wrong. The order in council went through cabinet on March 8, a week ago.

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, on a point of information, it was filed, dated March 13. Under the Regulations Act, section 3, it clearly states that a regulation comes into force and has effect on and after the day upon which it is filed, such date being yesterday. Although it was first drafted on March 9 it did not become law until yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his point.

Mr. Martel: Now answer the question.

Mr. Lewis: Question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martel: He has not answered the question.

Mr. Warner: Do we get an answer?

Mr. Speaker: It wasn't a question. It was a point of information.

Mr. Lewis: Of course it was a question.

Mr. Wildman: The Treasurer never responded to the initial question.

Mr. Laughren: A button a day keeps the Treasurer away.

MUNICIPAL FIRE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General and it deals in the realm of the Fire Marshal's office and the policies of various fire departments.

Would the Solicitor General advise whether there is a policy involving fire departments in this province, especially in regional municipalities, where we have various fire departments dealing with different municipalities, that they fight fires on a first-arrival basis? Is this a provincial policy and is he going to enforce it to avoid a situation as happened in Ottawa last week where the Rideau Fire Department got to the scene of a fire and sat back and let the building burn down—a lady was seriously injured—because the fire was in the Gloucester area?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: In situations of that kind within a region—and as the hon. member says, there may be three or four different departments in the municipalities within that region—the prime responsibility rests with the department within the region where there may be a fire. However, in many instances there are agreements between municipalities that, depending upon the location of the fire, other departments and other personnel will also answer the alarm.

I am surprised when the hon. member says that one particular department refused to assist, because there is a certain amount of reciprocity between the municipalities within a region, and that is understood in many parts of the province. It isn't necessarily dictated by the Fire Marshal or an edict by the Fire Marshal; that is something that is usually agreed to by the departments within the region.

Mr. Roy: In view of the fact that we clearly had a situation in Ottawa where apparently Gloucester advised Rideau that it didn't want Rideau to fight a fire in Gloucester even though it was closer, would he not feel, as minister responsible provincially and through the Fire Marshal's office, that it should be a provincial policy that fires are fought on a first-arrival basis, and so avoid situations like this, where two municipalities apparently could not come to some agreement?

Mr. Hodgson: Getting away from local government now. Getting away from local representation.

Mr. Roy: Doesn't the minister think it is somewhat ridiculous for one fire department to show up and just sit back and wait for the other fire department, which is 11 minutes away from arriving at the scene? Doesn't he think there should be a provincial policy when municipalities can't agree?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, I will look into that.

Mr. Nixon: You would let the place burn down eh?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I didn't realize that the hon. member was saying, in fact, that the department personnel who arrived at the fire were told by the fire department in the area where the fire occurred not to take any action. This seems strange and I will look into it.

Mr. Breithaupt: Supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister said he would look into it. There will be further opportunities.

Mr. Peterson: He fights fire with fire, Mr. Speaker.

JAQUES MURDER

Mr. Lawlor: A question of the Attorney General, arising out of the Jaques murder trial: What is the intention of the Crown with respect to appealing the verdict of acquittal in the case of Mr. Gruener and the second degree murder verdict in the case of Mr. Woods?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I have requested the senior law officers of the Crown to review the matter with a view to launching an appeal with respect to those two accused. It is first necessary to obtain a transcript of the rather lengthy charge to the jury by Mr. Justice Maloney, and we are hoping that this transcript will be available within the next day or two. I would expect a decision should be made with respect to appeals in relation to these two gentlemen at the beginning of next week.

FIRST AID TRAINING

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Health. In the light of the recent recommendation of a coroner's jury investigating the death of one Kenneth Clarke, a promising young hockey star who suffered fatal brain damage when he was hit by a puck behind his left ear just below his helmet, that his life may have been saved if he had been given basic first aid treatment, would the minister suggest to his colleague, the Minister of Education (Mr. Wells), that artificial respiration or some method of respiration, including cardiopulmonary resuscitation, be given top priority in the schools so that at least we can save lives simply by teaching our students the basics of artificial respiration?

[2:45]

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I haven't yet seen that coroner's report. Unfortunately they are usually a number of weeks behind the press reports about them. When I receive it I will review the recommendations and ask our staff to consider that with the Ministry of Education staff. I know that first aid, including various forms of artificial resuscitation, is quite widely taught now throughout the province. It may well be that it is something we can consider putting an added emphasis to for some expansion.

Mr. B. Newman: Supplementary: May I ask the Minister of Health then, while the Minister of Education is here, that at least no athlete be allowed to indulge in the athletic activity unless he has taken a course in pulmonary or artificial respiration?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I am not sure that is a realistic suggestion. If the hon. member were to suggest that trainers of teams in high schools, or coaches, should have had some form of training, I think that would be something worth considering, but to suggest that every athlete must have CPR training I think is perhaps stretching it a bit.

Mr. Breithaupt: My supplementary is of the Minister of Health, with respect to the requirement that coaches or managers of teams at least be required, perhaps by the beginning of the next educational year to have completed a short first aid course. Would the minister look into that prospect so that this might be a reasonable first step in providing for an intelligent balance of the needs for first aid availability to all the teams of young people?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: As I said, Mr. Speaker, once I have received the coroner's inquest report—the report of the jury that is—I'll consider the recommendations and take them up as necessary through our staff, with representatives of the Ministry of Education. I hope members realize the problems in high school sport, in first of all getting people to take on positions as managers and coaches of teams. We would want to have a proper balance between precaution and getting people to take those jobs on.

MINI-SKOOLS LIMITED

Mr. McClellan: I have a question of the Minister of Community and Social Services with respect to Mini-Skools. Yesterday, in his statement of exoneration, the minister said: "We have no evidence from our inspections that Mini-Skools overenrolled generally." I wanted to ask the minister whether his inspections revealed enrolment in excess of licence capacity at the Queensview Centre in December 1977; at the Tuxedo Centre in November 1977; at the Brimorton, Tuxedo, Kingsview One and Kingsview Two centres in October 1977?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I am sorry, I did have, yesterday, a complete list of the inspection reports and I don't seem to have them with me at the moment and I don't recall that from memory. Perhaps that is something we could deal with at the late show tonight when the hon. member wishes to entertain the House.

Mr. McClellan: With respect, that is not a sufficient answer to the question. I would hope the minister would take it as notice and provide the data in a normal response to the question.

By way of supplementary, let me ask him simply why did he exonerate Mini-Skools yesterday without having thoroughly reviewed the material that was presented to him on Thursday, let alone obtain full material from Mini-Skools, including the Mini-Skools financial report and other financial and enrolment data, as he was requested to do? Why did he exonerate them right off the bat?

Hon. Mr. Norton: As usual, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is relying upon some erroneous assumptions. First of all, I said nothing with respect to exoneration of anyone yesterday. I indicated to the hon. member that I had reviewed the material, that my staff had examined the material; if that was not his impression I don't know where he got any other impression.

The only statement I have seen with respect to total exoneration was in the press this morning. That certainly was not a quote from my lips.

Ms. Gigantes: It's not what you said; it's what you did.

Hon. Mr. Norton: My staff have thoroughly reviewed the material and all I suggested yesterday was that we certainly found no substantiation for the hon. member's allegations.

Ms. Gigantes: You didn't look.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I did not indicate that the matter was entirely closed. If the hon. member has any additional information, I would be happy to review it, as I have the other. I don't know on what he is basing his erroneous assumptions with respect to how I have dealt with this matter.

Mr. McClellan: Final supplementary, Mr. Speaker? He hasn't answered my question.

Mr. Speaker: No. There will be an opportunity during the late show this evening.

LEGISLATIVE BUILDING

Mrs. Campbell: My question is to the Minister of Government Services: In view of the fact that there would appear to have been a shift in the policy of this government with reference to this building, would the minister now at least begin to get the matter on track by tabling the report of Eric Arthur?

Hon. Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I'm not aware of any shift of the government's position respecting this building.

Mr. Wildman: What about a shift in the building?

Mrs. Campbell: Supplementary: Perhaps the minister is not aware of the discussions which have been ongoing with his predecessor (Mr. McCague) with reference to the use of this building and the position of Mr. Speaker with reference to the allocation of space. Would he now comment as to his position in this matter so that we can have some clarification?

Hon. Mr. Henderson: It is the intention of this minister to uphold the commitment made by the previous minister.

Mrs. Campbell: Supplementary: May I just point out that the commitment was to start the relocation in February. How is the present minister going to do that?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Roy: What year?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I'm sure all members would like to hear this answer.

Mr. Sweeney: Just tell us it is retroactive legislation.

Mr. Peterson: Put out a new phone book, Lorne.

Hon. Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question—

An hon. member: Put it on your Christmas card.

Hon. Mr. Henderson: —I, as the minister, have had several meetings with my staff, as has your office with the people who are responsible to you. They're trying to allocate the space in order that all members can have an office within this building. That is being worked on daily.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Hourly, sir.

Mr. Martel: Supplementary: Is it possible for the minister to allow the Speaker, who has responsibility for the building, to allocate space and get Government Services out of the situation totally?

Hon. Mr. Davis: That wouldn't be fair to the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you're more aware than anyone else in this House that you have the responsibility for a portion of this building; the Ministry of Government Services also has responsibilities for a portion of this building.

Mr. Martel: Boy, that sure answers the question.

FRENCH-LANGUAGE SERVICES

Mr. Swart: My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Provincial Secretary for Resources Development. I'm putting the question to him in his capacity as chairman of the cabinet committee on bilingualism and francophone rights: Would he agree that the caisse populaire movement in this province has a major place in the French-Canadian culture and the ability of the francophones to function in their own language? And in view of the Premier's statement that the government is going to institute practical measures to implement French rights, instead of the so-called symbolism of a declaration of a bilingual province, would the minister tell the House whether the translation of the Credit Unions and Caisses Populaires Act and its regulations into French have been completed—a request that was made to his government more than a year ago?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: I think the hon. member is aware of the amount of work that has been done in providing services in the French language. The Speech from the Throne indicated more measures to be taken in having the Juries Act and the Adjudicators Act providing services in the French language. A certain amount of money has been set aside for the translation of statutes and regulations, and I'd be glad to let the hon. member know at what stage the translation of the regulations and the statutes of the Credit Unions and Caisses Populaires Act is presently at.

Mr. Swart: By way of supplementary, could the minister give some indication to the House of any schedule, not only for the translation into French of that Act but of the Education Act, the health and social services Acts and even the driver training program and the provision of it in those areas where it is needed? Could he give us some indication of the schedule of the translations?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: I would be pleased to make that information available to the hon. member.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary: In view of the fact that there was $100,000 available for the last five years, which the government of which he is a member did not take up with the federal government, has this government gone back to the federal government, now that it has made a commitment to start translating certain statutes, and said to them: "Could you allocate us that $500,000 which we didn't pick up over the last five years?"

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: We certainly use and welcome all the money the federal government makes available to us and we just wish we could get more of it.

Mr. S. Smith: Come on now!

Mr. Roy: You can go back for it.

ABORTIONS

Mr. Williams: I have a question of the Minister of Health. It is my understanding that representations have been made in recent weeks to ministry officials advocating the establishment of private abortion clinics, described as "well-woman clinics," under the guise of public hospitals. It is my further understanding that such proposals are not in accordance with the hospital program and policy of the ministry relative to both hospital facilities and to the broader issue of government recognition and support of abortion clinics. Would the minister please advise if I am correct in this understanding?

Mr. Bradley: That sure wasn't a plant.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I have met on two occasions with groups proposing the establishment of women's health clinics, one of the major purposes of which would be to take out of at least some of the hospitals the therapeutic abortion procedure and put it into such clinics. I believe I have a further meeting coming up in the future.

My position throughout has been one of, shall I say, being wary of the proposal on three grounds: first, the question of anonymity for those women seeking to have a therapeutic abortion performed; second, the question of safety of the patient—even though a very small percentage of therapeutic abortions result in serious complications, my concern has been that, as long as they are going to be performed in the province, they should be in centres with qualified staff, sophisticated equipment, operating theatres and so forth as back up; and the third problem, as I see, it is a question of cost. When we have ample public hospital facilities already paid for by the people of Ontario, I don't see how we can afford to add this kind of facility on top of that.

Mr. Williams: With regard to the second part of my question, putting aside those particular concerns, would this type of proposal recognize or give support to the government's position with regard to the establishment of abortion clinics? I should say, is the government in support of the establishment of such clinics?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: In one word, no.

Ms. Gigantes: Along the same lines, I would like to ask the minister am I correct in my understanding that he has received the re-review of the Badgley commission report, and is he going to table that review?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Since the last time the hon. member inquired of me about this, which I think was in November, the first time being in July, just in the last three weeks we have received the comments of the Ontario Hospital Association as an association to the recommendations of the committee, headed by Dr. Caudwell in my ministry. We should be ready in the near future to move on that.

A number of the recommendations both of the Badgley commission, which reported to the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, and of my own committee, will require further development of policy guidelines and so forth. I don't see us responding to the entire report at once. It is something which is evolving, but certainly—
[3:00]

Ms. Gigantes: Will the minister table it?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Will I table the responses from the OHA and the OMA? Yes.

PUBLIC POLLS

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Education. Did the minister personally authorize the engagement of a private opinion-poll firm to take a public opinion study in relation to the Toronto teachers' strike in 1975, a poll which cost something like $30,000 in public funds? If so, can the minister tell us why?

Hon. Mr. Wells: At various times, during that year and other years, we have used the services of a polling organization in order that we may be fully aware of what the members of the public are thinking about the education system of this province.

Mr. Reid: Would the minister not agree that in that case those polls should perhaps be tabled in the House? And is it not a fact that he is buying an expression of public opinion with taxpayers' money, by taking these kinds of polls that really don't or shouldn't have any effect on government policy?

Mr. Peterson: All this time we thought the minister didn't know about it.

Hon. Mr. Wells: It has always been my philosophy that it is the role of government—and particularly we who are charged with the responsibility of developing policies and legislation—to have what we call people participation.

Mr. S. Smith: People participation?

Mr. Cassidy: What a lot of balderdash. You'll never share it. You're an arrogant bunch, you know; you really are.

Hon. Mr. Wells: The leader of the third party laughs, but he likes to mouth the phrases without really believing in it. We over here believe in it.

An hon. member: Is the government going to do a poll on OHIP?

Hon. Mr. Wells: I believe I want to know what the people think about various aspects of policies.

Mr. Reid: Will the minister table the report?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Wells: I don't believe these are reports that should be tabled.

Mr. S. Smith: It is people participation, isn't it?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought there was only one final supplementary. The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Foulds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If the minister is so interested in receiving the opinions of the people in the province about the educational system, why doesn't he do more within his ministry to ask the parents and the children what they think of it?

Hon. Mr. Wells: The member knows that we do do more within our ministry to ask the parents and the children what they think about the system. Let me refer the member to one very extensive public opinion report that is public, which he's read and I've read. We've all looked at the results and we have used those results to determine some of the policies—

Ms. Gigantes: Table them all.

Mr. Foulds: How about participation in the community?

Hon. Mr. Wells:—and I refer to the Interface study which was done in this province.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex North with a final supplementary.

Mr. Ruston: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Education. While making the survey, did his people look into the lack of education that the children are receiving and at what effect it might have on the children over the next year or two? Did he survey that too?

Hon. Mr. Wells: I might bring to the member's attention that there is a research project coming out, which is being done by the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, on the effects of the strike in Metropolitan Toronto—

Mr. S. Smith: The Premier (Mr. Davis) should get them on the public payroll.

Hon. Mr. Wells: —and when it is ready it will be public and will be tabled.

DEVELOPMENT CORPORATIONS

Mr. Wildman: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Ministry of Industry and Tourism. In view of the questions raised in many minds by the Treasurer's comments on the Ontario Development Corporation and the streamlining of government operations in the budget, can the minister assure the House that he does not intend to abolish the Ontario Development Corporation's role as the lending agency of last resort for small industrial and tourist resort entrepreneurs, and can the minister assure us that he does not intend to dismantle the programs of the ministry in the way that he approached his role as Minister of Housing?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, in response to the first question, I have no intention of doing away with the role of the Ontario Development Corporation. We may very well change the thrust of it and try to make it a little more responsive to some of the requests we've received.

In response to the second portion, I am most grateful that the hon. member has recognized the extremely fine job I did in streamlining the operations of the Ministry of Housing.

Mr. Swart: You misinterpreted it.

Mr. Makarchuk: Your perceptions are slightly twisted.

Mr. Wildman: Mr. Speaker, would the minister agree that instead of curtailing the lending programs of the Ontario Development Corporation in a period of economic slow-down, the government should be expanding them? Does he intend to make them more flexible to help spur economic recovery? Can the minister indicate when and how this re-examination will be carried out and completed?

Mr. Roy: Just give Claude a year or two and he will fix that.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated to the hon. member that there was no intention to curtail the operations of the Ontario Development Corporation. The context of what I said, if he had been listening, was that it's intended to change the thrust in order to respond more quickly to some of the requests and to do exactly what the hon. member suggests—to be able to be a lending agency and to assist people.

Mr. Wildman: Is it flexible?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: We may very well want to change the thrust of the development corporation in that way.

Mr. Martel: What is the deadline?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I don't put deadlines on anything.

ENERGY BOARD HEARINGS

Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy. In view of the fact that the minister is meeting today with a delegation from the Federation of Northern Ontario Municipalities concerning energy matters, would the minister inform the House whether the minister will fund, in whole or in part, interveners' costs of energy board interventions of that organization? Is the minister contemplating limiting by regulation the number of interim rate applications and rate applications that may be presented by any one applicant to the Ontario Energy Board other than pass-throughs of federal energy board decisions? Finally, is the minister aware of movements of the northern Ontario municipalities to refuse to sign gas franchise agreements with Northern and Central Gas or its successors?

Mr. Roy: Glad you asked.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that, as the hon. member has noted, we are meeting with this delegation this afternoon, I think it would be premature and therefore inappropriate for me to answer that question at this time. I'm well aware of the issues he has raised—

Ms. Gigantes: Oh, tell us, come on.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: We are looking forward to a constructive meeting this afternoon.

Mr. Laughren: Good question.

An hon. member: You'd better cross the floor.

Mr. Cassidy: It's pretty grim when even your own members ask questions like that.

Mr. Speaker: I missed the government party in one rotation. I'm going to recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South.

TAX EXEMPTION

Mr. Kennedy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question of the Minister of Revenue. With respect to the exemption of hotel and motel rooms from the retail sales taxes contained in the budget, would he clarify how this applies to such facilities as housekeeping cottages and cabins and so forth in respect to the summer tourist trade?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Mr. Speaker, the member is obviously referring to the bill that is before the Legislature now—the amendment to the Retail Sales Tax Act. The amendment would cover hotels and motels, and any tourist lodge that would be on the American plan would also be covered. It will cover house-keeping cottages and cabins provided, of course, they are not rented for a longer period of time than one month.

Mr. Kerrio: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could advise us if he is doing anything to monitor prices for accommodation to see if some people are going to take advantage of it, when the tax is lifted, to raise the price?

Ms. Gigantes: Oh, heavens no.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Not at this time.

Mr. Martel: Not at this time. The business community wouldn't do that. You can't trust anybody over there.

MOTION

SITTINGS OF HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that on Thursday next, March 16, this House will meet at 10 a.m. for the purpose of considering Bill 59 in committee and third reading. The House will adjourn for the luncheon interval at approximately one p.m. and resume at two p.m., at which time the normal routine proceedings will be called.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to that motion. It has been accomplished because of the co-operation of a number of people, including the member for St. George who had special responsibilities in the consideration of this bill, to rearrange the program. I do want to publicly thank all the members who have made it possible for us to add this extra time for the consideration of this bill.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

CROWN TIMBER AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. F. S. Miller moved first reading of Bill 35, An Act to amend the Crown Timber Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, further to the statement I made earlier today, this bill provides in substance for the amalgamation of the management charge and forest protection charge into one area charge and for the authority to make regulations that fix or determine Crown dues by formulas employing commodity price indices.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Williams moved first reading of Bill 36, An Act to amend the Legislative Assembly Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, the amendment would require a person who holds office as a member of a council of a municipality and whose term of office is not yet three-quarters expired to resign his office on official nomination day if he wishes to be elected to the assembly.

PUBLIC HOSPITALS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Williams moved first reading of Bill 37, An Act to amend the Public Hospitals Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, this bill establishes several requirements relating to the composition of boards of public hospitals. The bill provides that the number of appointed directors who have a vote shall not exceed one-quarter of the elected directors. In addition, the bill establishes certain criteria for membership in a hospital corporation and guarantees a member's right to vote in the hospital corporation.

FAMILY DAY ACT

Mr. Williams moved first reading of Bill 38, An Act respecting Family Day.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for a public holiday known as Family Day. Family Day is established as a day to celebrate the institution of the family and will be held on a day to be named by the Lieutenant Governor.

[3:15]

LABOUR RELATIONS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Williams moved first reading of Bill 39, An Act to amend the Labour Relations Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, the bill requires a trade union to provide additional information about its financial affairs to its members and to the Ontario Labour Relations Board. A union must prepare a statement of salaries, expenses, fees and commissions, and a statement of investments, to be provided to its members. An audited financial report must be filed annually with the board, and the members of the trade union may obtain copies of the statement from the union upon request and without charge.

In addition, the bill limits the amount of union funds provided by Ontario members that may be transferred outside Canada; and requires that investments made of union funds be of the type authorized by the Trustee Act and the Pension Benefits Act.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY ACT

Ms. Campbell moved first reading of Bill 40, An Act to provide for the Economic Equality of the Sexes.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, the bill provides a remedy to an individual who is affected by discrimination on the basis of sex, practised by employers who are the recipients of public funds. The bill permits a person to apply to a court for an order suspending the payment of public funds to any employer who discriminates in employment practices on the basis of sex. The employer may apply to a court to terminate the order when the employer is no longer conducting such discriminatory practices.

This bill is intended to complement the family law legislation, which one hopes will one day pass this Legislature.

ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

Mr. Speaker: Before the orders of the day, I remind hon. members that pursuant to standing order 28, the hon. member for Bellwoods (Mr. McClellan) has indicated he is dissatisfied with the answer to a question provided by the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Norton). This matter will be debated at 10:30.

Similarly, the hon. member for Carleton East (Ms. Gigantes) has indicated that she is dissatisfied with a question answered by the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell). This will be debated at 10:40 this evening.

ANSWER TO WRITTEN QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wish to table the answer to question No. 12 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix, page 705.)

Just before some of the members go to other responsibilities, they know we will be calling the first order; if the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) has completed before 6 p.m. it was understood that we would go into committee of the whole and start Bill 59. I therefore thought I would advise members there was some likelihood of them being required in the committee of the whole as well, following completion of remarks on the budget by the member for Ottawa Centre, which will be some time later on this afternoon.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

Resumption of the adjourned debate on the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, these are solemn and difficult times. Statistics Canada reported today that for the first time in our history more than one million Canadians are out of work. Three hundred and twenty-six thousand men and women are out of work in the province of Ontario, and that's 10,000 more than in the month of January. Yet the budget which the government brought down last week contains not one single proposal for creating full-time jobs in Ontario. Instead, it does its best to justify a policy of total inaction by Ontario's Conservative government.

When this budget came down last Tuesday, my colleagues and I said that it was outrageous. The reaction of the past seven days clearly demonstrates just how strongly that opinion is shared, both by the press and by the people of Ontario. The news that the economic situation is still worsening underlines just how bankrupt this government has become. It is outrageous that when 326,000 people are unemployed in Ontario the government's only proposal for creating jobs is for 13,000 summer jobs for students.

It's outrageous that there is no meaningful action to bring about the fundamental, structural changes in our economy that even the Treasury recognizes that Ontario needs. It's outrageous that property tax relief for senior citizens is being deliberately delayed. It's outrageous that the municipalities of Ontario have been manipulated into a loss of nearly half a billion dollars in provincial grants which they can only replace by turning yet again to property taxpayers.

It's outrageous that Ontario has provided yet another tax break to the mining industry and one which is certain to lead to the export of jobs. Above all, it is outrageous that the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) should have again increased health premiums in order to avoid bringing a tax increase before this Legislature. This budget is part of the same pattern which was set when the Premier (Mr. Davis) went to the first ministers' conference in Ottawa last month. The pattern was confirmed in the Throne Speech three weeks ago.

Even with Ontario facing its worst economic crisis in 40 years, the Conservative government is not prepared to act. This government has totally abdicated its responsibility for the health of Ontario's economy and is passing the buck to the federal government and to the private sector.

Mr. Haggerty: You've been reading Peterson's speech.

Mr. Cassidy: I listened for a while, but it was very difficult.

Not only that, but the Treasurer has joined forces with every reactionary influence in Canadian society in a chorus of simplistic solutions whose main thrust is to blame the public sector for the failures of Conservative and Liberal governments.

In short, this budget sets out to punish the people of Ontario for the mistakes of the Treasurer and his predecessors. We cannot accept that approach and neither will the people of Ontario.

Before I go into the specifics of this budget, I want to remind this House that the Treasurer's promises and forecasts cannot be believed. Two years ago, he promised to bring his budget deficit down to $1 billion. He was $300 million out. Last year he made the same promise again, but as the New Democratic Party correctly predicted, the figures were trumped up for pre-election purposes and the Treasurer was $600 million out.

Ontario fell 20,000 jobs short of the Treasurer's promise of 85,000 jobs in 1975. We were 40,000 jobs short of the Treasurer's promise in 1976. If last year's inadequate job creation programs resulted in only 73,000 new jobs, which was 16,000 short of the Treasurer's target, how can anyone be expected to believe this year's target when the government plans to do even less? The Treasurer seems to be saying that the picture is so rosy that nothing needs to be done now about Ontario's economic problems. That is precisely the line he took last year when he said, "I think there is every reason to be optimistic about the outlook for 1977." What a piece of pre-election bravado that turned out to be. Last year the Treasurer saw such signs of solid strength that our economy grew by only 2.7 per cent and our unemployment rose to the present level of 326,000.

The pattern of misrepresentation which the Treasurer adopted last year continues in this year's budget. Last year the Treasurer redefined full employment from the traditional level of three per cent unemployed to a 5.3 per cent level in order to justify his failure to adequately manage the economy. Now he has devoted yet another budget paper to rationalizing 5.3 per cent unemployment as a full employment target. Yes, the Treasurer uses those words in his budget and uses that as yet another excuse for inaction.

Not only that; hours before the start of International Women's Day the Treasurer announced that he is prepared to accept an unemployment rate for women, 25 years and over, that is nearly twice the rate that he will tolerate for men. That sexist approach will not do in Ontario in 1978.

The Treasurer was caught out on so many fronts last year that he has been a shade more careful in his forecasts for 1978. After all, this is not an election year. But Ontario is still being led down the garden path by this Treasurer. In last year's budget, Darcy McKeough mortgaged the store with a $1.6-billion deficit, and now he is selling the mortgages in an effort to apply some fiscal vanishing cream to his deficit.

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the hon. member that it is customary in this House to refer to another member by his riding name rather than by his surname.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, the Duke of Chatham-Kent; I will refer to him that way constantly.

The same day this budget was coming down, there was a new budget in the province of Saskatchewan. What a contrast there was between sunny Saskatchewan and the gloomy Ontario of this Treasurer.

Mr. Lewis: Utopia; Valhalla.

Mr. Cassidy: Thanks to the two budgets, Saskatchewan will have the lowest rates of tax of people earning $13,000 a year in Canada and Ontario will have the highest rates of tax. Senior citizens and municipalities get more aid in Saskatchewan. They are denied it under this budget here in Ontario.

The jobs that are being provided in Saskatchewan will benefit 20 per cent of its unemployed workers, while the full-time jobs in Ontario's budget don't even touch one per cent of our unemployed. It makes one think that the time has come to end the Tory reign in Ontario and bring on an NDP government.

Mr. Lewis: Of which the Liberals will be a part, like it or not.

Mr. Cassidy: In the opinion of my party, the raising of OHIP premiums is the single most offensive action of the 1978 Ontario budget. The facts of the health premium increase are not new but they should be put on the record again.

In the first place, this is the second time in two years that premiums are being raised, and effective May 1 they will be double the 1976 level.

Mr. Martel: The Treasurer should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Cassidy: Here is what people in different provinces will pay for health insurance on that date: Newfoundland, no premiums; Prince Edward Island, poor Prince Edward Island, no premiums; Nova Scotia, no premiums; New Brunswick, no premiums; Manitoba, no premiums; Saskatchewan, no premiums. Six provinces of this country have got the secret that somehow escapes this Treasurer.

Mr. Lupusella: Why don't you clean your books?

Mr. Cassidy: In the deep-blue Conservative province of Alberta there is a maximum premium of $169.20 for a family of four. In British Columbia—somewhat to the right of Genghis Khan—there is a maximum of $225 a year in premiums. In Quebec there is a payroll tax of 1.5 per cent of net income, and no more than $235 a year.

Now we come to rich, prosperous Ontario—

Mr. Martel: Under the Tories for 34 years.

Mr. Cassidy: —under the Tories, where a premium for a typical family of four is a staggering $528 a year.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Martel: Resign.

Mr. Cassidy: Ontario will be raising 34 per cent of its health cost from premiums, compared with 10 to 15 per cent in the other provinces that have premiums.

And, as I read into the record in the question period today, a worker earning the average wage of $13,400 in this province will pay 8.4 per cent of his net income in health premiums alone, whereas somebody earning $25,000 a year will only be paying 3.8 per cent of net income. This is the most regressive tax that Ontario could have levied but, wonder of wonders, that is the one that the Treasurer chose. I say, and we say, that is shameful.

Through the order in council that was passed before this budget debate even began, Ontario will have the dubious distinction of raising more money in health insurance premiums than through the corporation income tax. That is the kind of priorities this Treasurer has. A family of four that earns $10,000 will pay more in health premiums than it pays in federal and provincial income tax combined.

This government keeps on insisting that the workers will not feel any effect of this increase because their health premiums are paid for by their employers. Just ask any worker about that the next time his contract comes up for negotiation. If this $144 increase is paid for by the employer, it will be taxable and it is at the expense of other wage gains, whether or not the workers are under the Anti-Inflation Board. We think it is grotesque that OHIP premiums are being raised by a staggering 37.5 per cent when workers are being held to pay increases of only six per cent.

Not only that, but any flat rate tax like these health premiums hits people on low incomes far harder than people in the Treasurer's tax bracket. And he's getting a tax cut on his cigars as well. It is ironic that a government which says that it favours small business should be loading this additional burden on to small business people and that a government that says it wants to help farmers, whose real income has been falling steadily for the last four years, should be loading this new burden on to their backs.

We find it particularly arrogant of this Treasurer that he and his government are choosing to use a legislative loophole in order to impose this $271-million tax increase without seeking approval from this House. The Treasurer has no shame. He doesn't even try to disguise this as a premium increase any more; he agrees that it is a tax action but he will not come to this Legislature. We believe it is a fundamental principle of parliamentary democracy that there should be no taxation without legislation.

Let me be very clear about the position of the New Democratic Party. We are opposed to this OHIP premium increase and we will do everything we can to stop it. Specifically, today I will be moving a no-confidence motion separate from the budget debate because this is the only parliamentary means at hand to stop this outrageous tax demand. We have already tried the other routes. We have appealed to you, Mr. Speaker, for a ruling that this tax increase must come before the House and I'm afraid that you did not see things our way.

We have asked both the Treasurer and the Premier himself if they will understand the principles of parliamentary democracy which are involved and bring this premium increase before the Legislature, either by resolution or in the form of legislation. That has been refused. The member for Scarborough-Ellesmere (Mr. Warner) has introduced a private member's bill which will have the effect of changing the Health Insurance Act, but it is already clear that the Conservative Party intends to block that particular piece of legislation which will come before the House on March 30. Because the House leader of the Conservative Party decides whether that bill will go further or not, it is not an effective and sure means of blocking this particular premium increase before it is due to take effect on May 1.

That is why we do not believe it is sufficient to simply move a general no-confidence motion which would come to a vote only in December. That is why we will be moving a motion specifically related to the health premium increase and designed so it can be debated right after the school break in late March or early April so that this Legislature can decide whether or not health premiums should be increased now.

I will read the motion, Mr. Speaker, which I will be sending up to you and which will be seconded by the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren). It says very simply that this House condemns the government's outrageous decision to raise Ontario health insurance premiums to the highest level in Canada; deplores the regressive impact of this arbitrary tax increase on wage earners in general, on farmers and small businesses and in particular on people of modest incomes; condemns the government's affront to the fundamental parliamentary principle of no taxation without legislation; and that for all these reasons this House no longer has confidence in the government.

We will be moving that motion. I appeal to members from all parties to consider their position very carefully because it is in the hands of this Legislature to decide whether or not the OHIP premium increase goes forward. We will be having a vote in the near future to make that decision and I hope that everybody in this House votes on behalf of the people of the province of Ontario and not on the narrow and ideological kind of doctrine that has been put forward by the Treasurer of this province.

We will also do everything in our power to get property tax relief for pensioners which the Treasurer has deliberately postponed in this budget. It is a cruel deception to talk of this relief and then to delay its implementation into the indefinite future. Pensioners, in our opinion, deserve property tax relief now.

The shell game that the Treasurer—that the Duke of Kent is playing with the municipalities, is equally deceptive. Last year at this time, municipalities were owed $18 million by the province under the promise that Ontario made five years ago to give municipalities and school boards a fair share of its increase in revenue, but under the Conservatives this province can no longer be trusted to live up to its promises. Last September, the Treasurer unilaterally repudiated this pledge, and suddenly the municipalities found themselves $298 million in deficit.

Last Tuesday, there was not even a blush of shame on the Treasurer's face as he announced that the Edmonton commitment was now reformulated—mark the word, Mr. Speaker—and put the municipalities in the hole to the tune of $444 million.

That kind of manipulation means only one thing, less money for municipalities from the province, and therefore more money will need to be raised from property taxpayers who already are too hard pressed in Ontario.

As we prepared for this budget, we tried to imagine what would be the most predictable and least helpful tax move the government could make. Sure enough, there are even more tax breaks for the mining industry, and even the Treasurer admits in this House this time that his measures may not create a single new job for up to five years. We don't think that these concessions will create a single new job at any time.

The Conservative government cannot resist its obsession to give handouts to the mining industry, yet both Inco and Falconbridge testified before the select committee on the Sudbury layoffs that their problem lay in shrinking world markets and not in the level of taxation in this province. That reality is simply ignored by the Treasurer, just as this government ignored the recommendations of that select committee.

Ontario has offered a new tax exemption for foreign processing, which is certain to export jobs which could and should be created in northern Ontario. Ontario's gifts to its mining sector are rapidly becoming a legend in the western world. Only days ago, against the clear will of a majority of members of this House, the government signed contracts that will give windfall profits exceeding $2 billion to two private uranium companies. The market value of the shares of Denison Mines alone has risen by $57 million from the time those contracts were announced last December until the day they were signed early this month.

And how do the people of Ontario benefit from our natural resources? Just compare, Mr. Speaker. If we're lucky, we can expect mining tax revenues this year, from every mine in the province, of $33 million.

Mr. Martel: Oh boy!

Mr. Cassidy: And that compares with $57 million that went into the pockets of shareholders of one mine thanks to the stroke of the pen by William Davis and Darcy McKeough.

When is this government ever going to learn that these mindless, blanket concessions to the mining industry are of no public benefit and must come to an end?

I want to mention only briefly the other tax measures announced in the budget. We have misgivings about the levy on railway rolling stock because we fear this may be particularly directed to the public sector by its impact on the Toronto Transit Commission and Canadian National Railways. Surely now is not the time to be doing anything that might discourage public transportation of freight or of passengers.

There's nothing wrong with a tax exemption on storm doors, but we are puzzled that a government which could not find $5 million last year for the home insulation program promised in the election campaign, has now found $15 million for a tax concession which is likely to have less impact, both in reducing energy consumption and in increasing employment.

We support the sales tax exemptions for the hospitality industry, because it is the only gesture in the entire budget towards meeting the economic needs of northern Ontario and because it is the only concrete policy directed to the needs of a particular industry.

It's now seven years since this Treasurer first introduced tax giveaways for capital investment by corporations. Whether they were called investment tax credits or sales tax rebates, there has been no evidence that these incentives help to create jobs. With this budget the Treasurer has introduced a document that purports to have the answers; it wasn't worth the wait.

This is just another self-serving document designed to prove the government's case. The only evidence offered by the Treasury is a prediction based on a computer model that the tax rebate would stimulate investment. What is particularly disturbing is the estimate in the same paper that the tax rebate program will eliminate 15,000 jobs this year as machines put people out of work.

That fact alone should justify withdrawing this tax concession particularly when that step would free up $178 million for real job creation. We opposed the extension of this machinery tax credit when it was made permanent 18 months ago and nothing has been offered to change the reasons for our opposition.

Likewise, last year we opposed a further $80 million handout to corporations which Ontario offered through fast write-offs and we are still opposed to that. To put it very simply, we believe that Ontario should be taking action to create jobs and not to destroy them.

Mr. Lewis: All those years, we said you were wrong and now your own statistics prove it.

Mr. Cassidy: Six thousand jobs destroyed last year; 15,000 jobs destroyed this year; and some promise that something might happen in the future. It just isn't good enough when we have more than 300,000 unemployed and the government won't bring any concrete action in order to create jobs.

Let me sum up for a minute: As last year, we believe that the machinery tax exemption should be removed and that its cost of $178 million should be put back into consolidated revenue; and while we oppose the OHIP premium increase in order to protect individual taxpayers, we are prepared to go along with the Treasurer's plan to raise $122 million from business. This is his estimate of how much corporations would contribute to the government through the increase in OHIP premiums. We would also like to recoup the $80 million that was given away last year for the fast write-off.

It seems to us, in the current economic situation, that the best means of achieving these two goals would be to raise corporation tax by two points, except for the small business rates, which would stay at 11 per cent. This would put us in the middle range of corporate tax rates for Canadian provinces and leave the income tax burden on corporations in Ontario still a full five percentage points below neighbouring US states, according to the Treasurer's own figures, and therefore more than competitive.

We also think that this is a prudent step in view of the program for job creation which will benefit the people of the province and business in the province much more directly than anything offered by the Treasurer.

That brings me to the single most glaring failure of this budget. The failure to take any effective action to help reduce unemployment.

At least there was some pretence of concern last year. The 1977 pre-election budget promised to accelerate $75 million in capital projects and thereby create 3,356 jobs. But the tide started to turn as soon as the votes were cast. By September, the Treasurer had decided to prune all but the most essential capital projects. He stepped on the gas in April, and slammed on the brakes in September.

There are now 326,000 people out of work in Ontario, the highest total in our history. There are 30,000 people out of work in the Ottawa area, where I live, and the unemployment rate is 8.8 per cent. Unemployment is 11 per cent in St. Catharines. It's 11.9 per cent in Windsor. It's over 10 per cent in the Peterborough area. Over 10 per cent in Hamilton-Niagara. Over 10 per cent around Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, and over 10 per cent in the north. Here, in Metropolitan Toronto, there are more than 100,000 people looking for work, and yet there is not a single specific new measure for creating full-time jobs in this budget.

The budget ignores the 142,000 young people who are unemployed now and focuses only on summer jobs for students who are still finishing their terms or their high school careers. There is not even a word of concern for the 88,000 women over 25 who are also out of work. In fact, the Treasurer has not told them that chronic unemployment is going to be a way of life so long as he is running affairs in this particular province.

We in the New Democratic Party just cannot understand how a government can be so heartless and so unconcerned. We believe that a job creation program for Ontario is absolutely essential to meet the current crisis.

We recognize that government, business and the people of Ontario must share in the solution of our unemployment crisis. We cannot afford to have a government that sits back and does nothing. I want to outline for this House what New Democrats think Ontario should be doing to help create jobs now.

First, we propose that Ontario should respond to two of our major manpower problems—the shortage of jobs for young workers and the need for skilled workers—by adopting a new approach to apprenticeships in industry. We believe that skills training should be a responsibility of industry, but that this responsibility should be taken over gradually. We propose that this year Ontario should share the cost of apprenticeships and training positions with industry on a 50-50 basis, a powerful incentive which could provide jobs and vital training for 10,000 young people at an estimated cost of $40 million.

Second, Ontario should bring in a program to conserve energy and to supplement the disastrously inadequate federal home insulation program. As of March 3 there have been fewer than 10,000 applications for that program out of nearly a million eligible housing units in Ontario. The federal program is obviously not going to work by itself. We propose a program of loan guarantees, coupled with a full interest subsidy which would encourage every house owner in the province to upgrade their insulation standards and save energy. This kind of plan could reach 100,000 homes per year at a cost of $10 million. We estimate it would create 2,300 full-time jobs.

We also believe it is time for Ontario to make a major commitment to the development of renewable energy resources as a counterpoint to its massive nuclear program. The solar energy industry in this province is on the verge of a breakthrough in consumer acceptance which will not only create employment and save energy in Ontario, but could also lead to major benefits and exports. We propose that Ontario make that breakthrough a reality by offering a $1,500 subsidy per unit to equip new houses with solar heating equipment. The cost to provide this subsidy for 20,000 new homes would be $30 million. We estimate that it would directly create 1,500 jobs and that there would be enormous indirect benefit as well.

There is still an urgent need for housing for senior citizens in Ontario as well as for families of low and moderate incomes. This need is getting more acute by the day because of the government's decision to end its involvement in housing. It's time for Ontario to give serious encouragement to the co-operative and non-profit housing sector which it has so deliberately shelved in the past. This sector of the housing market will respond rapidly if given the chance. We propose a program to build an additional 7,000 co-operative and non-profit housing units this year for people of low and modest income. The incentive would be a capital grant of $5,000 per unit. The cost would be $35 million and it would create 14,000 new jobs in construction and in the building materials industry—two industries that are the hardest hit by unemployment.

We also propose that Ontario begin to meet the enormous need for assisted housing. Last fall there were more than 8,000 families and 15,000 senior citizens on the waiting list for Ontario housing. Thousands more have simply given up hope. We propose the construction of an additional 2,000 units for families and 2,000 senior citizens' units this year. Enough funding is available from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the net cost to the province would be a maximum of $85 million. We estimate that this would create a further 8,000 new jobs on site and in construction materials.

There is a clear need for rehabilitation as part of Ontario's overall housing policy, and the Ontario Home Renewal Program has already proven that it can do the job if it's given the resources. We propose a $25 million expansion of OHRP to facilitate the upgrading of existing homes, particularly for families of modest income. This would create an estimated 1,500 full-time jobs this year.

The needs of the north have been totally ignored in this budget, as if the layoffs of Inco and Falconbridge and the high unemployment in the northwest had never taken place. We want action to create long-term jobs in the north, but right now there is a need to create municipal services and the benefits that would accrue would be permanent. We propose that $25 million be allocated in special grants for hard services in northern Ontario to help to close the gap for this unemployed part of the province, and we estimate that this would create approximately 1,000 new jobs.

Now is also the time to take advantage of a large number of provincial and municipal capital projects that are on the shelf, approved and ready to go. With the current slack in the construction industry, these projects could be under way by this summer.

We propose that Ontario provide $150 million to accelerate provincial and municipal projects, like the Toronto Board of Education's program to bring its older buildings up to municipal health and safety standards; the city of Windsor's expansion of its sewer system into previously unserved areas that are now on septic tanks; the problems of re-development of the Burwash site in Sudbury; and Sudbury region's local services improvement program; and the provincial office tower in Hamilton which was chopped by the Treasurer last September.

In Cornwall, there is a $1.7 million grade separation project that has been cancelled because of lack of funds on the part of the city; and there are similar projects on the shelf in every part of Ontario that are ready to go if Ontario would give the green light. We estimate that acceleration of these projects would generate 7,500 new jobs, on and off construction sites, and respond to the particular needs of an industry whose rates of unemployment are the highest of any industry in Ontario.

The total cost of our job creation program would be approximately $400 million and it would create 45,800 jobs. These are not make-work jobs, Mr. Speaker; every one of these proposals meets a recognized need. Each of these proposals would be of long-term benefit, whether in housing, in government service, in conserving energy or in providing the skilled workers we will need to make Ontario's industry competitive in the 1980s. The McKeough budget only creates 142 long-term jobs, this program of the New Democratic Party would create 45,800 jobs; and that is the kind of leadership that we would have for Ontario.

The failure of the Davis government to come to grips with the long-term problems of the Ontario economy is just as glaring as its failure to create jobs now. Just three years ago, in 1975, this Treasurer seemed to feel that the province could play an active role in securing the future of our economy. Not any more; now he has embraced the creed that government should do nothing but abdicate its responsibility. It has become fashionable for government to attack its own role and to assert that its activities should be limited to limiting itself.

The Treasurer's view of economic strategy and that of the New Democratic Party could not be further apart. He is a cheerleader and an apologist for the lack of action by the government. The Treasurer's stance is passive; ours is active.

All the evidence is that we have been frittering away our advantages in Ontario under the Conservative government, and now Ontario is paying the price of a Conservative government's mismanagement. We've been living high on our natural resources and we have failed to be vigilant, either in building our industrial economy or in protecting the province from the damaging consequences of foreign ownership.

The key to our economic future in Ontario is self-reliance, but the Conservatives, under this Premier and Treasurer, have done all that they could to move us in the opposite direction. Whether you talk tourism or manufacturing trade, investment flows or research and management fees, we are simply not doing enough for ourselves and relying far too much on others. In the long term, both Ontario and Canada will pay the price.

We've always been able to count on the strength of our resource sector, but now even that strength is disappearing. The reason is not just the temporary weakness in world mineral markets. It's the mismanagement of our northern forest by this government; it's the failure to build industry in the north when our resources were most important in world markets. Our challenge is to build this province's industrial economy in the difficult times that lie ahead, because the Tories failed to do the job when we were enjoying good times in the late 1960s and the early 1970s.

We will not succeed if we stand back, as the Treasurer tells us, and rely on the private sector alone. Ontario must use the power, the influence and the leadership of government in order to nurture and develop our manufacturing base rather than leave it prey to the monopoly capitalism that the Tories call free enterprise. Industry is crying out for co-operation with government; we believe that government should respond.

To have a real economic strategy, you must have goals and a view of the future and a sense of how to achieve it. Government must be willing to share responsibility with the private sector for reaching these goals. This means a new kind of relationship between the public sector and the private sector. We have to replace the generalized concessions that the Treasurer loves so much with initiatives that would respond to specific areas of weakness and specific problems in the economy. We have to target the use of government assistance and of government resources and we should expect to get a return for the public from the use of public funds.

Ontario faces serious economic problems. The proportion of our labour force in manufacturing has been shrinking to the point where the Science Council of Canada says that this country and its industrial heartland here in Ontario are becoming semi-industrialized.

The Ontario Economic Council's forecast for the next 10 years also makes depressing reading. It suggests that over the next decade the number of manufacturing jobs in Ontario will grow by only 11,000 jobs per year. Even this estimate lacks credibility when one considers that over the past 10 years, despite all of the boasts of the Treasurer, jobs in manufacturing have grown at only half that rate; that is, at only 5,000 or 6,000 jobs per year.

One has to ask where this province is going when the Ontario Economic Council relies heavily on the growth of the government sector to meet Ontario's employment targets over the next 10 years while the Duke of Chatham-Kent, the Treasurer of Ontario, proudly reports that he has brought the growth in public sector employment to a complete halt. Those contradictions cannot persist without seeing unemployment rise to levels which have been precedent in this country before only in areas like Newfoundland, and that's not acceptable for Ontario.

The symptoms of our industrial malaise have been evident in the headlines week after week over the past year, and that's one of the reasons that we are shocked at the lack of action by the Treasurer. Ontario is now losing more than 15,000 jobs a year through layoffs and shutdowns, and these are only the figures that are reported to the Ministry of Labour. The list is almost endless: 165 jobs at the Chrysler trim plant at Ajax; another 100 jobs or more at Chrysler down in Windsor; 78 jobs lost at Northern Telecom in Brampton; 485 jobs lost at International Harvester in Hamilton; 136 jobs at Shepherd boats in Niagara Falls—

Mr. Peterson: Stephen already did this.

Mr. Cassidy: It's worth listening to, I say to the member for London Centre.

Mr. Swart: My leader is upstaging the member.

Mr. Peterson: I listened to him last time, and it was better than yours.

Mr. Cassidy: It is very much worth listening to, because this is what is happening to our industry in this province because the Conservatives are asleep at the switch and letting our industrial base decline.

Continuing with the list: 275 jobs at Bethlehem Steel's ore mine in Marmora; 250 at Pilkington Brothers in Scarborough; 280 next month at Reed National Drapery in Weston; 700 jobs in May at Christie Brown bakeries in Toronto; and 3,000 workers at Inco and Falconbridge in Sudbury and Port Colborne. Is this really the time for government to stand aside, as the Treasurer pretends? We do not believe so.

Mr. Peterson: There's a lot of criticism there.

Mr. Cassidy: And the criticism is well deserved.

I want to outline our strategy for a series of industries and for a series of major areas to which we would give priority if we were the government. I also want to underline how many of our problems are due to the fact that Ontario's industry is so heavily foreign-controlled. This is the biggest single structural weakness in Ontario's economy but, far from recognizing the consequences of foreign ownership in Ontario and trying to deal with them, Ontario looks the other way. Both here and in Ottawa the Treasurer and the Premier have vigorously lobbied to tear down the fragile and inadequate barriers that Canada has tried to erect against foreign economic domination.

In blithe ignorance of the problems created by truncated branch plant operations in this province, the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes)—and I'm sorry he isn't here—made his debut last month with an enthusiastic invitation to Japanese investors to bring more branch plants into this province. One of the reasons we question that kind of appeal is the fact that, as the Ontario Economic Council has pointed out in the study of business investment released just before the budget, our industry is 60 per cent foreign-owned, yet only six per cent of its financing comes from abroad. In other words, the continued foreign domination of our industry, with all the consequences that entails, is financed almost exclusively by money that is raised here in Canada.

[4:00]

Mr. Wildman: A sellout.

Mr. Cassidy: The consequences of foreign ownership are felt in every corner of our economy, through weaknesses in research, in marketing, in access to markets like the US, in innovation, in purchasing within Canada which could help develop small business; and even at times in the degree of company participation in local community life.

The way to solving these problems starts here in this chamber. Government must be prepared to provide leadership and direction in the economy. It must focus its efforts on the specific areas and industries where that help is needed, rather than spreading its efforts so thin that they have no impact. Government must be prepared to act as a counterbalance to the adverse consequences of foreign ownership here in the Ontario economy.

I want to focus specifically on four industries during this budget reply to give an idea of the approach that we in the New Democratic Party will be taking. I also want to say that during the budget debate my colleagues will be dealing with some of these sectors in more detail to demonstrate that our priority in the New Democratic Party is jobs and the building of Ontario's economy. This priority will not be reflected only in the budget debate; over the course of the coming months, the coming years, up to whenever the next election comes, whether it is in May or in 1979 or in 1980, we are going to focus on these economic issues. We are going to focus on the weaknesses of industry for which this government is responsible, and we are going to focus on all of the broad areas of industrial policy in which this government has been letting Ontario down.

I also want to say a word of tribute and of thanks to the researchers in the New Democratic Party research department who, three or four weeks ago, were faced with the challenge of adapting to a new leader and coming up with background material both for my reply on the Throne Speech two-and-a-half weeks ago and for this major speech on the budget. They are as fine a crew as we have ever had working for the New Democratic Party; and I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, five or six New Democratic Party researchers have on occasion in the history of this province come very close to bringing the entire government of the Tories, that has been in power for 30-odd years, with all its civil servants and all its resources, right to its knees and almost to the point of being thrown out. They have come very close in the past, and we will do it in the future.

Mr. Lewis: Five or six of them? One, at any moment in time, can take you all on.

Mr. Cassidy: That's right.

Mr. Warner: They too want you to resign.

Mr. Cassidy: I want to begin with Ontario's single most important industry, the automobile industry. At the first ministers' conference, the Premier himself said, "We have had enough studies of the automobile industry. What we need now is action." His message is not getting through to his own government, despite the disturbing evidence that the automobile industry in Canada faces a very difficult future. Most of the auto industry is here in Ontario, and almost all of it is foreign-controlled.

Despite its expansion since the auto pact was signed 13 years ago, the automobile industry is still an outstanding example of how branch plant structure stands in the way of achieving a strategy that puts Ontario's needs first. Take the most fundamental factor of investment, on which the Treasurer harps so often. North America's automobile industry has embarked on a phase of massive retooling to produce the new generation of vehicles which will meet legislative demands for safer cars with less pollution and better gas mileage.

These investment needs are estimated at around $2 billion a year for the next few years, but only a small percentage of this investment will be made in Canada. With nine per cent of the North American car market, automotive subsidiaries in Canada currently receive only five per cent of capital investment by the "big four" auto makers. When we are falling this far behind in automotive investment today, how can we hope to have a fair share of jobs in the future?

The federal government's task force on the automobile industry, which resulted in what is known as the Arthur report, found that 49 per cent of US auto workers are unskilled but 75 per cent of Canadian auto workers are unskilled. In the US, the proportion of skilled workers is four times as high as in Canada. The best jobs go south of the border.

The structure of the industry also favours the US parents when we look at research and development. These expenditures are massively concentrated in the US, but the federal task force calculated that the big automobile companies in Canada had contributed nearly $1.4 billion to the research and development work of their US parent corporations just in the six-year period from 1970 to 1975. Today, that transfer of research and development payments is running at a level approaching $350 million a year. That represents an enormous loss to Canada, not just in scientific and technical jobs that we could have here, but also in the enormous benefits that we would gain if Canadian plants or firms were developing new products and processes for the auto industry rather than relying completely on US technology.

The Arthur report provides very strong evidence that costs and productivity in the Canadian auto industry are comparable to the United States and that belies the kinds of myths that we keep getting from Conservative ministers and back-benchers on the other side of this House. Because we are so competitive, it can only be the arbitrary decisions of the big car manufacturers that give us the short end of the stick every time.

Our deficit in trade of automobile parts across the border now runs at more than $3 billion per annum. But in the view of the federal report—a very careful study—it is General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors which are primarily responsible for this imbalance because they control three-fifths of the parts industry. Their decisions about where plants locate determine whether or not Canada gets a fair share of parts production. In other words, any one of these automobile companies alone has more impact this year on the economic health of the province of Ontario than the entire budget brought down last week by the Treasurer.

An hon. member: That's the way he wants it.

Mr. Cassidy: It's obvious that our automobile parts deficit doesn't happen by accident. If we fail to deal with the reasons, we will not solve the problem. It's not good for the Premier to wave a magic wand and say that Ontario could have 20,000 more jobs by correcting the trade deficit on the auto pact unless this government is prepared to deal with the fundamental problems of the industry. There has been no sign that they were prepared to take that fundamental approach in the past and no signs for the future that they're prepared to take that step either.

Ontario's concern for the machinery industry has also been almost non-existent. This industry drains our economic strength in Canada even more than the automobile industry. Last year's trade deficit in this sector hit the incredible level of $3.8 billion, three times what it was 10 years ago. If we could close this deficit, the provincial Ministry of Industry and Tourism estimates that Ontario would gain 47,000 new jobs. That's a heck of a cut in the number of unemployed we have in Ontario right now.

Mr. Martel: You are interfering with the free enterprise system.

Mr. Cassidy: What strength there is left in Canada's machinery sector is dwindling rapidly. Most of that industry is in this province. We are the only industrialized nation that imports more than 50 per cent of our machinery and equipment needs. In fact, foreign producers now supply about 60 per cent of the Canadian market and Canada's imports of machinery are actually worth more in dollar terms than the imports of machinery for the entire United States, despite the fact that its population and its economy are 10 to 12 times the size of Canada's.

Mr. Philip: Think what that does.

Mr. Cassidy: The areas where we import the most—farm equipment, forestry, mining and construction—are precisely the areas where the Canadian market is large enough to support domestic industry. In mining alone, Canada runs third in world production, but we run a yearly mining machinery and equipment deficit of $750 million and we import fully two-thirds of what we use in machinery in our mines.

Mr. Martel: Why doesn't the government get involved?

Mr. Cassidy: In forestry, the situation is almost as bad. If the current tariff negotiations in Geneva cut our machinery tariffs by half, the industry estimates that more than half its remaining workers will lose their jobs.

Why doesn't the Canadian sector of the machinery industry perform better? After all, they've been lavished with all sorts of tax incentives by the Treasurer over the past seven years. Perhaps one reason is that three-quarters of the industry's output is from foreign-controlled subsidiaries, mainly from the United States. Their record for branch plant investment in research and development is terrible. According to the Treasurer himself, American machinery firms employ 79 times more innovators for research and development than do Canadian firms.

Even though Ontario has more than 300,000 unemployed, there is still a shortage of skilled labour in machinery which is so severe that some firms have been recruiting in Britain. Yet the industry has been unwilling to develop apprenticeship programs and the Ontario government has done nothing to force the issue. Obviously, the solution to the problems in the machinery industry are not simple, but the actions of the Ontario government have had no positive impact at all. The Canadian industry is relatively weaker today than when the Treasurer and his government began to promote business investment in machinery and equipment with tax concessions seven years ago.

Private industry initiative on which he is so strong, has failed to solve weaknesses in skilled labour and in research in this industry, and despite the enormous market for mining and forestry equipment in Canada, during a resource boom that has lasted in this country for more than 25 years private industry has failed to establish a strong resource machinery sector in Canada. The development of a co-ordinated approach by government and the private sector is not only long overdue in the area of machinery, Mr. Speaker, it is an essential part of an effective economic strategy, and we would do it if we were the government today.

Mr. Martel: It was recommended four years ago too; by your friends.

Mr. Cassidy: If ever there was a case, Mr. Speaker, for government to provide leadership and direction in our economy, it is in the textile industry.

There are 75,000 workers in textiles and clothing in Ontario and the Ontario Economic Council has optimistically advised the Treasurer that there would still be that many jobs 10 years hence. They may be whistling in the wind because the prospects are not good right now; for despite the fact that this industry is as efficient as almost any in the world, its future is in grave jeopardy because of import competition from low-wage countries.

The industry's problems are chiefly related to uncertainty about its future, and only a commitment from government can assure the industry that it has a future to invest in. Both the Treasurer and his federal counterparts have been all too ready to write off the industry as an inevitable victim of changes in world trade. But the textile industry is by no means dead yet and it should not be written off.

The import share of the textile market has grown only a little since 1970 and is just over a quarter of the value of the Canadian market; we are still fighting back if we have the chance. In clothing imports have doubled their market share since 1970 and the number of garments that are imported is very high, but imports have only recently grown to a quarter of the Canadian market.

We urgently need a declaration from government that it is worthwhile having a viable textile and clothing industry and that for this reason the penetration of our market by imported textile and clothing must and will be kept to a tolerable level. That is what the industry is waiting to hear from this government, Mr. Speaker, and that is what it has not been getting from the Treasurer or his federal counterpart.

Many of the firms in the industry are very small; they need help in pooling research and development efforts, in testing and evaluating new equipment and new techniques and in expanding the number of trainees in the industry to fill the growing need for skilled workers. Textile firms are the economic mainstay of many small towns in southern Ontario. The policy of abandonment that the government seems to favour would do immense damage to these communities because the government has no alternative forms of employment to replace the textile firms if they close.

A sectorial study of this industry by the Ontario Ministry of Industry and Tourism concluded, and I quote: "If some confidence in the industry's ability to maintain or improve its share of the domestic market can be restored, there is every reason to believe that this industry will continue to improve its working conditions, wages, productivity, and its contribution to the economic wealth of this province and the nation. If, however, the continuing reduction in its share of the market persists the outlook is bleak."

The choice could not be put more clearly than in the ministry's own words, but because the Treasurer and this government deliberately choose to stand aside, 75,000 jobs in the textile and clothing industry in Ontario are on the line, Mr. Speaker, and we say that is wrong.

Mr. Roy: You will need more co-ordination in your support back there.

Mr. Cassidy: The member for Ottawa East should be clapping as well; it is a better speech than his party's financial critic gave. Compared to these three industries, Ontario's performance in steel has been outstanding, Mr. Speaker. This is almost the major manufacturing industry in this province in which we are self-sufficient. The industry is efficient, our prices are 10 per cent to 20 per cent below those of our US competitors, our plant is up-to-date and our technology and research are equal of any steel industry in the world. I think the people and the workers of Hamilton, as well as Sault Ste. Marie, can be proud of what our steel industry has achieved.

Mr. Swart: And Welland.

[4:15]

Mr. Cassidy: And Welland, that's right. The member for Welland-Thorold (Mr. Swart) mentions Welland as well.

While import competition has been a nightmare for many Ontario industries over the past five years, the flow of imported steel to Ontario has dropped sharply and the industry has been systematically expanding its facilities to make, or to be capable of making, products which were formerly not made here.

It is surely no coincidence that this is the only major Canadian industry which is almost entirely Canadian-owned. And that tells you a story, Mr. Speaker; I hope it tells the government a story as well.

On the dark side, however, the prospects for future growth in steel are very limited. We hold our own in international trade and succeed in exporting to the United States; but it's another story when we come to products that are made from steel. In fact, we are massive importers of manufactured products made from steel, and there is no prospect that this will change until we get a decisive economic strategy for Ontario.

I have already talked about the situation in automobile parts and in machinery and equipment. Without action by Ontario and the federal government, our deficit in these two industries is bound to continue and the jobs that could exist in Canada, providing primary steel for these industries, will also be lost as an inevitable result.

The situation is very similar in farm implements and the appliance industry, where we also have huge deficits. The demand for steel in the construction industry is weak because of the general weakness of our economy, for which governments carry a major share of the blame.

In fact, the only dynamic future market for Ontario's steel industry is in the area of energy; yet when he went to Ottawa for the first ministers' conference, the Premier of Ontario failed to make any concrete proposal to ensure that the Canadian portion of the Alcan pipeline will use Canadian pipe.

Even the apparent health of the steel industry, therefore, speaks to the weakness of the economic strategy of this government; they could not speak up for the protection of jobs in the most dynamic sector of the steel industry in the province, and we say that was wrong. We would have spoken up, and have and will continue to speak up for those steel pipes to be made in Canada.

Mr. Martel: That's why we voted on it.

Mr. Cassidy: This province and this country are running a spectacular annual trade deficit in manufactured goods of over $10 billion, and that reflects the deep-seated weakness in the structure of our economy. We still depend on the export of resources to support our standard of living and in so doing we are exporting tens, if not hundreds of thousands, of manufacturing jobs.

The exporting of steel products, while we import manufactured goods which incorporate steel, is just another example of the same phenomenon. Ontario's steel production would go up by millions of tons a year if government moved to help create a strong manufacturing sector to complement the strength of our resource base.

That brings me to the most scandalous failure of all in the Conservative government's mismanagement of the economy: their failure to take advantage of Ontario's natural resources and to use them as a base from which to build a strong manufacturing economy. Over the past 30 years we have imported the manufactured goods we need by selling our resources in exchange. Now we are losing the advantage of that resource base and, at the same time, we have failed to develop the industrial base to take its place.

Mining production, for example, has plunged from six per cent of our GPP—our gross provincial product—in 1961, to only 3.5 per cent today. And how do the Conservatives react? They don't just act like spectators at a disaster; they even make things worse by actively encouraging the resource industry to export jobs rather than build jobs here in this country.

Mr. Warner: They are the disasters.

Mr. Martel: Giveaways.

Mr. Cassidy: The Conservatives have allowed the mineral industry to funnel its profits and jobs out of Ontario. They have given incentives to shift processing abroad but made no demands that the industry's profits be reinvested in Ontario.

Now, they have made a deal with Denison Mines and Preston Mines which provides no guarantee that billions of dollars of windfall profits that are being given away on uranium won't also be exported out of the country to create jobs abroad, just like they allowed International Nickel to do over the past 10 years.

In 1975 the then Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Bernier) announced that the government, in assessing the mining tax, was deferring for five years the disallowance on foreign processing costs. This action amounted to a giveaway to the companies of about $15 million, with Falconbridge Nickel Mines the biggest beneficiary.

The reason offered was to ensure that the mining companies, "have the necessary financial resources to sustain employment in Ontario."

Mr. Wildman: Falconbridge has a great record.

Mr. Cassidy: But this giveaway did nothing of the kind. It did nothing to reduce the layoffs in Sudbury in 1975 and it did nothing to prevent the layoffs at Falconbridge and Inco in 1978. All it did was make the companies richer while Ontario got poorer.

Mr. Martel: And fewer jobs. You keep exporting them.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. J. Edwin Carter—what a capitalist name that is—the chairman of Inco, quite bluntly told the select committee on Inco that if Ontario wiped out its mining taxes entirely—and they haven't far to go right now—"it probably wouldn't be that much of a big deal."

But the Tories ignore both their past mistakes and the present evidence. The new concessions to the mining industry granted in the budget will probably cost the province between $75 million and $100 million over the next few years. With that money, the government can and should intervene aggressively and with imagination. They should have stepped in last spring when the Ministry of Natural Resources warned of impending cutbacks in the nickel industry. But did the government act? They didn't even consult the companies involved, let alone the workers or the communities that are now so hard-hit by the layoffs at Inco and Falconbridge.

Mr. Martel: They give us a $10 million building.

Mr. Cassidy: If Inco and Falconbridge were refining all of their nickel output in Ontario, we could have about 2,000 extra jobs in this province rather than losing 2,000 jobs because of the layoffs.

Rather than bemoaning the reduction in mining exploration and hoping that something would happen, Ontario should have established a Crown corporation to insure that exploration does take place and that new mining discoveries are controlled by the people of Ontario and not by the private sector.

The Treasurer doesn't understand—as you do, Mr. Speaker, being a member for the north—that the economy of northern Ontario cannot survive on tax concessions that create jobs in other countries. The future of the north's economy depends on using its wealth to create secondary manufacturing jobs that will be there when the resources are gone. New Democrats have argued that public ownership is an essential tool in the industrial strategy to ensure that the future development of the mining industry is in the public interest. After 75 years, the private sector has demonstrated that it will never develop secondary industry in the north on its own; and that is why we say you've got to take another road.

Mr. Martel: How much more proof do you need? We've had 75 years of nothing.

Mr. Cassidy: The situation is no different with our other great natural resource, the forest. The mismanagement of Ontario's forest resources by this government in the past years has been shocking. We are on the brink of losing the advantage that Ontario enjoys of having enormous natural forest resources, and yet the government is doing less than nothing. It boggles the mind that in 1977, after the Bramalea charter promised to plant two trees for every tree cut, and after all the warnings from the forestry profession and from this party, and from the Ministry of Natural Resources itself, the ministry is regenerating fewer acres and planting fewer trees than it was regenerating and planting back in 1975.

Mr. Renwick: Shame.

Mr. Cassidy: We are still laying to waste in perpetuity at least one-third of the acreage of forest that is cut every year in Ontario, and our children and our children's children cannot afford that kind of waste. The regeneration that is carried out on the rest is still shockingly inadequate and future generations can't afford that either. What's more, there was not one word in either the Throne Speech or in the budget that even promised any improvement.

In the last election campaign, we stressed how the failure to regenerate our forests and Crown lands was jeopardizing jobs in the forest industry. The Ministry of Natural Resources estimates that there are now about 70,000 jobs in the forestry industry and related industries. But at the current rate of regeneration, our forest will give us a sustained yield that is so much less than the current rate of harvest that we stand to lose 12,000 jobs from that total rather than gain any jobs. And of course it's in the north—already hard-pressed—that the bulk of this impact will be felt.

But if the regeneration program were to be expanded to the level which was actually recommended by the ministry, the total employment in the forest industry would double to an estimated 140,000 in 40 years from now. That is a difference of 83,000. That is the cost to Ontario in long-term jobs of this government's failure to pursue an adequate policy of regeneration.

This year's budget allocates only 6.9 per cent more spending to the Ministry of Natural Resources. There is obviously no new money there for forest management, but without new management the job simply can't be done. As New Democrats, we believe that our vast forest resources under proper administration are capable of creating employment for hundreds of thousands of new workers. We would be willing to see our forests placed under control of an Ontario forest resources commission which would operate under long-term policies of conservation, reforestation and soil control. One of its first tasks would be to review all existing contracts and timber licences and cancel those which have disposed of great areas of forest resources without proper consideration. That's a good policy, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hodgson: It sounds good.

Mr. Cassidy: It does sound good, as a matter of fact. If members opposite think that it's a dogmatic socialist position I want the House to know that I have drawn those very words from the 22-point program of the Hon. George Drew in 1943; and that was yet another program made in the heat of an election campaign that this government has broken from.

Mr. Martel: You blew it again, Bill.

Mr. Swart: Darcy's views are older than George Drew.

Mr. Deans: What a record of failure.

Mr. Cassidy: To the right of Genghis Khan and the Hon. George Drew.

Mr. Warner: What a record of perpetual failure.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, my colleagues will be dealing at greater length later in this debate about the questions of agriculture, energy and the continued failure of this government to make any real commitment to the balanced development of Ontario's economy and in particular to the development of eastern and northern Ontario.

Perhaps I could just say a few words to the member for York North (Mr. Hodgson) about the failure to even mention agriculture in this budget, because that is yet another example of the government's failure to provide leadership and direction in a vital area of our economy.

It shocks us in the New Democratic Party—what's that?

Mr. Eaton: Where is Gordon Hill to present your policy for you?

Mr. Cassidy: Gordon Hill? He's coming here, don't you worry. He is a perceptive fellow. He supported me in my leadership campaign.

It shocks us in the New Democratic Party that a government which claims to be concerned about rural Ontario offers no concrete response at all to the economic problems now besetting our province. I think the member for Middlesex (Mr. Eaton) should explain to his farm voters why they have to pay an extra $144 a year in OHIP premiums with nobody to bail them out.

Mr. Martel: He can't even get help from the bean board.

Mr. Cassidy: Government figures show that farm costs have risen by 49 per cent since 1973 while the index of farm prices has fallen by two per cent. The consequence is that net farm income is plummeting. It fell by 20 per cent in 1976, by 18 per cent in 1977 and apparently it is expected to fall a further 11 per cent this year. Farming is as vital to Ontario's economy as forestry or mining but under the Conservatives the economic future of agriculture is under siege.

Now, more than ever, the need for a real farm income stabilization plan is undeniable, but let me record that it was the Conservative government of the Treasurer and the member for Middlesex which rejected the real farm stabilization plan which was put forward by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and that's one of the reasons that Gordon Hill is with us and not with you.

Mr. Eaton: The farmers of Middlesex showed what they thought of his plan too.

Mr. Cassidy: Energy is also fundamental to Ontario's economic strategy, but here too the Treasurer has imposed his blinkered ideology as firmly as in the area of Ontario's finances.

I have the most prosperous farm land of all Canada in my riding as a matter of fact, so I claim every credit to speak on behalf of the farm vote.

Mr. Hodgson: The one over on the island?

Mr. Wildman: Would you please quit maligning Algoma over there?

Mr. Cassidy: I would also say for the record that my roots in rural Ontario go back to a century farm in the great riding of Grey, I think it is, or Bruce, in Chesley, Ontario where my mother's family comes from and where my spiritual home still lies.

Mr. Hodgson: Why didn't they let him stay on the farm?

Mr. Riddell: Your family sure weren't of the party affiliation that you are; they were good Liberals.

Mr. Roy: They consider you a prodigal son.

Mr. Martel: He saw the light.

Mr. Cassidy: I would say, for the member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. Riddell), that the way my family has developed we combine the best wisdom of both urban and rural Ontario.

Mr. Warner: Right on.

Mr. Lewis: That's just the beginning.

[4:30]

Mr. Cassidy: In our view, it is central to Ontario's industrial strategy that we do everything possible to maintain the supply of relatively cheap electrical energy which Ontario has produced in the past, thanks to our abundant hydro-electric resources and to Ontario's far-sighted creation 70 years ago of a publicly-owned power corporation dedicated to the principle of power at cost.

Mr. Martel: The Treasurer should sell that.

Mr. Cassidy: That principle has been totally repudiated by the government's decision to give billions of dollars of windfall profits to Denison Mines and Preston Mines. It is the Treasurer himself who is the man who started that particular decision on the part of the government. Those uranium assets should not have been leased to those two companies and should have been brought back into public ownership.

The decision to give those windfall profits to Denison and to Preston will add billions of dollars to the production costs of Ontario industry and thereby undermine Ontario's future competitive position in a very tough industrial world for the rest of this century and on into the next, that is, for the lifetime of the young men and women who cannot today find jobs.

We will be handicapped in our competitiveness because of the decisions of this government of the Treasurer and the Premier.

As for the future of eastern and northern Ontario, it is significant that this year's budget contains not even one word about regional development. The tide of Tory concern for these parts of the province has come to such a complete halt that we no longer even get the perfunctory promises and paper planning which the government offered in the past.

Mr. Wildman: They even blocked the member for Algoma-Manitoulin's bill.

Mr. Cassidy: That's right, and it was a pretty lousy bill at that. It was a halting first step in the right direction.

The economic strategy which we propose for Ontario must concern itself with specific industries, but it must also take a wider view. I am disturbed and we're all disturbed at the facile solution proposed by people like the Premier. We are also disturbed by the failure of government ministers to understand the fundamental problems in our economy, such as our weakness in filling home market demands, our failure to encourage domestic manufacturing, why our research and development are so weak, how our manpower policy actually discriminates against Canadians, how our distorted economic structure contributes to low productivity in this province and why small business doesn't get a fair deal.

Perhaps it's too much for Conservatives to understand, but one of the fundamental reasons for the weakness of our economy is the distortions created because we have such a high degree of foreign ownership. Let me go back to some of the points I raised in my budget reply last year.

One of the fundamentals in our economic strategy is to give Ontario a strong home market. This province has become a happy dumping ground for imports which are putting our economy in grave peril.

Mr. Swart: We need to dump the Treasurer.

Mr. Cassidy: Here in Canada's industrial heartland we import $5 billion more in manufactures than we export and we consume close to $20 billion worth of manufactured imports overall. Government ministers keep on saying we have to export or die, regardless of the export restraints that are laid on so many of our foreign-owned corporations. But the biggest and most accessible foreign market for Ontario manufacturers is that $20-billion market right here in this province. Unless we have a strong domestic market, our efforts to break into world trade are doomed to fail. In our opinion therefore, the first priority of our economic strategy must be: identify and develop Canadian markets for Ontario-produced goods to help build the industrial capacity to serve our own needs.

Last year, and again in my reply to the Throne Speech last month, I proposed that Ontario adopt a real buy-Canadian policy as one essential element in our overall economic strategy. We believe that Ontario must be prepared to take the lead with a buy-Canadian program that goes further than spending a few dollars on public relations. In my reply to the Throne Speech, I suggested that Ontario move immediately with a buy-Canadian policy covering the substantial purchases, the billion dollars of purchases by the provincial government, by local governments, and by other agencies which use provincial tax dollars.

That's one way of creating jobs in Canada and relieving our current unemployment. At the consumer level, Ontario must ensure that consumers are informed about the Canadian content of all goods, both in the store and when they are advertised or listed in catalogues. We don't have to wait for the federal government to launch this program now.

Ontario should also work closer with retailers to ensure that they seek to offer Canadian products, and not only imports, and to assist them in developing Canadian sources for products that are now only available from abroad. One of the frustrations for consumers who want their dollars to help create jobs in this country is that often they cannot find Canadian goods, or they cannot tell the goods that are made in this country when they go to the rack or when they go to the store.

The buy-Canadian concept is a vital element in our policy for building small business in Canada. Too often the contracts and sub-contracts which should be directed towards Canadian industry go to foreign sources instead. The consequence is that Canadian companies are denied the demand which would allow them to grow to the point where they could replace the foreign branch-plant firms. In the private sector, as well as in the public sector, Ontario should be identifying product needs that are filled in a fragmented fashion from abroad but which could lead to the growth of Canadian industry if they were grouped together.

Ontario needs many policies to promote small or medium-sized business, which is now treated as an orphan in our economy by this Conservative government. This means better financing, better management training and counselling, close co-operation with government in winning new markets at home and abroad, and guaranteeing small business the right to compete for both government and private contracts from which they are often excluded. Both the province and agencies that use Ontario tax dollars should direct a substantial share of purchasing to small and medium-sized business.

We have all heard Conservatives say how concerned they are for small business. We've all heard the Treasurer talk on Canada's need to be more competitive abroad. Why then is the Davis government opposing the changes in the federal Competition Act which would promote competition at home and make it easier for small business to develop? Surely it is obvious that the interests of big business weigh more heavily with this government than any real dedication to the principles of free enterprise.

Our economy is weak in research and product development, and this is now acknowledged even by the Treasurer. Just the other day, the Treasurer said that the deficiency in Ontario's level of research and development is "intolerable." According to his figures, Canada spends 1.1 per cent of its GNP on research, compared with close to 2.5 per cent in the United States and West Germany. General Motors, IBM and Ford each spend more on research in the United States in a single year than all of Canada's industries combined.

Since he is a Conservative, the only reason the Treasurer could see for our low level of research was that research and development isn't profitable enough. In fact, the problem is a symptom of our branch-plant economy. When branch plants are set up in Canada, they serve the Canadian market and import technology from the parent company. And that kind of colonial attitude extends well beyond the area of pure research.

On the other side of Oakville, for example, Gulf Oil Canada is expanding its Clarkson refinery at a cost of $180 million. But the company is importing 85 per cent of its high-technology stainless steel requirements and didn't even bother to give Canadian firms in Toronto a chance to compete for the orders. The new refinery is being designed, not here in Canada but in Britain, and 44 of the 75 supervisory jobs in the projects went to Americans, who were paid an expatriate allowance for the hardship of leaving New York City and coming to Toronto.

Mr. McClellan: That is wonderful.

Mr. Cassidy: With attitudes like that, we simply don't get the experience and spinoffs from major investments which could lead to the export of Canadian knowhow. This government doesn't help either. Even Ontario Hydro called in Lummus Corporation of the United States to design the heavy water plant rather than seeking to develop the expertise in a completely Canadian company.

Just last year, the Toronto Transit Commission came to Queen's Park seeking legislation so it could sell its transit expertise around the world. The cabinet said no, in the Treasurer's words, "because it's putting a public agency into the private sector." Horrors of horrors! The TTC is one of the finest transit operations in the world but, because they are in the public sector, the Tories won't let TTC experts win markets for Canadian expertise and for Canadian products abroad.

When we turn to the private sector, on the other hand, the generosity of this government knows no bounds, particularly when it's not their money they're spending. Consider the $100 million in federal tax money that the government has so generously offered to spur research and development. In typical Conservative fashion, their solution to the problem that Canadian companies aren't using enough of their own money for research and development is to give them some of our money to get the research done with. This incentive would be available to all companies in Canada and the Treasurer made a very objectionable point of insisting that that would include branch plants. The public will pay all the costs for this research while all the benefits will flow to the private sector.

The chief beneficiaries will be the very foreign branch plants which have been responsible for so much of Canada's weakness in research and development. If free research money suddenly becomes available, they are very likely to transfer some of their research up from the US or abroad for two or three years until this incentive runs out. There is no guarantee that the results will be allowed to stay in Canada and every incentive that the results will simply be taken back to the parent company. Canadian companies like Stelco and Northern Telecom, on the other hand, would be penalized because for years they have been supporting substantial research programs which the latecomers will get for free. We don't see how that's fair. We think it's wrong.

If Ontario is to get a fair share of research activities from the industry within our borders, then we believe that research and innovation must become an obligation and not an option for companies located in this province. By continuing to make research expenditures deductible, business and the public will share the cost of research on a roughly equal basis—and we say that's fair. We think that companies should be required to invest a certain proportion of revenue in research and development and the companies that don't carry out this level for research on their own should pay a levy to help finance research for their particular industry.

The difference between our approach and the government's is enormous. In the automobile industry alone, which now carries out almost no research in Canada, a fair-share approach such as we would propose would give Ontario twice the research activity that the Treasurer hopes to achieve for all Ontario industry. In other words, our approach in one industry, automobiles, would give twice the research and development in Canada, with all benefits that would accrue, that would come from all industries under the government's approach.

Even this government has begun to recognize that Ontario has been grossly ineffective in training of skilled manpower that industry needs. We must make a real commitment to training skilled people in this province rather than bringing them in from abroad. There is a very close relationship between the availability of skilled manpower and our economic strategy. We can't train skilled manpower unless we know what manpower will be needed and that means knowing what our economic strategy is.

On the other hand, we cannot have an efficient growing industrial base without skilled manpower. The problem of training and apprenticeships are easy to outline. Industry has backed away from training since the creation of technical vocational schools and the community colleges some 15 years ago. Small companies have backed away because often the workers they train are lured away by a large firm. Large firms have found it cheaper to hire skilled tradesmen from small firms or foreign companies than to train their own.

This government claims that its new labour market information program is the answer. In fact that program was only given cabinet approval in the fall and the funding to get it going has not yet been put together. If it ever gets started, the labour market information program may identify areas of short supply for skilled manpower but we will still be at the beginning in terms of providing the skills that we need and we know that we have to go further.

I want to propose that industry should share the responsibility for training rather than simply expect government to train or to import the skilled workers that it needs. This kind of partnership with industry is the norm in countries like West Germany and Britain. Firms that do not themselves provide apprenticeship or training places are expected to contribute to the cost of industrial training carried out by government. We should move towards this kind of responsibility in Ontario but New Democrats understand that this kind of change cannot be achieved overnight. That's why we are proposing that one of the major vehicles for job creation for young people this year should be provincial assistance towards the creation of at least 10,000 training positions and apprenticeships within Ontario industries. In other words, we should make a major start in training skilled man and woman power in this province and get 10,000 young people back to work at the same time.

We believe that this kind of incentive should be continued but we believe that within five years, industry should expect to carry a major part of the responsibility for training skilled manpower in conjunction with government and Ontario's technical schools and community colleges. We intend in the New Democratic Party to talk a lot about the area of training and apprenticeships, because it is absolutely vital to our future; and the government's failures in this area have been scandalous.

[4:45]

Mr. Martel: Monumental.

Mr. Cassidy: Over the coming months, we New Democrats also intend to talk a fair amount about productivity. But we want to focus on the structure of our economy and the way it affects the use of capital in this province, and not just follow the Tory fashion of trying to make workers shoulder the blame.

If I can repeat some material I tabled last year, our productivity in this province is equal to that of the United States, if one looks at the labour force. If one looks at the productivity of capital, on the other hand—and the Minister of Labour (B. Stephenson) admitted this in a speech just the other day—our capital, and therefore our management in this province, is 46 per cent less efficient than it is in the United States. That says something both about our management on the one hand and about the consequences of having such a degree of foreign ownership here in this province.

These are the major elements in the economic strategy which we believe Ontario needs and to which my colleague the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren)—to whom I pay tribute, by the way, on his assumption of the role of Treasury critic effective in about 10 minutes—and all of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party will be paying attention over the coming months.

This province needs leadership and direction and not a government which abdicates responsibility. This province needs a government which is committed to maintaining the quality of government and social services while we get on with the task of building our economy, and we do not see that commitment coming from this government. The Treasurer keeps blaming the public sector for the weaknesses of the Ontario economy, whereas the real situation is just the opposite: The weakness in the economy, for which government bears a great part of the blame, is responsible for the weakness we are now experiencing in the public sector.

We cannot agree with the Treasurer that if social needs are sacrificed the economy will improve. We cannot agree with the Treasurer's view that action to stimulate the economy is justified only if it benefits Ontario's balance sheet. That is a heartless attitude, and in fact it ill fits the Conservative government and its reputation across the province of Ontario.

We say that the job before Ontario today is to balance our economy, and the Treasurer is not capable of doing that job. That's a view that is shared by some of the most conservative experts, if you exclude the Treasurer. This winter, the C. D. Howe Research Institute has warned sharply that "the unremitting pursuit of balanced budgets was one of the serious policy errors of the 1930s—one that should not be repeated in the 1970s."

Mr. Martel: That shows you how far out of date you are, though, Darcy.

Mr. Cassidy: The Globe and Mail's business columnist, Ronald Anderson, puts it even more simply: "There is no virtue in a balanced budget as such. . ."

Mr. Laughren: Herbert Hoover was more progressive

Mr. Cassidy: As a matter of fact, that's true. Herbert Hoover was underestimated for his efforts to rebuild the US economy back in the 1920s. This Treasurer, I would say, has been sadly overestimated in terms of his impact on the province of Ontario.

Mr. Martel: He has destroyed it. The Chamber of Commerce said he has.

Mr. Swart: He's following the special program review.

Mr. Gregory: It's a good job nobody is listening to this stuff.

Mr. Cassidy: Boy, the right-wing rhetoric that has flowed from this Treasurer over the years would fill volumes, and it has. He is the most prolific speech-deliverer as well.

Mr. Martel: They wrote the report, Profile in Failure.

Mr. Cassidy: The business columnist of the Globe and Mail, Ronald Anderson, said: "There is no virtue in a balanced budget as such. A surplus, balance or deficit is appropriate only in relation to the economic situation." I would point out that we now face our worst economic crisis in 40 years and we now have the highest level of unemployment that we have had in this province since the Great Depression.

The Treasurer is creating enormous hardships for the unemployed and is doing long-term harm to our economy by making the balanced budget his only priority.

Mr. Martel: His bête noire.

Mr. Cassidy: An improved economy may lead us towards a balanced budget, but balancing the budget alone will never improve our economy.

I want to read into the record some words of the Premier before the task force on national unity. "Our first priority", he said, "without question must be to deal with the economic issues that confront us. The economy and national unity are inseparably linked, in the sense that people will have confidence in their country and political institutions only if these institutions can deal successfully with the bread-and-butter issues that face people in their daily lives."

For us in the New Democratic Party, our first priority is to deal with the economic issues that confront us. It is the failure of the Conservative government in its 1978 budget that it does not live up to those sentiments expressed by the Premier. It is a failure in which every member of the cabinet and every Conservative MPP must share, even the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry). That's what's so outrageous about this budget.

It is outrageous that the Conservative government is doing nothing about Ontario's 326,000 unemployed. It is outrageous that the Conservative government is providing no leadership and direction for our economy. It is outrageous that the Conservative government has chosen, through its enormous increase in health premiums, to tax most those who can afford it least.

Those are the reasons we have chosen to table not one but two motions today. We understand that our general amendment on the budget will not be voted upon until December. The health premiums are too important to be left until that time. For that matter, the jobs that this province needs are too important as well. But we can and will and are focusing on the health premiums with the no-confidence motion which I read to this House a few minutes ago and which I have the pleasure of reading again.

This will be the motion tabled this afternoon. I will move, seconded by the member for Nickel Belt, for a no-confidence debate early in April or late in March, as follows: That this House condemns the government's outrageous decision to raise Ontario health insurance premiums, to the highest level in Canada; deplores the regressive impact of this arbitrary tax increase on wage earners in general, on farms and small business and in particular on people of modest incomes; and condemns the government's affront to the fundamental parliamentary principle of no taxation without legislation; and that for all these reasons this House no longer has any confidence in the government.

Interjections.

Mr. Cassidy: I have not quite ended. I have two motions. As I have said and perhaps made fairly clear, we cannot support, in general or in specific terms, in principle the budgetary policy of this government; therefore, I wish to move an amendment to the budget, which also has the effect of no confidence but which will also, unfortunately, not be debated and voted upon until Christmas. New Democrats are prepared to act. We think it is about time this motion was passed and that this government simply stood down.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Cassidy moves that this House deplores the continued failure of the government to undertake a long-term strategy for building the strength of Ontario's industrial economy; rejects the government's proposals for yet another handout to the mining industry that would export jobs from the north through the blanket exemption on foreign processing; opposes the government's irresponsible manipulation of its commitment to the funding of municipal government, which will add still further to the regressive burden of property tax; condemns the government's failure to finance health insurance costs in Ontario on the basis of ability to pay; and calls for immediate action to create jobs in order to meet the needs of Ontario's 326,000 unemployed.

An hon. member: Should we vote right now?

Mr. Lewis: You will be decimated if you call at this point, and with any help from the Liberals you shall fall. Come on, pull the plug and let's get this thing on the road.

Mr. Warner: Time to change managers over there.

On motion by Mr. Gregory, the debate was adjourned.

Resumption of the adjourned debate in committee of the whole House on Bill 59, An Act to reform the Law respecting Property Rights and Support Obligations between Married Persons and in other Family Relationships.

On section 3:

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Swart moves that sub-clause (i) of clause (b) of section 3 be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "money held by one or both spouses in any account with a chartered bank, savings office, credit union or trust company, if such money was acquired during marriage or as a result of appreciation during marriage of money held prior to marriage."

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, you and the other members of the House will recognize that this is a fall-back resolution from the original one which was submitted by my colleague from Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Bounsell) and defeated by a majority of votes in this House. We feel, of course, that it is regrettable that that amendment was defeated. We would like to have seen the principle established in the family assets section of a 50-50 split of all assets acquired by the spouses during marriage.

However, we were not successful in that and we are proposing this amendment and two subsequent ones which we think will make the family assets section, as it exists in clause (b)(i) now, much improved. These three amendments—the one we have before us and the other two—will in fact provide for the principle of the equal division of liquid assets held by either or both spouses during marriage and acquired during marriage. This amendment, of course, deals with the matter of bank accounts, or money held in a savings office, credit union or a trust company.

With your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, because they are all related, I would point out that the second amendment which we will be proposing after this one deals with the matter of the equal division of shares in a corporation and bonds owned by one or both spouses for investment purposes during marriage, and the accrued appreciation thereon. The third amendment which we will put deals with the matter of the rights in a pension or a retirement savings plan acquired during marriage.

Of course I hasten to point out again that this is the principle which we are establishing that almost all of the sections from 4 to 13 provide for qualification of this equal division if certain circumstances exist which justify something other than an equal division of these assets.

[5:00]

There are two very clear points surrounding this amendment and the other two which I want to point out. This amendment and the two following exclude commercial assets, not that we want to exclude them, but we hope that we can get the support of the House now if commercial assets are excluded. I recall that the member for St. George (Mrs. Campbell) and the member for Carleton-Grenville (Mr. Sterling) and other members of this House gave as their main reason for the non-support of our previous amendment the fact that it would include commercial assets and therefore it could destroy businesses and there would be a very real difficulty in the division of businesses. These amendments are specifically designed to exclude those commercial assets.

The second clear point surrounding these amendments that I want to make is that the definition under the present section 3(b) of the bill and the other subsections excludes many genuine family assets. I think the term "family assets" which is used in this bill, and certainly the definition that has been given to us by the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and many others when speaking around this province and giving information on the bill, has been that family assets per se, whatever are family assets, as a matter of principle should be divided equally. This definition clearly excludes them.

In support of what I am saying I would just read part of 4(1) which says that "each spouse is entitled to have family assets divided in equal shares notwithstanding the ownership of the assets by the spouses as determinable for other purposes and notwithstanding any order under section 7." I suggest the clear intent is that all assets considered family assets, apart from commercial assets, should be included in this division and in fact they are not.

Many of the family assets are removed by an unrealistic definition. By these amendments we simply want to include what we think was the intent of the Attorney General and the government to include all family assets but exclude commercial assets. I would say that this definition under 3(b) is out of touch with today's realities if the intent certainly was to divide family assets equally.

I mentioned the other day, and I repeat, that only approximately one-half of the couples in this province now own a home and yet great emphasis is given to the matrimonial home, as it should be, where they have one. But what about the other 50 per cent of the population who do not have one? Clause (b)(i) with which we are dealing right now demonstrates to a further degree how the government in fact is out of touch with today's realities. That section as it is now in the bill says that "money in an account with a chartered bank, savings office, credit union or trust company where the account is ordinarily used for shelter or transportation or for household, educational, recreational, social or aesthetic purposes" shall be considered as family assets.

I think it's apparent to most people, or should be apparent, that most families now have more than one bank account. Most families have a chequing account—they don't keep very much money in it; it is used solely for the purposes of family expenses and they just keep enough in it to pay those expenses as they come due—but their savings, if any, are kept in some other account or some other form. That is substantially different to what the situation was perhaps 40 or 50 years ago. Most families then had one account which was a chequing account and a savings account and everything combined. That is not the case today. There's a clear distinction between the current account for operating funds and family savings.

Also something that has taken place or has been amplified greatly in recent times is that the family savings are put in the name of one or the other members of the family for reasons that have nothing whatsoever to do with it being or not being a family asset. Frequently they're put in a certain account because of income tax purposes. One member of the family may not be paying income tax and therefore there would be an exemption on the small amount of interest that may accrue; or it may be that one spouse is making much less than the other, and therefore they put it in the name of that spouse so they don't have to pay as much income tax on the interest that accrues. So it has nothing to do with whether they are family assets or not, it has solely to do with other factors.

So I'm saying with regard to our amendment that the government, in (b)(i), is excluding, either deliberately or because they're out of touch with the situation that exists today, genuine family assets which are held in the name of one or the other of the spouses for family purposes. They are automatically excluded from the division under the 50 per cent. If one of the spouses wants to have access to them then they are going to have to go to court to get them. That should not be the case, and therefore we are moving the amendment which I have put before you. It provides that "the money held by one or both spouses in any account with a chartered bank, savings office, credit union or trust company, if such money was acquired during marriage or as a result of appreciation during marriage of money held prior to marriage"—we're moving that to include family assets which rightfully should be there.

It is my hope and the hope of our party that members belonging to other caucuses in this House will see the merit of this amendment and the two to follow and will support our move to include these assets. They rightly should be included as family assets and should rightly have equal division in principle between the spouses in marriage.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, this amendment by the member for Welland-Thorold was an amendment that was proposed before the justice committee, and at that time we fully debated it. I thought, frankly, that we convinced the member at the time that his amendment was complex and fraught with all sorts of complications, legal and practical—

Mr. Swart: Like what?

Mr. Roy: In fact, I thought we had convinced him at that time how irresponsible it was.

Mr. Bounsaal: That was all in your mind.

Mr. Roy: I am surprised that we see it again. We in this caucus, having accepted some time ago to act responsibly, agreed that the better approach in these matters is to proceed by way of the amendment that is going to be suggested by my colleague, the member for St. George. So we feel that we cannot support this amendment.

Ms. Bryden: I rise to support this amendment, although only as a fall-back amendment from the one that suggested that all assets should be shared. It seems to me that it is at least arguable that liquid assets, which include bank accounts, stocks, bonds and pension rights, should very definitely be shared.

The spouse who stays at home enables the other spouse in many cases, to acquire this kind of asset through his earnings, through his career and job opportunities. If we are going to regard marriage as a partnership of equals, this kind of assets which come into the marriage should be shared equally.

It seems to me that the members of the Liberal Party in opposing the previous amendment which provided that all assets should be brought in seem to be mainly hung up on the question of commercial assets. They saw all sorts of difficulties in dividing commercial assets on marriage breakup, but in this amendment we are giving them the opportunity to consider only liquid assets. The commercial difficulties are not here.

There is still the opportunity for a marriage contract, which could overcome any difficulties that there are associated with this kind of asset. There is still the opportunity for judicial discretion. But I submit that we should start with a clear statement that these assets are shareable on a 50-50 basis and then leave it up to the judges to decide if an application is made to them that there should be some variation from that principle. Therefore I cannot see how the member for St. George's amendment that is coming up on a later section will solve the situation of having a clearcut statement in the legislation that these assets are shareable, so giving people something to start from and perhaps in many cases making it unnecessary for them to go to litigation.

It seemed to me that the government's objection to our previous amendment to bring all assets into the equal sharing was also mainly on the difficulty of sharing commercial assets. We think those difficulties in many cases were unreal, but setting that aside, the difficulties connected with these assets, as I have said, can be covered by the other clauses of the Act relating to judicial discretion and marriage contracts.

Therefore, it seems to me that anybody who opposes this amendment and the subsequent ones dealing with the other liquid assets will be opposing the principle of the bill and they will be refusing to recognize that marriage is a partnership of equals.

Mr. Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on Mr. Swart's amendment?

All those in favour will say "aye."

All those opposed will say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Swart: I believe there is an amendment too from the Attorney General. The order may not matter a great deal but I have two further amendments and if he is—

Mr. Kerrio: Same vote.

Mrs. Campbell: Wait a minute.

[5:15]

Mr. Swart: If he is in agreement, I'll proceed with the other two now and then we can deal with his amendment.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Did we have any notice of these further amendments?

Mr. Swart: They were distributed last Thursday.

Mr. Chairman: In order to clear that matter up I would say that the Chair received one amendment from the hon. member last week and just received the three amendments prior to the sitting this afternoon.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, I am assured they were distributed last Thursday. They are broken into three sections. The members will recognize that they are similar to the three sections which were previously incorporated into one. But they were divided and distributed to the other parties last Thursday.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: We just don't seem to have them, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. Campbell: I don't have them either.

Mr. Chairman: Would the hon. minister wish to place his amendment and, probably, in that time the hon. member for Welland-Thorold could supply copies of the amendment to the hon. minister and to the official opposition.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. McMurtry moves that subclause (ii) of clause (b) of section 3 of the bill be amended by inserting after "corporation" in the first line the word "partnership" and by inserting after "the," where it occurs the first time in the fourth line, the words "partnership or."

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The purpose of this amendment is to prevent the avoidance of sharing family assets by the use of a partnership. This seemed to be an omission in the Act as placed before us, and in our view this is something that should be cleared up to avoid that possibility.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, we believe this is an improvement in the provisions of the bill and have no hesitation in supporting it.

Mr. Swart: We too support this amendment. It is a small improvement, but it does make some improvement to the bill.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Swart: I'm having further copies made of the two further amendments, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps with your permission I can proceed. You have a copy of the second amendment and it will be delivered in a moment to the two other parties.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Swart moves that a new subclause (ii), as follows, be added to clause (b) of section 3 and the present subclause (ii) and subsequent subclauses be renumbered accordingly:

(ii) shares in a corporation and bonds owned by one or both spouses for investment purposes during marriage and the accrued appreciation during marriage of shares and bonds acquired by one or both spouses for investment purposes prior to the marriage.

Mr. Swart: We think it is important to have this included as a matter of the principle of the 50-50 split and not to leave it to some subsequent section where one spouse has to make application to the court to make it possible to have a 50-50 split. We think it's much better to work it the other way round, to state the principle here and then if there are changes to be made to the equal division they can be made by the court.

I would point out that this amendment is deliberately worded to provide that it only applies to bonds and shares which are held for investment purposes. It does not include those shares which would be considered as the ownership of a small business or a larger business and where the business would be disrupted. We feel that this principle is sound, as we felt it was in the previous amendment which we put.

I would point out to the member for Ottawa East that he had no reason to believe that I or members of this party were going to accept the proposals that were put forward in the committee by him. The clauses should not be in the bill. In fact, we made it perfectly clear—and it was unanimous from every member in our party who was there, that it was fundamental to us that there be the equal sharing of assets set as a principle of the bill. There was no compromise by any member at any point in that committee, nor is there now.

Mr. Roy: I would just say that possibly I was being overly optimistic in thinking I could ever convince the members of that party—

Mr. Swart: Perhaps you weren't there.

Mr. Renwick: On something so fair, yes.

Mr. Roy: —how small businesses work in this province. I guess it might have been overly optimistic on my part to think I could get that across to them or to that particular member. Possibly I was in error in thinking that. All I would say is that this amendment as proposed is not a workable amendment in our opinion. We think we solved the problem, or that we attacked the problem or that we'd take care of that problem in a more equitable and more flexible fashion by the amendment that is to be proposed by my colleague and in subsequent sections of the bill.

Some of the matters referred to by the member for Welland-Thorold, I'm suggesting to him, are not workable. He said it's not going to apply to shares in a small business because he has stated that it's only owned for investment purposes. How do we determine that?

Mr. Renwick: Very easily.

Mr. Roy: Most people who have a small corporation of some kind have it for investment purposes, I would think. To think that he can stand here and say it won't affect small business because it's only for investment purposes, in some way is not understanding how the economics of small business work. We on this side have not been convinced because we think it's not a workable amendment.

Mr. Chairman: Shall Mr. Swart's amendment carry?

All those in favour will please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Renwick: You are also having trouble hearing, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Swart moves that a new subclause (iii) as follows be added to clause (b) of section 3 and that the present subclause (iii) and subsequent clauses be renumbered accordingly:

(iii) rights in a pension or retirement savings plan acquired during marriage by one or both spouses and the accrued appreciation during marriage of rights in a pension or retirement savings plan acquired by one or both spouses prior to marriage.

Mr. Lawlor: You can't object to this one.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, surely this has to be the final determination of whether there is any desire whatsoever on the part of this House to divide family assets on an equitable basis. Apart from the family home, which doesn't exist in 50 per cent of the cases in this province, there is no asset which is more of a family asset than pensions and retirement saving plans.

I am conscious from my own experience in many instances that a great deal of time and concern and consideration is given by a family, by a man and wife, over a great many years to the degree or percentage of their income that they will pay into a pension plan so that when they come to retirement age, they will have at least a minimum adequate income. Almost everything else is sacrificed to providing that pension plan for their retirement years. The government, by not including it in the family assets section, and the official opposition, by what appears—although I would hope not—to be their voting against the inclusion of this plan, are certainly excluding the number two or perhaps even number one family assets in most families.

It must be a real injustice for a couple, both of whom have saved and who have invested in the retirement pension, to find when there is a breakup in the family, whether it's at the age of 40, 50, 60 or 64, that only one member of that family has the rights and the total rights to that pension plan. Surely it's not good enough to say that someplace later on in this bill there will be an amendment which will give the courts the right to vary that, and perhaps, just perhaps, will give the other spouse some rights, maybe minimum rights, to that pension.

Again I state that to me we are establishing here a very serious principle in the division of this very important family asset, a family asset which is considered as such and exists, I suppose, in the case of 70 or 80 per cent of the marriages in this province. Surely this House is not prepared to say that we are going to exclude that from this bill.

I urge the Liberal Party members who are here, and even the government, to accept this very last vestige of some equality in the family assets section in this plan. It becomes basically meaningless with the defeats on the other amendment, and if this is turned down, to many families this will have no meaning whatsoever.

Mr. Roy: Briefly, Mr. Chairman, we quite agree that the pension is an important asset, and in many cases I would think that, after the matrimonial home and the furniture and the car and so on, it may well be the most important asset. Where we disagree basically is in the method or the practical approach in the sharing of this particular asset. For the member for Welland-Thorold to suggest that by voting down his amendment we are saying that one of the spouses is not entitled to a pension plan in which the other spouse has contributed, is just not so.

[5:30]

There is a constant attempt and failure on the part of that member to realize some of the practical difficulties in the sense that not every pension plan works the same. He's trying to fit everybody into the same mould and saying that it's an easy division, that there will be no problem in the division of the pension plan; it's 50-50. When we look at a pension plan, whether it is government-funded or a private pension plan, and we consider when it is going to vest and that type of thing, these are all difficulties that we envisage. That is why we have faith in the courts, and we are prepared to lay down principles in later sections as to what the court can look at in the sharing of this particular asset.

The member is wrong to suggest that, because we are voting down this particular amendment, we don't feel that one of the spouses is entitled to look at the pension plan. There are going to be places, not only in the subsequent sections of this Act in relation to the division of an asset which is not a family asset, where the court will be able to look at the asset and whether it is a money contribution or whether it is a contribution by virtue of the fact that one of the spouses has accepted a responsibility—let's say in the household, which is a joint responsibility. We say that is in the Act and it is going to be something we hope the courts will look at as well in relation even to support.

We are not excluding it. What we are saying, basically—and I repeat this for my colleagues—is that those of us who have dealt with marriage law, family law and so on realize that because there are very many assets in the cases of very many couples, it is difficult to fit everybody into the same mould. We want to retain that flexibility. We feel that the way to proceed with it is the practical approach that we are following by setting down the guidelines to the courts, so that the courts can look at a factual situation—couple A and B—and look at that particular pension plan to see how best the division can be made.

We prefer that approach, and we are optimistic. In fact, by setting the guidelines for the court, they cannot be disregarded. The fact that we are opposing this amendment is not because we don't feel it is an important asset to be shared, but we would rather retain that flexibility so that no undue hardship is caused on one spouse by having something as inflexible as is proposed here this afternoon.

Mr. Bounsell: The only way in this bill that we draw to the court's attention at all that they are to consider an important item as the first consideration in a split at the time of a breakup is to put it in the assets section, because the rest of the section allows that to be varied anyway, as well as consideration of all other things. If one does not highlight it as one of those items which in the first instance is simply assumed to be shared, then that will not occur to most judges, and any counsellors before the courts arguing for the inclusion of that as a basic right in the initial split are going to have a most difficult case to so do.

I find it very difficult to understand that the other members of this House will not accept this as a reasonable inclusion in the family assets. Canada Pension Plan has already decided that for all of the benefits paid by one spouse, or either spouse, into Canada Pension, upon the reaching of retirement age the Canada Pension benefits will be paid out according to the number of years those spouses have lived together, one benefiting from the Canada Pension Plan contribution of the other. The tables are worked out; there are no difficulties. We are simply taking that principle and extending it to the pension plans that one or both have also acquired while they have been living together. Nothing could be more reasonable than that.

The federal government has at least recognized the equity and equality in that situation and it has the tables with which to make the calculation of what those monthly payments would be to the respective spouses. This is exactly what this amendment would do with all pension plans.

As you well know, Mr. Chairman, in the months of January and February across this country many couples, bearing in mind that they do have a tax deduction for the year 1977—the previous year—on their taxes by putting moneys into retirement savings plans, in fact scrimp and save over the entirety of those two months so that they can throw as much money as they can into a retirement savings plan. That retirement savings plan is in the name of one of the spouses and under the current situation that retirement savings plan's earnings will remain a benefit of that one spouse only.

Clearly what has happened is that household money has gone into that retirement savings plan investment with no way, when those benefits are paid out, for the other person to have any rightful share in it if a divorce or separation occurs in the interim. This amendment clears that situation up in the same way as the government of Canada, through its Canada Pension Plan, has decided those benefits should be shared. It's a most reasonable amendment to add to the family assets split in this bill.

One wonders why the Attorney General and his staff fight so hard to keep this out and are not more receptive to it. I don't think it can be because the arithmetic is very hard. If one is convinced that it is, one simply needs to get from the federal government—with which you must speak from time to time—the tables already prepared. They will simply put their fingers down the column and draw out the amounts to be paid to the two spouses.

There are really no difficulties involved in this at all in the financial distribution or split between the two spouses when the time for drawing it comes if there has been a divorce or separation or a nullity occur prior to that time. It's a most reasonable amendment, Mr. Chairman. I would hope the other members of this House would see that clearly and support this amendment.

Mrs. Campbell: I must say I am confused by some of the statements which have been made by those supporting this amendment. I take it that what is being suggested is that by putting this amendment into this bill we will unilaterally alter all of the private pension plans and bring them into some kind of accord with the Canadian Pension Plan.

Mr. Bounsall: Payments of.

Mrs. Campbell: This is really not what we're talking about. We have to be concerned about the time of vesting and the way in which, in an individual plan, the persons drawing can in fact prevail upon a trustee in one way or another to accord this division at the time of the divorce, even though of course the plan doesn't vest until such time as the retirement takes place.

I find great difficulty in following the logic of this particular proposal. It is great, and I am very happy that the Canada Pension Plan does recognize this principle, but unless I am wrong—and I am certainly subject to correction—I cannot see how inserting this particular clause in this bill will in fact vary the private pension plans which are of many kinds and have many provisions. So on that basis, I can't support this because I really don't think it has any meaning in the way in which the mover suggests it has.

Mr. Swart: Pursuant to what has been said by the members for St. George and Ottawa East and my colleagues, I think there is something more that I should say on this proposed amendment which I have introduced.

It seems to me what we are talking about here is rights in a pension or retirement savings plan. Those rights can be assigned to one or the other or both spouses. Because of the objection that was raised—it wasn't by the member for St. George but it may have been by the member for Ottawa East—against inclusion of pensions in the family assets, I had some discussion with the legislative counsel on this. I said, "Is there any way that we can make this perhaps more palatable, or the application of it more reasonable?"

So I have an amendment, if this should pass, which I will move to section 6 of the bill. Section 6 of the bill states that in an application under section 5—that is for an unequal division of the assets or change in the assets—the court may order various things, including the partition of the sale and property and the payment made on proceeds of sale to one or both spouses, and so on.

I have a further clause to move, clause (g), which will state that specified property be held by either or both spouses to the date of maturity of the property and the division of such property occur upon maturity.

I suggest that with the other clauses which are in the section, and the provision of this clause—at least according to the legislative counsel; I am not a lawyer—that the inclusion of family assets as a principle of equal division would be entirely workable. They would be as much workable as any of the other family assets which are already included in there.

Finally, I am sure the member for Ottawa East really knows the difference between the proposed amendment which would give the right upon application to have an equal division—or to have some of it where the court may be—and to have it stated as a principle in the family asset section.

It was the lawyers on the committee who pointed out to the rest of us that the principles are important, including the preamble, because that is where the court will look to get their direction if they are in doubt. Therefore, I suggest that establishing this principle, that it is considered a family asset, can still be considered by the courts, if one or the other objects and says it will be destroyed or there will be a problem. That can be handled by the courts. But the principle of it being a family asset is a principle which I suggest cannot be denied and we should work from that base and no other.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Just very briefly, I should point out to my learned friend that section 24 of the Pension Benefits Act of this province specifically prevents assignment of pension moneys.

Mr. Bounsall: That can be changed.

Mr. Roy: Sure, that's no problem; no.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Shall Mr. Swart's amendment carry?

All those in favour will please say "aye." All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Ms. Bryden: I have an amendment to subsection 1 of section 4 which I have filed but which I will send over to the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Ms. Bryden moves that subsection 1 of section 4 of the bill be amended by inserting after "cohabitation" in the fourth line "or when one of the spouses has died."

I would ask the hon. member without making any ruling to indicate, in speaking to the motion, how this differs from the amendment to section 1 which was voted down, the clause which discussed widows and widowers? If it is identical then it would be out of order having already voted on the matter.

Ms. Bryden: In my opinion, this amendment differs from the earlier one, which was simply a change in definition, because this is a change in the substantive clause in the bill which sets forth the 50-50 sharing of assets on marriage breakdowns. What this amendment does is to extend that principle of the 50-50 sharing of assets; and this important key clause which sets that up, extends that to marriages which are ended on death and, as a result, removes a serious discrimination between classes of spouses.

It was suggested that Bill 60, the Succession Law Reform Act would eliminate any discrimination of this sort—or it was suggested that if it did not eliminate it, it could be amended to eliminate the discrimination. However, we did not get any commitment from the Attorney General that Bill 60 would be amended. I am not convinced that Bill 60 does eliminate the discrimination.

The discrimination arises between spouses whose marriage ends on breakup and spouses whose marriage ends as a result of the death of one of them. This kind of discrimination between classes of citizens in the province is intolerable to me. That is why we must amend the bill to eliminate that discrimination. I submit that Bill 60 is not the avenue for removing that discrimination. The reason is that Bill 60 provides for relief to one spouse who has been treated in what you might call an unfair way as a result of a will but it is based solely on need and the ability of the testator or the estate to meet that need.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I hesitate to interrupt, Mr. Chairman, but I thought you made a—

Mr. Deputy Chairman: On what basis are you interrupting?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: —tentative ruling that this was out of order. I think everything that has been said makes it quite clear that it's just simply a repetition.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I didn't make a ruling. I asked the member to justify why this was somewhat different. Are you rising on a point of order, Mr. Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: And your point of order is?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: My point of order is that the principle of this amendment was dealt with on the proposed amendment to section 1.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Do you wish to speak to the point of order?

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I don't think the principle was dealt with in section 1. It was simply a change of definition, whereas this is an extension of section 4 and equal sharing to the breakup of marriage on the death of one partner. I think that is a very important principle, and I think we should deal with it as a separate principle.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: It would seem to me that had the amendment to section 1 carried, this amendment would have been unnecessary because "spouse" would have covered a spouse in this section. It seems to me that the will of the House is that the definition of spouse for the division of property should not apply when one spouse has died. I think the House already has made that decision and therefore it seems to me that this motion is not now in order.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, did you so rule just then?

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I am prepared to make a ruling, but if you wish to speak to the point of order, I will allow you to do so before making the ruling.

Mr. Renwick: I'd just like to support what my colleague, the member for Beaches-Woodbine, has said. I think we've had occasion when this has happened. Because of the procedure of the House which provides for the drafting of bills with a definition clause at the beginning of the bill, it has often been the case that the motion is made with respect to the definition which, of course, doesn't deal with the substantive matter. It's simply an explanation of what the term should include and therefore is a matter which has to be explained to the committee. It has been defeated. We understand that.

I think it would be true that if there were subsequent substantive provisions of the bill and we were to introduce amendments, I might find it somewhat difficult to agree that your ruling wouldn't be correct. But on the first substantive section of the bill, I would submit that we should be allowed to make our argument on the clear understanding that if the substantive argument held, then the more or less procedural question of amending the definition could be reverted to by unanimous consent of the House.

Otherwise, I think it might be wise for us to make provision as to when this kind of amendment should be brought. It may well be that we should say: "Let's agree as a House that we'll argue a case on the substantive clause and that the House will consent, if passed, to revert to amend the definition section."

I hope that's been helpful, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Does the member for Ottawa East wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Roy: Just briefly. It would seem somewhat contradictory that this House, having voted not to accept the earlier amendment, would revert after accepting this amendment, to amend something we've already refused. It just doesn't make sense.

It would seem to me that the argument brought forward is simply just being repetitious of the original amendment, because the argument was made at that time and has been rejected by the House. It just doesn't make sense at this time to be saying we're going to be looking at the amendment we have before us because we'd not only have to go back to amend, but we'd have to follow all through with what is meant by spouse. I don't want to take more time on a procedural matter, but it just doesn't make sense that we're proceeding in that fashion. It should be ruled out of order.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I'd just like to say the earlier debate was conducted on the basis of the operative sections and the effect that the amendment to section 1(f) would have had on them. I think this is just a ruse to reopen the matter.

Mr. Renwick: Did I hear the Attorney General refer to our comments as a ruse to reopen the matter?

Mr. Roy: Ruse.

Mr. Renwick: I think that's unparliamentary.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Welland-Thorold on the point of order, only, and this will be the last speaker on the point of order.

Mr. Roy: He could have said further posturing.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Swart: I want to deal with this point of order in just a little different manner. You raised it at the time that the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden) started to speak, Mr. Chairman. She gave her explanation and you permitted her to continue for quite a period of time. It seemed to me, and I think most of us here felt, that you had made a decision at that time. It's the same point of order. It seems to me once you have permitted part of the debate to take place for the length it did that you can't make a second ruling on the same point of order.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: When the member raised the motion, I did not make a ruling. I simply asked the member in her remarks to justify why this would be different to the matter on section 1. Before she had got far enough into her remarks for me to make a ruling, the Attorney General rose and asked me to rule on the point of order.

As far as the point of order is concerned, it would seem to me that in the debate on section 1, on the subsection, that we dealt not only with the definition but this House dealt with the substantive matter of whether or not a deceased spouse should be included, not just for the definition section but for the sections further on.

Therefore, it seems to me that this is repetitious and is, in effect, discussing the same matter that this House has already decided. I would therefore have to rule that this motion is out of order.

The member for Beaches-Woodbine wishes to move an amendment to subsection 3 which is different enough that I would say that one is in order.

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the amendment to subsection 3 really depends on the amendment to subsection 1.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Ms. Bryden moves that subsection 3 of section 4 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"The rights under subsection 1 are personal as between the spouses, but any application commenced under subsection 2 before or after the death of a spouse may be made or continued by or against the estate of the deceased spouse, and for the purposes of such an application a reference to spouse in this part shall be deemed to be a reference to the estate of the spouse as the case requires."

This refers to actions commenced before as well as after the death of the spouse, does it?

Ms. Bryden: That is correct, Mr. Chairman, and therefore it is different from the preceding one.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Yes, I will allow you to continue.

Ms. Bryden: It provides that an action commenced after the death of a spouse may be made or continued against the estate of the deceased spouse, and therefore it would enable spouses to obtain from the estate some of the assets to which we think they should be entitled.

I think this amendment would be an improvement to the section providing for equal division of the family assets and it is a necessary amendment to bring that situation into the bill.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Any further speakers to this motion?

All those in favour please say "aye."

Those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

The House recessed at 6 p.m.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1978

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

On section 4:

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I have presented an amendment, a rather lengthy one, as of last week. I have given notice to the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) and, of course, to the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and others of one slight amendment. I don't know whether you wish me to move the whole amendment at this time. If you do, I shall.

Mr. Chairman: It is the proper procedure. Mrs. Campbell moves that subsections 5 and 6 of section 4 be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

"(5) The purpose of this section is to recognize that child care, household management and financial provisions are the joint responsibilities of the spouses and that inherent in the marital relationship there is joint contribution whether financial or otherwise by the spouses to the assumption of these responsibilities entitling each spouse to an equal division of the family assets subject to the equitable consideration set out in subsections 4 and 6.

"(6) The court shall make a division of any property that is not a family asset where (a) a spouse has unreasonably impoverished the family assets, or (b) the result of a division of the family assets would be inequitable in all the circumstances having regard to (1) the considerations set out in clauses (a) to (f) of subsection 4, or (2) the effect of the assumption by one spouse of any of the responsibilities set out in subsection 5 on the ability of the other spouse to acquire, manage, maintain, operate or improve property that is not a family asset."

Ms. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, should these two sections not be dealt with by separate motions? That's the practice we've been following in the past, I think, of dividing amendments and dealing with one subsection at a time.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to accommodate my friend but I believe the matter has to be dealt with as part of one scheme under this Act. For that reason, my proposal is that it be dealt with in whole.

Mr. Chairman: It would appear to me that the previous sections were companion sections and therefore they should be handled together. Is the committee agreeable?

Agreed.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, throughout the deliberations on this bill to date we have talked about the equality of the marriage and of the partners in the marriage, but this time, for the first time, I believe, we now spell out the fact that child care, household management and the financial provisions are joint responsibilities and that, in fact, child care and household management both have an economic and financial aspect to them.

I am of the opinion that by spelling it out in this form and by, in effect, directing the court, we are overcoming some of the problems which we could not overcome, at least from my point of view, in other suggestions which were made.

As I have said throughout, it is my firm belief that marriage is an economic partnership of two equal partners. I have never disputed that. I have had difficulties with some of the other amendments by reason of what I could foresee, perhaps wrongly or perhaps rightly, as certainly possible disruptions of our economy and, of course, the whole question of the tax problems which could arise, as I understand it, if we were to spell out in any precise terms the commercial assets or any of the points raised by the members of the third party.

However, it is important that we recognize in the substantive part of this Act what we have spelled out in the preamble. I have done that, it seems to me, in this section. Then we have proceeded to indicate, within the terms of reference of the new subsection 5 as proposed, the sorts of things which must be taken into consideration by the court in effecting a division of the property. I have used the word "shall" instead of "may" because it does seem to me that it limits the discretion of the court in a way which may in some measure go to meet the objections of those who are deeply concerned at too wide a discretion in the courts themselves.

It seems to me that in this particular amendment all of those things which were suggested in the earlier amendment proposed can be looked at and should be looked at by the court. But in the event, for example, of pensions, we would have to recognize that the court indeed would have to take into consideration the laws pertaining to pensions and the actual pension scheme which would come before the court at any given period of time, because it is my view, rightly or wrongly, that this legislation cannot alter a pension plan already in effect and only the pension plan itself could be altered by the normal procedures.

I feel this particular amendment does give direction to the courts in specific circumstances. I recognize it still means that possibly the female of the marriage may have to be a suppliant, but I would also recognize that the male could very well be in the same position under this amendment and this type of approach. To me, by indicating as we do in such specific terms, we have taken this legislation into a new dimension. I would urge the members of this House to support the amendment so that we can have the necessary degree of flexibility built into this amendment and into the Act to overcome some of those objections raised by others in the process of discussion of this bill.

Ms. Gigantes: I rise in support of this amendment. As far as I am personally concerned, and I believe the other members of my caucus, there is absolutely no reason to object this amendment. At the personal request of the mover, I looked over the amendment again a few days ago to see if perhaps it could meet some of the requirements we felt were necessary when we proposed earlier amendments to the assets section of this bill. I did that because I respected that personal request. I feel still, and so do the other members of my caucus, that this amendment does not meet those well-expressed concerns of our caucus on the question of equitable division of property. This amendment, in our view and in my personal view, adds nothing to the bill, but because it adds nothing, one cannot object to it. Therefore we will support it.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I want to indicate that I support this amendment but not on the basis that it adds nothing. I think the member for St. George and I, notwithstanding the fact that we don't always agree on everything, do share the same view as to what this Act is intended to accomplish.

I am grateful to her for moving an amendment which I think strengthens the Act and strengthens the concept of partnership and joint responsibility. I want to make it clear, therefore, so far as the government side of the House is concerned, that it is an amendment that should be supported. It does add something to the legislation.

Mr. Nixon: I want to speak briefly to this amendment as well. I have listened to a great deal of debate on the bill, particularly on the former amendment which was designed to divide the property that would come under the judgement in a marriage breakup down the middle.

I feel that the amendment put forward by my colleague from St. George effectively makes it clear to a judge who has to make a decision in these cases—and there are many more of them now, I suppose, than there used to be—that he has the responsibility to undertake a fair and equitable division of all of the property that is included in the ambit of the bill.

I haven't spoken on the bill on second reading or up until this time, but I am sure you would be interested to know, Mr. Chairman, that there has been some debate around our home about it. My wife being an active member of various organizations in the community, I suppose she has been a channel to me of views from the local women's institute and so on, and probably a very effective advocate for the concept of the amendment put forward by the member for St. George.

I personally believe it does add substantially to the bill. While other may feel it goes without saying that the responsibilities for family care and responsibility are equally shared, I believe it is an important addition that the amendment spells it out specifically and certainly gives it to the responsibility of judges when property must be divided.

Being a farmer myself, I am aware that the impetus for this legislation in the first instance probably came from the famous or infamous Murdoch case. During my years as leader of the party, this was debated quite vehemently in many forums. I felt at the time the position of our party was to express the joint responsibility for family responsibility, and certainly the responsibility for a judge who has to divide these matters in some equitable way, that he must consider the whole list of property and assets.

Frankly, I have been offended at some of the unfair attacks that have been levelled, not so much against the members of the Liberal Party but specifically against the member for St. George, who has worked—and I hesitate to say so, but certainly it is true—for many years in leading the community in a fair and equitable approach to this difficult subject. In my opinion, she has been in the vanguard of public opinion and is now taking an eminently sensible, moderate and supportable stand.

The fact that some other members have said that this amendment adds nothing to the bill perhaps simply adds to the offensive connotations that have been directed to her and to us, her colleagues, in the debate in the past. I believe it is an important amendment, and I am glad that all members of the House have now indicated they are going to support it. I think it adds tremendously to the concept of this bill, and certainly in my view it is a landmark for which she and, through her, we should be congratulated.

Mr. Renwick: I admire the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk for his valiant attempt to repair the damage done to his caucus by the failure to support the amendment which was before the House the other evening.

Mr. Nixon: We never make a mistake in opposing your amendments.

Mr. Renwick: I did want to ask whether the member for St. George and the Attorney General and their legal advisers would look at the disjunctive nature of items 1 and 2, which modify subsection 6(b), to see whether between now and the final printing of the bill it is the intention of the member for St. George to make that disjunctive; in other words whether or not the court or a judge must consider either item 1 or item 2 but not both. I can quite well see that there would be situations where a judge should take into consideration not only items (a) to (f) of subsection 4, but should also take into account the purpose and intent set out in item (ii), which also modifies subclause (b) of subsection 6 of section 4.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I rise and enthusiastically support the amendment brought forward by my colleague from St. George and I wish to say—

Mr. Bounsall: Now we know it's suspect.

Ms. Gigantes: That should worry you, Margaret.

Mr. Roy: I notice, Mr. Chairman, that the members to my left—

Ms. Gigantes: We're proud to be on your left.

Mr. Roy:—especially those in the second row, some of whom have tried to make some contribution to the justice committee—are somewhat, I suppose I could say frustrated in the sense that they've put forward, I suppose they've put forward—

Mr. Bounsall: Proper amendments.

Mr. Roy:—as I can recall over the last two years, even in the justice committee, as long as somebody came in with a piece of paper and put something forward they would present it, whether it was—

Mr. Bounsall: Never, Albert.

Mr. Roy:—on behalf of the women's groups in this province or whether it was on behalf of the frustrated husbands who were hanging around the committee at the time we were discussing this.

Mr. Swart: How did you know what went on in the committee, Albert?

Mr. Roy: So that every sort of conceivable amendment has been brought forward; and of course—

Mr. Chairman: Order, please. Is this in reference to the amendment before the committee?

Mr. Roy: Yes it is, Mr. Chairman; I'm right on.

So it is, I suppose, with some frustration that they find that once a reasonable amendment is put forward that it is accepted. It's accepted by the members opposite, and the Attorney General in his wisdom has seen the objectivity and the in-depth—

Mr. Bounsall: It doesn't do any harm.

Mr. Roy:—in-depth logic of this particular amendment and has accepted it. I suppose all of their amendments having been rejected they are somewhat frustrated.

Ms. Gigantes: We don't like meaningless fights, that's all.

Mr. Roy: Let me say this, that the members to my left who have postured for a period of time, over quite a period of time over this legislation—

Mr. Bounsall: Who's posturing now?

Mr. Roy:—one has to keep in mind that the legislation itself generally, the way it was drafted, the way some of the amendments have been made to the legislation, was intended to apply to the majority of people in this province. I would hazard to guess that for 80 to 90 per cent of the people in this province, the only assets they would have would be those mentioned in the family assets as defined under the present legislation. I think that has to be kept in mind.

The second thing that has to be kept in mind in relation to the amendment is the fact that many of the amendments—and I can't help but think this as I hear them yapping to my left, and I'll give them the benefit of the doubt for this—that they didn't understand the full import of the amendments that they were bringing forward. Because if they did, all I can conclude is that in fact the amendments were or their attitude was highly irresponsible.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, he is completely out of order. Everybody has agreed to it for heaven's sake. What is this for?

Mr. Roy: I know my colleagues don't like to hear what I'm saying, but it was in fact irresponsible.

Mr. Lawlor: You go on at too great a length.

Mr. Roy: In their attempt to be too rigid what in fact would have happened would have been one of two things.

Mr. Bounsall: It isn't fairness that you want here.

Mr. Roy: It would have caused far more litigation; and secondly they would have driven everybody into lawyers' offices getting involved into marriage contracts.

Mr. Lawlor: Which of the seven deadly sins is that?

Mr. Roy: This is where more flexibility and the logic of the amendment by the member for St. George has application, in that it's finally, as one who's been in practice, who's had a family law practice—

Ms. Gigantes: Not on Legal Aid.

Mr. Roy:—and who's seen the problems happening out here; and as I say, I don't think, apart from reading about it, that members to my left, the most vocal ones, really know what happens in fact in a difficult time when there is marriage breakdown.

Mr. Bounsall: We've done more in our constituency work than you've done in your legal office.

Mr. Roy: I can say to you that the greatest concern, basically, as I have seen it in the real world out there was the lack of recognition for the contribution by a housewife who had been a good mother, who had been a good wife.

Ms. Gigantes: What about a widow? What about the support of widows in law?

Mr. Roy: And at the time of separation there was not recognition of this. And so with the wisdom she has put forward on many other issues, the member for St. George has brought forward an amendment which will finally give recognition to that contribution, which will tell the court that this is something for the court to look at in the contribution toward a particular asset.

To me, the amendment is not only sensible, it is practical. And it is not irresponsible as many of the amendments put forward by the members to my left.

Mr. Lawlor: We all agree with it.

Mr. Roy: And they will be bringing forward more irresponsible amendments, as I have seen from the list of their proposed amendments.

Mr. Lawlor: Who are you arguing with?

Mr. Bounsall: I wouldn't like you to be Attorney General.

Mr. Roy: And so it is to the great credit of the member for St. George, who has weathered some of the abuse of the members to my left, that we have taken a responsible approach.

Mr. Foulds: You shouldn't talk about Murray Gaunt that way.

Mr. Roy: What is of interest to us is to represent the people of this province, that is our major interest. Our interest is to be responsible and not just to posture every time we feel something might look politically good or because we might impress someone here in the galleries. We take a responsible approach. The member for St. George with this amendment—

Mr. Bounsall: It does nothing.

Mr. Roy:—has finally put into legislation, has made it clear to the court and to the judge, what should be recognized and what he should look at under section 4, when the division is made of certain assets.

So I say, to the great credit of the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk who stated it earlier, that we in this party are not so much interested in posturing but are interested in having workable legislation; we are interested in having legislation which will be to the great benefit of the people of this province.

Mr. McClellan: These things are relevant, aren't they?

Mr. Chairman: The hon. member for Beaches-Woodbine.

Ms. Bryden: Thank you Mr. Chairman. No one, I guess, can be against spousehood, or a statement explicitly recognizing the equal responsibility of spouses for child care and household management.

But that recognition is negated if we reject a legislated equal division of all the assets which come into a marriage after the marriage. It becomes rather like the preamble, which is a window-dressing statement of objectives not implemented by the legislation.

I am disappointed that this is the only contribution the Liberal Party has brought forward in an attempt to improve the bill.

Mr. B. Newman: She admits the contribution.

Mr. Roy: What contribution have you made?

Ms. Bryden: I will be coming to that in a minute.

An hon. member: That's what we're afraid of.

Mr. Bounsall: We shall know what they are up to.

Ms. Bryden: I think that this bill, while it is an improvement over many of our archaic laws, still needs a great many improvements.

This amendment, in my opinion, adds nothing to the bill that is not already there, explicitly or implicitly. For instance, the concept of recognizing the extra contribution of the spouse who undertakes the child care and household duties is covered in my amendment, which I moved in the justice committee and which was passed by the justice committee and which is part of the bill now in section 19(5)(o).

Section 8 also recognizes the contribution of the spouse beyond a contribution of money, beyond a contribution of work, but simply recognizes a contribution when the contributions "are those of a reasonable spouse of that sex." In other words, contributions of the spouse who traditionally stays in the home are recognized in section 8.

This amendment adds nothing to the bill because it doesn't change the definition of family assets. It applies therefore only to that little corner of the marital sandpile where the family home and the TV set are located. It doesn't obviate the necessity of going to court.

I fail to understand how the member for Ottawa East can say this will decrease litigation if every situation where the one spouse wishing to share in any assets beyond that narrow little definition of family assets has to go to court. It still leaves the sharing of any assets beyond the family assets entirely up to judges. And we know from past experience that judges are not always in the 20th century in recognizing the contributions of the spouses, in making up for the fact that the spouse who stayed in the home has forgone career opportunities and does not come out into the labour market on an equal basis with the other spouse if there is a marriage breakup.

We also know that in most cases this legislation will work against women, who have been traditionally the ones who stayed in the home, who are disadvantaged, who come out into a labour market where female wages are about 60 per cent of male wages. Therefore we need to recognize by legislation that they are entitled to 50 per cent of the assets which came in during the marriage if we are to recognize that marriage is a partnership.

So while this amendment does no harm I can see that in my opinion it does no good. It doesn't change the legislation at all. It doesn't change Bill 59 to be a recognition that marriage is a partnership of equals.

Mrs. Campbell: I am grateful to my friend from Riverdale; he is quite correct in his comment about clause 6(b). Following the end of the first (i); the consideration set out in clauses (a) to (f) of subsection 4 presently reads "or"; I would move that it be amended to read "and."

Mr. Chairman: Is the committee agreed to change section 6(b)(i) by changing the word "or" to the word "and"?

Agreed.

Ms. Gigantes: I would like just to touch on that, Mr. Chairman. It seems that not only is the member for Riverdale always right on matters of law, but he's always right on English too.

Mr. Roy: There you go.

Mr. Renwick: Every matter of substance though.

Mr. Sweeney: I want to stand, Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment.

Ms. Gigantes: You mean to change "or" to "and"?

Mr. Sweeney: We are still speaking on the amendment, I understand; is that correct?

Mr. Chairman: Correct.

Mr. Sweeney: I want to stand in support of it—

Ms. Gigantes: It should be a subamendment though.

Mr. Sweeney: —and just make three short observations. The first one is to point out that in fact the changes which my colleague from St. George has introduced are in fact important, substantial and necessary.

Ms. Gigantes: Point of order, Mr. Chairman. Did we pass the subamendment?

Mr. Chairman: The suggestion to change the word "or" to "and" was agreed by the committee.

Ms. Gigantes: You mean before I rose and you recognized me?

Mr. Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Roy: You are completely out of order.

An hon. member: You want to amend it to "but"?

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Chairman, that doesn't seem correct to me.

Mr. Roy: You weren't in your seat.

Mr. Conway: It was so much easier in CBC Ottawa.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman: Your point of order?

Mr. Foulds: Does not the passing of a subamendment in fact therefore pass the amendment? And does the vote not need to be taken immediately?

Mr. Chairman: This was not placed as a subamendment. It was drawn to the attention of the member for St. George by the member for Riverdale and I asked the committee if they would agree to change the word and the committee agreed.

Mr. Bradley: Let's get together over there.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Chairman, with all great and due respect, any change in the clause is an amendment or a subamendment, and I would suggest to you that when you asked the committee if they agreed with this change, you were putting a subamendment.

Mr. Roy: Oh boy.

Mr. Chairman: I have to tell the member for Port Arthur that I asked the committee only to change the word. The committee agreed and there was no objection at that time.

Mr. Foulds: Yes, right.

Mr. Chairman: I'll recognize the member for Kitchener-Wilmot.

Mr. Sweeney: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm at a loss to understand—

Mr. Roy: These matters of great substance.

Mr. Sweeney: —why there's some attempt made to prevent this. Mr. Chairman, may I repeat, I stand in support of the amendment put by my colleague from St. George and I suggest that, in contrast to what has been said, this amendment is a substantial one and a necessary one.

The first point I would make is that it has been brought to the attention of this House in the past that when a judge renders a decision he does so on the basis of the law as it is written, not on the basis of the law as it is intended by members of this House. As a matter of fact, recently a decision by the government was overturned by the Supreme Court of Canada and the judge made it very clear that it was not his job to try to know what was in the minds of the legislators when they pass legislation. It is his job to deal with the legislation as it is written, and by making this amendment we are clearly saying to any judge who looks at this piece of legislation in future—

Mr. Lawlor: What about the golden rule? What about all these wretched rules?

Mr. Sweeney: —what we mean when we say an equal partnership in every sense of the word, a partnership in which the housewife in particular—and I think that's who we're talking about in most cases—clearly, by the job she does in her home, by the job she does with her children, makes it possible for her partner, for her husband, to go out into the business world to acquire other assets, and that those assets would be taken into consideration if and when it is necessary to make a judgement. I think it's important that we make that particular observation, and it's important that it be listed very carefully for any judge who may so rule in the future.

I would also point out that I think it is more important to do it this way than to deal with a mechanical—a mechanistic, if you will—so-called 50-50 split, because if there's one thing that any successful-marriage couple will indicate very clearly it's that marriage is not a 50-50 split. And it's not "50-50 or fight"; it would be "50-50 and fight"—

Mr. Foulds: Only in your case, John.

Mr. Sweeney: —because anyone who starts out in a marriage or anyone who tries to continue a marriage on the basis that everything is split down the middle and that half is yours and that half is mine, won't have a marriage that lasts very long.

Mr. Bounsall: Read the bill.

Mr. Sweeney: Any successful married couple knows that a marriage always entails that each partner at all times wants to give more than he or she expects to get. That's what this clearly points out—the equal partnership in the best sense of the word. It's that kind of partnership in that best sense of the word that my colleague from St. George has presented here and that we should support.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, very briefly, I've heard the word "substantial" used many times over on that side of the House with regard to the amendment which they have put forward. Of course, we all recognize that the issue of a wife's contribution to the home is very substantial, but that's not really what this amendment is talking about. When you boil the whole thing down all it really does is change the words that are in there. It says that "the purpose of this section is to recognize that inherent in the marital relationship there is mutual contribution by the spouses, whether financial or otherwise, to the family welfare." They say: "The purpose of this section is to recognize that child care, household management and financial provision are the joint responsibility of the spouses."

It clarifies it slightly, and that is all it does. It doesn't change the principle of this bill whatsoever.

Mr. Haggerty: Quit while you're ahead, Mel.

Mr. Swart: There are two types of assets in this bill. There are the family assets where the principle is that they are to be jointly divided. Then there are all the other assets which belong to the individual spouses; they may be varied by the court. This makes a very slight change in the wording as to how they can be varied. We're going to support the bill, as I have already said. Perhaps "supporting" isn't the right word; we are not going to bother to oppose it, because it is so inconsequential that it means nothing.

Section 4, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 5 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 11:

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Lawlor moves that section 11 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor.

"11(1) Where property is transferred from one spouse to the other and delivery or registration is effected or where one spouse directs property to be placed or taken in the name of the other spouse, unless there exists proof of a contrary intention, the transfer shall be deemed to be a gift to the donee spouse except that

"(a) where the property is placed or taken in the name of the spouses as joint tenants, unless there is proof of a contrary intention, each spouse shall be deemed on a severance of the joint tenancy to hold a one-half beneficial interest in the property; and

"(b) money on deposit in a chartered bank, savings office, credit union or trust company in the name of both spouses shall be deemed to be in the name of the spouses as joint tenants for the purpose of clause (a).

"(2) The rules of law applying to the presumption of advancement and resulting trust in questions of ownership of property as between husband and wife are abolished."

I wonder if the other members have received copies of the proposed amendment.

Mr. Lawlor: I sent copies to the Attorney General and, I think, to the member for St. George. The member for Ottawa East probably hasn't got a copy.

Mr. Roy: I had better have one if you want my support.

Mr. Renwick: This is what I call a substantial amendment. We lawyers could argue this one all night.

Mr. Lawlor: No, I don't think we need to go on for very long on it. It's a nice point of law. The best way to approach it is simply by reading into the record part of the Law Reform Commission study documents. On page 376, it says: "The Presumption of Advancement and the Presumption of Resulting Trust: The recommendations in the two preceding sections—they have to do with joint bank accounts and common funds—"will mean that the presumption of advancement and the presumption of resulting trust will no longer apply to most of the significant financial transactions between husband and wife. There remains to be dealt with the situation where one spouse, using his or her own money, purchases property and directs that the title be placed in the name of the other. At common law, as has been indicated elsewhere in this report, the effect given by the law to such a transaction differs, depending upon whether the purchaser is a man or a woman. If it is the husband, he is presumed to make a gift to his wife. If the purchaser is the wife, her husband is presumed to hold the property in trust for her.

"These results have been criticized with increasing frequency in recent years and are often disregarded in Canadian courts. It is obvious that they no longer serve the requirements of married people or of contemporary society. The commission therefore recommends that, subject to the special provisions respecting the matrimonial home, where one spouse, whether husband or wife, acquires property and causes the title to be placed in the name of the other, then, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intention, the transaction should be considered as one of gift. The same principle should apply in direct transfers between husband and wife. These proposals have the merit of making the view of the law coincide with the factual appearance of the transaction, while still leaving the parties free to demonstrate their true intentions, if those are different. The presumption of resulting trust between husband and wife, and its outdated ambience that married women require some special protection against the unwisdom of their own dispositions, would thereby be done away with."

It comes down to this: When property passes—and this is in a direct context as opposed to the earlier section, section 8, which is precisely the Murdoch situation—and where that doctrine called quantum meruit comes into play; that is, the contribution that has been given should be recognized, in the old law if it wasn't a complete payment, only a partial one, it was ignored. Then an equitable doctrine grew up, saying that to the extent that a contribution was made, then it was accepted; but certain kinds of contributions weren't accepted, namely labour or "the indirect contribution," as it is called.

The section we're dealing with, section 11, is concerned with direct contributions only and only as between husbands and wives. So you go one way or the other: Either what passes between the spouses, irrespective of sex, is a gift or it's a resulting trust. You take one or the other.

What the Attorney General has done, against the explicit setting forth and argumentation of the Law Reform Commission, is just the opposite. He abolishes the presumption of advancement, the gift aspect of it, and places his emphasis upon the resulting trust notion; that is, the very notion that purportedly was supposed to protect the wife against her own ill-advised giving of gifts.

Why he has done that, I'm not sure. It's a change over against what was in the original legislation. To consider it a gift, to place the emphasis or the onus there as applying to both spouses, seems to me a more equitable and sensible disposition of the matter than to abolish the gift concept, as he seeks to do in the legislation.

I would like to hear from the Attorney General further statements and further rationalizations as to why this particular disposition was made and why he places the weight or onus where he places it.

In any event, in this particular context I think both concepts are outmoded. What I have tried to do in the section as I brought it forward is to say, in layman's language—getting away from all this talk about anticipations and advancements and resulting trusts—that a gift is a gift. If there are circumstances—and there can be; I used the word "proof" rather than the word "evidence," because I believe the word "evidence" to be weaker, although it possibly comes to the same thing—if there is a witness present, a bank manager or somebody, or if there is a written document saying in effect that the giving of this ostensible gift was not meant as a gift but that the true intention of the gift was that it would come back to the husband or that he would retain the ownership, which is really what the point is, then so be it. But I think the evidence would have to be substantive and even conclusive, otherwise it remains against. And seeking to pull back on it and set up all the labyrinth of litigation that has happened in these things; because every time the marriage breaks up one spouse or the other—usually the husband does; that is claim he didn't mean to do that at all. The judge will then ask him why he did it. Very often, he gives the excuse that it was to protect his business interests, to protect him against creditors should they attack.

The courts have gone both ways on that. They say: "That is a subversive intent. That has a quasi-fraudulent ring to it, and therefore we won't give cognizance in an equitable situation to your advanced intention to defeat your creditors." They therefore have ignored it and reaffirmed the gift. But in certain circumstances the property has been allowed to come back to him on those rather shaky grounds apart from anything else.

The business about intention is hard to define after the event, his submission to the court that this was what was really in his mind at that particular time.

I used the word "common" earlier, because Laskin, the Chief Justice of Canada, uses it extensively in the Murdoch judgement in his dissenting opinion, which is a superb piece of legal reasoning. He seeks, in the course of his judgement, to abnegate or get away from the resulting trust notions and all that is implied by that. He places his full weight upon what he calls a constructive trust notion. There are elements in the constructive trust that I don't want to import in here, I want to retain intention. Constructive trust operates either with or without intention, whereas I want the intention to be explicitly affirmed.

Secondly, in the particular context in which he speaks, he speaks of common intention constantly. That is probably pushing it too far. If a unilateral intention by either spouse can be conclusively proved to the satisfaction of the court, then the property never did pass as a gift. There is no necessity then to resort to resulting trusts or anticipations or anything else. It's either a gift or it's not a gift. What flows from one is that it remains his property or her property ab initio, despite the fact that it appeared to be on the surface a gift, because there is adequate external and objective proof that that was not the case, and therefore from its very beginning, a fee simple transfer never took place—or an absolute transfer in the case of personal property.

So it boils down to trying to write a little bit of this legislation, since it has enormous impact upon the man and woman in the street, in terms that they might understand. This is not true about a good deal of legislation. At the same time, we should be saying that these ancient concepts having to do with trusts law are no longer applicable in this. No way is the concept of resulting trust thrown out—it is only in the context as between husband and wife. It may apply in a thousand other situations but not here; and it ought not to apply here, it only muddies the water. I think that's enough to be said about it. I commend it to the Attorney General and would ask him to accept this amendment.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I'd like to have the opportunity to respond to the member for Lakeshore, I appreciate what he is trying to accomplish but it's my respectful view, Mr. Chairman, that this is really quite counter-productive and can only cause a great deal of confusion for the following reasons: First of all, the amendment will accomplish nothing insofar as family assets are concerned because of course there is the presumption of division in any event, and I think it's quite evident that it will accomplish nothing in the case of non-family assets because of section 8.

Certainly what the proposed amendment to section 11 might accomplish insofar as presumption of gift is concerned could be back under section 8, because under section 8, obviously if it's a husband making a gift to the wife, he could establish, in the words of section 8, that the "spouse or former spouse has contributed work, money or money's worth in respect of the acquisition, management, maintenance, operation or improvement of the property, other than family assets, in which the other has or had an interest, upon application, the court may by order, direct the payment of an amount in compensation therefor . . ."

So what happens if your amendment to section 11 passes? There's a presumption of gift, but in a situation that you are talking about the husband could simply apply under section 8 and get it back. The purpose of section 8 is to protect, in many cases, the contribution of the wife who, by work or money or—it's usually work or money's worth—has contributed to the acquisition of a non-family asset, and that section 8 is to protect the wife so it won't be said, "Well, the wife is making a gift of this work or money's worth to the husband."

We are saying section 8 in effect rebuts the presumption of gift and this normally, in the majority of cases, will work to the benefit of the wife. Obviously section 8 has been supported and I think there is general agreement among the members as to what we are attempting to accomplish by section 8, which really rebuts the presumption of gift for the reasons I have just mentioned.

Section 11 creates the presumption of gift, which again is really meaningless in view of section 8. But furthermore, our concern goes beyond that in relation to the problem that it can create for women—and families, I should say—where a husband may wish to place certain property in the wife's name to protect the property from creditors. In our view, section 11, particularly in view of section 8, will accomplish nothing in so far as the wife is concerned. Quite apart from that, it will act as a disincentive to husbands to protect property in such a way, and that, in our view, is a manner in which the woman can be prejudiced by this particular section. Furthermore, before I even was a member of it, this Legislature in 1975 passed the 1975 Family Law Reform Act creating a presumption or adopting the principle of the presumption of resulting trust. That Act has been in force for almost three years in the province, and certainly so far as we can ascertain, it has not caused any problems but indeed has advanced the position of women somewhat considerably. So furthermore, it is our view that this amendment can only create a great deal of confusion, particularly in view of the 1975 Act, but more important than that, it is in conflict with section 8 and—

Ms. Gigantes: How can you say that?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Well, it's quite clear if you would bother to read it, but judging by some of the things you have said—
[9.00]

Ms. Gigantes: Are you suggesting I haven't read it?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry:—I really wonder if you have read the legislation.

Mr. Roy: The Attorney General talks as though he hadn't read it.

Mr. Conway: Give it to her.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: For those reasons, I really don't think it would be in the public interest to accept such an amendment.

Mr. Lawlor: I am afraid my construction is quite different from that of the Attorney General on this particular head on two counts. First of all, with respect to section 8, if it is read carefully, it is the Murdoch section. That has to do with indirect contributions, as I said earlier. Basically, the very word "contribution" is an indication of that. It has to be read as a whole. It is with respect to the acquisition, management, maintenance, operation or improvement of property, none of which matters has been given cognizance in previous law, except for an amendment which was made about 1975. But that was directed on to that particular problem. Where someone makes a contribution which cannot be measured in money or money's worth, some kind of assessment has to be made of that particular situation.

There is money and money's worth, that which can be turned into those things. It is with respect to these various dimensions of dealing with property, whereas section 11 has to do with the direct contribution, as has been indicated by the Law Reform Commission, where someone either hands over money to a vendor and directs that the property be taken in someone else's name—here specifically in the name of the spouse—and designates in the process of doing this that that shall be the very person who will be the donee of the gift.

The Attorney General hasn't, when he was on his feet, explained why he has reversed the onus; why he has abdicated the concept of gift and gone for the concept of resulting trust. Surely the resulting trust fund idea is the more inequitable and the more iniquitous. In every situation where this happens, the claim that a resulting trust took place will surely arise. You are inviting litigation. Who is it that is mostly giving these gifts? It's the male spouse and he is going to say that and you are reaffirming that in giving legislative sanction to a position of denying what ostensibly was a gift and almost in every instance lending credence to the concept of a resulting trust.

In this particular context, I won't repeat my previous arguments with regard to one concept or the other. These presumptions are ill-advised in this particular context. In the relationship that we are seeking to recognize and give a kind of new legal orientation to in the process of this legislation, to resort back and to place emphasis upon a somewhat hoary conception of the law which breeds all kinds of nice evils in terms of these presumptions seems to me to be a backward step. Therefore, I would ask you to consider your position.

Mr. Roy: I can recall back in 1975 when the legislation was passed to change the old presumptions as we knew them under the common law, we at that time had supported the change in presumption. The problem with that legislation had been that it was not clear when it came into effect. There has been court interpretation on this that it was not retroactive. That was one of the problems that was encountered with that piece of legislation. With this Act, it is going to make it very clear about the retroactivity of that presumption.

The reason we had supported the change in the presumption was that the old presumption as we knew it under the common law was not a fair presumption; and secondly, it was in fact not a presumption that was reflecting what the parties intended. I say to my colleague from Lakeshore that in most cases when in fact this transfer takes place, the intention of the parties is not that it be a gift, but it's for another reason, whether it be for reasons of income tax or whether it be for reasons of creditors—wanting to protect his spouse and children from creditors. So the presumption as established in section 11, the present presumption, which just repeats what we were talking about back in 1975, to me is a presumption which reflects what the parties had intended.

My colleague from Lakeshore says in most cases this is going to be a situation where the husband is the one who is going to be making the transfer to the wife, and I agree with him that that's going to be the case. I would hope we would encourage husbands to continue doing this—putting property in their wives' names.

Mr. Renwick: Particularly for the purpose of defrauding their creditors.

Mr. Roy: But if we change the presumption around, we're going to be discouraging this. I would hope, I would trust that the members to my left who are the so-called—

Mr. Foulds: The member for St. George is giving you a fishy look—and to your right.

Mr. Roy:—protectors of the rights of the weaker spouses—

Mr. Lewis: What do you mean "so-called"?

Mr. Foulds: Stop talking about Murray Gaunt that way.

Mr. Roy:—would in fact, by suggesting that type of presumption—

Mr. Lewis: What do you mean "weaker spouse"? What is this?

Mr. Roy:—would in fact be discouraging the husband from putting property in his wife's name to protect either against creditors or for income tax purposes.

Mr. Lewis: What are you trotting your pathology out all over the House for?

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I want to say to you that—

Mr. Lewis: Don't put that interjection in Hansard.

An hon. member: Put it in.

Mr. Roy: —I think my colleague to the left, from Lakeshore, is in fact misguided if he thinks that by changing the presumption to gift, which is not what the parties intended—well, most husbands, as he says, are not going to make the transfer—in fact, you're going to be inviting situations where the spouse is going to end up in many instances, for credit or other reasons, part owner with somebody else, with another third party.

We've just had a lot of advertisements in the papers about local registered retirement savings plans. One of the schemes is to put the plan under your wife's name, so that when it starts paying out you're going to have a lower rate of taxes. To accept the argument of the member for Lakeshore, it would be deemed that having put it into your wife's name, a gift is made, when in fact that was not the intention. The intention was to put it in her name to get a lower rate of taxes when the payments start coming out.

I should think we should continue encouraging husbands to do this.

Mr. Lewis: Absolutely.

Mr. Roy: The same thing applies to other types of property.

Ms. Gigantes: That would be only decent.

Mr. Roy: I would hope that even the members from the NDP and even the member for Carleton East might be able to understand that, that we should continue to encourage the stronger of the two spouses, if that's his intention, to protect the weaker spouse—

Mr. Lewis: Always the male, you'll notice. Margaret, do you hear this?

Ms. Gigantes: Margaret, do you agree?

Mr. Lewis: I don't want you to be confused as to the stronger and the weaker.

Hon. Mrs. Birch: I have no—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. Roy: It was in fact the member for Lakeshore who kept saying that most transfers would be by the husband.

Mr. Lewis: This is not a debate about equality.

Ms. Gigantes: Let's hear it from the provincial secretary.

Mr. Roy: So I say, Mr. Chairman, in their misguided attempt to so-called protect one of the spouses—

Mr. Lewis: Why did I come tonight? Why am I here?

Mr. Roy: —it's working the opposite way.

Mr. Lewis: Albert, invite me to leave.

Mr. Bounsall: Mr. Chairman, I must say that if the only argument that the member for Ottawa East could make for not putting this really into a presumption of gift or a substantive gift in this section, as the amendment of the member for Lakeshore does, is because of the retirement savings plans that would be deemed to be a wholly transferred gift and you want some sharing of that for tax purposes and so on, then that was very easily solved by supporting our amendment about the right to that retirement savings plan being a property of both for as long as those people are together. You can't argue in favour of one section which you have voted against in order to defeat the purpose of another section.

Mr. Roy: The amateurs are trying to be the legal experts.

Mr. Bounsall: However, that is no more illogical than the member for Ottawa East usually is.

I might say that the Attorney General's argument that he put forward is an argument which can be applied either way, in trying to say that the presumption of gift as outlined by the amendment proposed by the member for Lakeshore would be negated by any actions taken under clause 8 of the bill. That same exact sentence can be said about the presumption of resulting trust—it can be negated by those very same arguments made under section 8 of the bill. So it is no argument either way.

Mr. Lewis: That's right.

Mr. Bounsall: That argument does not work when considering either of those two presumptions because it works in the same way on both of them.

I must admit that this is one of the sections of this bill which has intrigued me, particularly of late, when it was brought to my attention by a staff member of the federal Status of Women Council that it was deemed by women that this section of the bill as presented by the Attorney General had some real problems for them. Not being a lawyer, I started to ask lawyers with whom I came in contact what presumption of resulting trust in fact means, and what did presumption of advancement mean. I found much to my surprise, unless they were wholly immersed in the practice of family law, you couldn't get an answer from them. They had to reach for their law books. Then they would come back to me and say: "I think this is what it means," and they would read an almost unintelligible section from their student days law books.

I found that first rather confusing and then rather amusing, and thought I had better speak to someone who really knows, someone who deals on a continuing day-to-day basis with family law. I am not slandering the member for Riverdale when I say this, it is just that his student law book wasn't very good and very clear when he read out the passage to me.

Mr. Lewis: Imagine if you'd consulted the Attorney General.

Ms. Gigantes: Heaven forbid.

Mr. Lewis: The man hasn't read law in five years.

Mr. Bounsall: His law book may be a year or two more updated, or a different version, and maybe the explanation contained therein would have been clearer.

Mr. Conway: Stephen, you must have a few of those old law books around.

Mr. Lewis: I have about 30 of them, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Roy: Tell us how far you got into law school.

Mr. Lewis: About one month.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order. Would the member for Scarborough West address the Chair when it is his turn?

Mr. Lewis: As a matter of fact, it isn't my turn. Therefore, I am not addressing the Chair. I am just interjecting happily and wantonly.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Would you allow your colleague from Windsor-Sandwich to continue please?

Mr. Lewis: By all means; certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bounsall: I would just say of the member for Scarborough West's interjections that at least his mind has not been clouded—

Mr. Lewis: By law.

Mr. Bounsall: —by the textbook definition of presumption of resulting trust or presumption of advancement, which in this instance is certainly an advantage.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think you should have a QC too.

Mr. Foulds: Next year.

Mr. Lewis: I have never been defamed by legal knowledge.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Or helped by it.

Mr. Bounsall: By resorting to going to someone who worked on a day-to-day basis in family law and asking them what in fact it meant, it became very clear what presumption of resulting trust was and how it applied prior to 1975. It is simply that—and it worked in a derogatory way, there is no question—when the husband gave a gift to his wife—

Mr. Roy: I have serious reservations.

Mr. Bounsall: —the presumption of resulting trust was operated; that is it was not a gift, the wife was only holding that item in trust unless she could prove otherwise.

Presumption of advancement worked the other way—transfers from the wife to the husband; that was indeed a gift to her husband unless she could prove otherwise. So in the situation as it applied prior to 1975, the woman was disadvantaged both ways. Anything she gave was gone unless she could prove otherwise and anything she got wasn't hers unless she could prove otherwise.

[9:15]

A previous Attorney General had a choice to make back in 1975. If he was going to abolish one presumption, which presumption would he abolish? I don't know how close the decision was but he chose the wrong one. He abolished the presumption of advancement.

Mr. Lewis: That's right.

Mr. Bounsall: Anything transferred between husband and wife was never thereafter ever a gift. Anything that therefore was transferred under the presumption of resulting trust, which has been in effect since 1975, means that everything transferred between spouses is simply held by the receiver in trust for the one that is giving, and vice versa. That wouldn't be a bad concept for the transfer of property or gifts or what-have-you between spouses in a marriage, if at the end of that marriage everything was divided equally between them. But that not having been done in the assets section of this bill, under presumption of resulting trust they are transferring gifts and properties to each other which always remain the property of the giver.

This might be all right if all assets were divided equally and everything was being retained within the family to be so divided and so on; but we have this very narrow and restrictive asset split upon the time of divorce, which means that, in choosing between those two presumptions, presumption of advancement should be the presumption that is retained so that gifts transferred between spouses become gifts unless otherwise allowed, as in the amendment by the member for Lakeshore where he has allowed for it. A gift in essence is a gift unless there exists proof to the contrary. The objections of the member for Ottawa East are thoroughly met by the amendment we have before us placed by the member for Lakeshore.

It clearly indicates that transfers between spouses will be gifts unless there exists proof to the contrary. I can register my retirement savings plan or I can register my summer cottage or all these other vast property holdings which I have in my wife's name at any given time. She simply gives me a paper saying "I understand that I am just holding this in trust for you until you want it back." That covers the objections of the member for Ottawa East and it is completely allowed for in the amendment by the member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lewis: That's an excellent analysis.

Mr. Bounsall: And I would certainly say that this amendment is one that makes great common sense.

Mr. Lewis: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bounsall: I really think sometimes that the member for Scarborough West should have gone to law school as he sees these things that come before us with too much immediate clarity on occasion.

Mr. Lewis: As a matter of fact, you've driven them from their seats.

Mr. Bounsall: Yes, they are deep in consultation. They are trying to explain to each other what it is and what they recall from their law book of student days.

Ms. Gigantes: They are about to reread the amendment.

Mr. G. Taylor: We've heard such a variation from you that it's hard to understand and remember what we were taught.

Mr. Renwick: Lawyers Perkins and Stone are straightening out the Attorney General. Late one afternoon, a week ago last Thursday I believe it was, the member for Lakeshore and I were making our final conversation before he committed something to paper on this amendment.

Mr. Lewis: Just a minute, that was poetry he was writing.

Mr. Bounsall: That was poetry. He always squeezes the law lines amongst the lines of poetry that he has just composed.

An hon. member: Is that part of the bill?

Mr. Lawlor: It depends what paper it is.

Mr. Bounsall: An interesting position was whether or not we would reverse what is proposed in Bill 59 and replace presumption of resulting trust by presumption of advancement. We had both agreed we had run into so many lawyers who didn't really know what either of them was clearly, that it would be best to abolish them both, as he has done, and spell out in common language, understandable to all, that a gift is a gift—

Mr. Lewis: Unless so otherwise stated.

Mr. Bounsall: —unless so otherwise stated.

Mr. Lewis: Unless it isn't a gift.

Ms. Gigantes: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Okay.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I want you to know my colleague from Windsor-Sandwich often advises his constituents along that line.

Mr. Lewis: I'd like to challenge the Attorney General.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Carleton-Grenville has the floor.

Mr. Renwick: Can't you put an end to it, Roy, by accepting the amendment?

Mr. G. Taylor: Those engineers would repeal the law of gravity given the chance.

Mr. Lewis: Here comes the legal sophistry.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: Now we'll hear the convolutions.

Mr. Conway: Well, if anyone could recognize sophistry—

Mr. Lewis: That's right. As a sophist, I can recognize it. You go back to your books, young fellow.

Mr. Conway: And you to your law.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sterling: Mr. Chairman, surely the intention of section 8 and the other portions of this bill is to look back in the marriage retroactively to the contributions of the two spouses and try to give to those contributions, whether they be in labour, in child care, or any measure of contribution, some meaning.

Mr. Lawlor: That's right.

Mr. Sterling: I do not see the differentiation between a contribution of labour and a contribution of cash, as we are recognizing in abolishing the presumption of gift—we're not abolishing the presumption of gift, we're reinstating what was in the Act in 1975.

It perhaps may be argued that section 11 as it now stands is making it clearer that the abolishment of the presumption of gift is retroactive. The whole thrust of this Act, as I understand it, is to recognize contributions of spouses to the marriage, no matter what that contribution might be. I only throw out to the member who has proposed this amendment that I cannot understand his differentiation between labour in lieu of cash or cash itself.

Mr. Bounsell: It puts the onus on the right foot, though.

Mr. Lewis: Absolutely.

Mr. Lawlor: One must view it in context and as a whole and there are several factors. The other wording, "management, maintenance, et cetera" is number one. The second one, "in which the other has or had an interest," has very particular meaning. If what you're saying is true, there's no necessity for dealing with section 11 at all. But I have just a simple question to ask the Attorney General: Why has he reversed the onus? He hasn't answered that question.

Mr. Lewis: Yes. Where did he go?

Mr. Lawlor: As he has it now, you weigh the evidence, you weigh the situation in favour of the husband rather than the wife.

Mr. Lewis: That's right, comme d'habitude.

Mr. Lawlor: Previously, and as the Law Reform Commission thought the Attorney General should do, it should be on the basis of weighing it in favour of the advancement. It can be rebutted; one goes back, one goes into the resulting trust; the resulting trust flows from the other.

The Attorney General has turned that around. I don't understand why he did. I don't concede his argument with respect to the differentiations that I see between this section and section 8—but leave that aside for a moment; why did he change this; turn it on its head?

Mr. Lewis: Yes; by way of a question, Mr. Chairman, since I regard the Attorney General's arguments as entirely specious, particularly since I heard none of them before coming into the Legislature and therefore was able dispassionately to judge them in advance, may I ask the Attorney General what he was consulting about under the gallery so frantically? Does he intend to amend this clause in order to reflect what my colleague has indicated in the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I was consulting with the member for Riverdale on an entirely unrelated matter.

Mr. Lewis: No, with your colleagues under the gallery.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Oh, I'm afraid we were already on another section.

Mr. Lewis: Oh.

Mr. Sweeney: He's one ahead of you.

Mr. Lewis: Can you answer the question of why you—

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lewis:—have shifted the onus?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I say that with no disrespect for the member for Lakeshore, I have indicated to him my views and my interpretation of section 8 is somewhat different to his, and so be it.

Ms. Gigantes: The Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch) doesn't agree with you.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I think section 8 makes it quite clear so far as the onus is concerned in that respect.

Mr. Lawlor: Well the Attorney General has dug in his heels, Mr. Chairman, and so be it. All right. I still would ask, piteously if you will, if your mind can stay on this section long enough to work out its implications, why did you reverse the onus?

Mr. Lewis: That's right. That's a serious question.

Ms. Gigantes: That's something the Provincial Secretary for Social Development would like to know too. She has left; she is fed up.

Mr. Lewis: People in your caucus are walking out.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Look at yours.

Mr. Lawlor: There can only be two answers to this question. Either he doesn't know why he reversed the onus—which I rather suspect is the case—or to reverse onus is something that is rather easy to do in the middle of the night; but if he does know why then he knows it's nefarious, so take your choice on that particular dilemma.

Mr. Chairman: Shall Mr. Lawlor's amendment carry?

Those in favour please say "aye."

Those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

On section 12:

Mr. Roy: I'd like to speak to section 12. I spoke earlier in the day to the Attorney General about my concern in section 12 and the application of this part, to clarify when the application would take place. I think the Chair has received a copy of the amendment as drafted by the legislative counsel and the staff of the Attorney General, but basically we want to clarify the application of this part.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Roy moves that section 12 be amended by striking out all after clause (b) and adding thereto the following:

(c) a proceeding to determine the rights between the spouses in respect of property has been commenced or adjudicated before this part comes into force.

Mr. Roy: If I might speak to the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I was concerned by the present wording of section 12, in that it appeared that not only did this Act not apply to matters that were proceedings before the court but also would not apply to any type of property which had been the subject of a proceeding at some time prior. Having discussed it with the Attorney General this afternoon and having expressed our concern about the fact that certainly, first of all, it was not clear and, secondly, I think the intent was not in fact going to be realized by the drafting of the Act, we think it would be more acceptable to have the wording as has been proposed in the amendment.

I must say that the Attorney General and his legislative counsel not only obliged but went even further, and so we have before us the amendment on which I have moved. This makes it clear that this part of the Act would apply to all property after the proclamation of the Act, even if it was a matter that had been proceeding or was before the court; and we go further to say that it be adjudicated before this part comes into force.

My only concern—and I leave it at that for the consideration of the members—is that theoretically you could have a situation whereby parties have just been before the court and the court has made adjudication, and judgement has been handed down—let's say on March 25, and the law comes into force by proclamation on April 1—and then, because of the new rights and obligations under this Act, the parties start litigating again.

I appreciate that we may not have the same property, because certain rights are given under this Act which did not exist before the Act came into force, so we may be talking about something different. But having moved the amendment, I do express that concern. I want to say that the amendment as drafted and as we have discussed it with the Attorney General would in fact apply to all property after the proclamation of the Act.

I know situations out there where counsel has started actions thinking that this Act was going to come into force, so avoiding the implications of this Act. So this amendment would frustrate that, and well it should. As the Attorney General said, we feel the purpose of the Act is to create that partnership, to create that balance, which did not exist before, and if we're proceeding in this Legislature to do this, then we should enforce it and make it applicable to all property after the proclamation of the Act.

As I said before, I had the one caveat about where we say "adjudicated before this part came into force." But if there is an excess on that side, I'm prepared to think that it would be in the best interests of the community we serve that if we're going to lean too far we lean in favour of the application of this Act.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Any further discussion on this motion? The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lawlor: I think it's okay.

Motion agreed to.

Section 12, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 13 to 15, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 16:

Mr. Chairman: Mr. McClellan moves that subsection 1 of section 16 be amended by deleting in line 2 the words "education and".

Mr. McClellan: I'm quite convinced that this amendment will be acceptable to all parties in the House. I believe that the words "education and" are simply a piece of inadvertent drafting carelessness that are completely extraneous to the section. The section deals with the obligation of the parents to support the child. I don't understand why it is necessary in the section dealing with the obligation of the parents to support the child to include an obligation to provide education. The obligation we're dealing with is the obligation to provide support. I think that's all that the section needs to say.

I believe there is an inadvertent danger that is very real by leaving in "education and." For example, it gives a legislative sanction to the denial of education services to learning disabled children. I'm sure that that is not the intention of the government or of the draftsman, but the fact is that if this clause stands as it is, it provides a legislative sanction for the denial of educational service to a learning disabled child. The Education Act imposes the obligation of the parent to send the child to school.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I don't think that will happen but we'll accept your amendment.

Mr. McClellan: That's fine. I won't belabour the point. But I don't think we want to have, even inadvertently, the opportunity for denial of rights and education is a right.

Mr. Sweeney: I would stand in support of that amendment for the very reasons that were given which were very clear and very good.

Motion agreed to.

Section 16, as amended, agreed to.

On section 17:

Mr. Bounsall: Mr. Chairman, we circulated an amendment which, as you realize as Chairman, is not in order. It was just telegraphing to you that we would be voting against section 17 of the bill in order to delete that section.

This again in the committee was one of the most interesting sections. After the debate had taken place, the chairman of the committee indicated that that was the first time the committee had come together and that the interdynamics of it were such that it operated as a committee. There were no party lines followed in the consideration of whether section 17 would stay in the bill. The Attorney General indicated at the time that we really didn't care in a sense whether it was in or whether it was out. On due consideration by our caucus on the principle of this, the member for High Park-Swansea (Mr. Ziembra) felt very strongly, and I do as well now, that we should remove section 17 from the bill, this being the section which spells out the obligation of the children to support parents. There are arguments which can be made on both sides of the question.

Mr. Roy: Which way is the member for Welland-Thorold going?

Mr. Bounsall: He may speak on the matter. The argument was made that the onus of support in financial terms will fall mainly on children when they are in their phase of their life when they are least able to pay, that is, when they themselves are raising a family and when they themselves have high mortgage payments, although we would expect and hope—and this is true in the vast majority of cases—the children in the province of Ontario would support their parents, if not financially, then in a whole host of other ways. It's only the very unusual case in which you have children acting like the children of King Lear where anything else occurs.

We have here in the Act a clause making it obligatory that children support their parents. Although a social service agency cannot use this clause to force children to support their parents, or take the children into court on behalf of support for their parents if they are in a nursing home or a home for the aged, although that clearly isn't in the bill, the fact that it is would perhaps cause these children to be threatened with that from time to time. That again is not the kind of family relationship which we in Ontario are encouraging. It is not a relationship which can be encouraged by threat: "Support your parents or we may find some way of using section 17 of the Act." A support of parents should be one which flows naturally from the child to the parent and we do not improve or foster that relationship by making an obligatory clause in this Act indicating that it's their duty to do so.

So on balance, Mr. Chairman, the other members of the committee that considered the bill in January will remember the very interesting and productive discussions we had on it. I would hope most of them would now agree that this section should be deleted and that it really serves no useful purpose in an Act which encourages family relationships and strengthening of those family relationships.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be interesting to reflect on the fact that I think one of the reasons that this section survived through committee was a very eloquent defence in support of section 17 by the member for Welland-Thorold.

Mr. Roy: That's right. It had the support of that member. He voted for it.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I mention this not in any deprecating fashion certainly, because I made it very clear that I was concerned and uneasy about this section because it could be abused. Members of a family could be influenced to put themselves in an adversarial relationship which wouldn't be really in the interest of the family.

I just make the observation that it was the member for Welland-Thorold whose very spirited and eloquent defence in support of the principle that children who are able to should have this obligation to support their parents. This of course was really just repeating or reaffirming the obligation that has already existed as law under the Parents' Maintenance Act, although it was an Act that was seldom if ever resorted to. My own view is that on balance it would probably be better to take it out.

I am content to support the elimination of that section for the reasons that the member for Windsor-Sandwich has stated. I have some difficulty in supporting the removal totally enthusiastically, simply because I think we all have some feeling for the principle that is represented by this section, but on balance it may produce a form of adversary relationship, bringing family into litigation that can be quite destructive.

Mr. Bounsall: I might just point out the member for Welland-Thorold did not indicate to the committee members at the time his obvious conflict of interest.

Mr. Roy: Yes, but he managed to convince the member for Windsor-Sandwich.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I have some difficulties with this. I recognize some of the problems of maintaining this section, particularly as we might find this section applied more strenuously than that which is in existence today. It could create a very real hardship on some young people if they were forced to care for parents who were in one of the institutions or something of that nature. I have to tell you I am constantly worried with the way some of the government ministries move to try to shift onus for things on to individuals and municipalities, anywhere they can, rather than to assume them through the course of their own financing.

On the other hand, I can't subscribe to what was said by the member for Windsor-Sandwich because it is my experience certainly in a major city such as this that that support is quite lacking. Perhaps if the support were there, there might be the odd occasions when some of these young people would take somewhat of an interest in what was happening to parents as they live a very lonely life in a large city.

I am not prepared to oppose the deletion, but I have a certain discomfort about removing it entirely. In fact, I had looked at the matter from another point of view in that in this case I felt that possibly some kind of conduct might be looked to for an obligation, so that if a parent had been a pretty difficult type of parent, the obligation would not flow. I frankly have a dichotomy about it. I do think as a principle that it is sad not to express our very real view that a child should be responsible for the support of a parent in so far as possible. Certainly, when one puts in "in accordance with need," I am inclined to feel that that is something that should be maintained.

There are so many people in our community with a good deal of wealth who are quite prepared just to forget the parents entirely. I am not sure that should be the end result of our legislation. I would not want it to fall heavily on those who can least afford it, and that often might be the tendency of such legislation. So I guess I am trying to balance my feeling about what is best in this particular case. I guess on balance I would like to see it remain, but I am not going to fight the deletion of it. I just would like to express that kind of concern.

Mr. Philip: I share some of the anxieties and some of the conflicts that the member for St. George has expressed. I weighed both sides of this particular question, and I must admit that one of the members from the government party and the member for Welland-Thorold were quite persuasive at the time that this was debated. However, one of the things that I found interesting was that in discussing the bill and in trying to explain the bill out in the community, of all the major issues that I thought would be questioned and debated and discussed, the one that came up the most frequently and that seemed to pose the most anxieties was this one particular section.

There seems to be a great deal of anxiety out there. I think perhaps the anxieties are over-dramatized in the minds of the people who expressed them, but in trying to explain this section, I found there was considerable anxiety in the community. No doubt the Attorney General has found in his mail on the bill that there is considerable discomfort on this section. I think that weighing both sides, I have to come down on the side of eliminating the section.

Mr. Sterling: I would like to indicate to this committee that I will be supporting the retention of section 17 in this bill, as I indicated in the justice committee. I think it is important in this Act, which is a family law Act, to ensure that obligations are not only extended one way, but both ways. I feel that in certain circumstances children are put in a position to take advantage of their parents and unfortunately sometimes that does happen in our society. Fortunately, it is not too often that it does happen. But I think this section should be placed in the bill to protect parents who have basically gifted away most of their assets to their children and have been abandoned by those children after that time.

I think the other point I mentioned prior to the last—that it is important for society to understand that on reaching 18 a child's obligations will spring from that point on towards the parent, and they will reverse—I guess part of this feeling is from a personal experience that I have had. I'm sure that when members come to vote on this section that their votes may spring from a personal experience themselves.

I do feel that in the balance we should give the benefit of the doubt to the parents in this situation. So much of the bill deals in the opposite direction—that is, the parent to the child, rather than the child to the parent.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Chairman, I stand in support of leaving this section in the bill. As I look at the cover of this bill, we're talking about an Act respecting support obligations. I also notice the note to this section says, "This replaces the existing Parents' Maintenance Act." I would understand by that—and I stand corrected if necessary—that if we take this out then it's gone. There is no place in the statutes of the province where there would be any statement saying that there is an obligation on the part of children to support their parents. At least, that's what I would understand.

I think one of the things that's happening in our society far too often, is that we are allowing individuals to absolve themselves of inherent social and family responsibilities. We're making it far too easy for the state to take over and do things for others that their family members should do for them.

As I read this section—and my colleague from St. George has drawn attention to it—it says very clearly, "is capable of doing so." I can't imagine a situation as has been described by my colleagues on the left where a young family person who is financially unable to help support his or her parents would be forced by the law to do so.

I would clearly understand the intent of this section is to draw attention to those people who do not have the individual sense of responsibility and who are financially able to help support their parents and yet refuse to do so. I think that for those few people in our society—and I would certainly hope they are few—it is necessary to have somewhere in the law of this province a statement saying they are responsible. For that reason I would move very strongly to leave this in.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I wasn't going to say anything on the bill, but the last bit of claptrap I've heard leaves me no other alternative but to speak to it. In a society where both the husband and wife in many instances have to work to maintain their own family—and the numbers are growing every day—what I'm hearing tonight is that while they're doing that they have to be able to try to support their parents.

Who are we talking about? Are we talking about rich kids who might abandon their parents? The member who spoke from the Tory side of the House a few moments ago made allusion to that—to those people who aren't responsible. I don't know who has money left over. All of us want to help our parents—surely that's something you teach in children. Surely when you raise your children you teach them a sense of responsibility. You don't hand everything to them and expect, later on, that the state should pick up the tab. That, in fact, is what the minister has said, that the parents might give their all to their children and then their children would abandon them.

The class of people I represent are largely working class people who don't have that problem because they don't have that kind of asset left that they can pass it all on to their children until they become destitute themselves and the children are going to bail them out. Surely it is in the way you raise children that they have a sense of obligation to their parents; and if they can assist their parents, that sense of obligation is what prompts them to make it possible to help the parents. Surely a stupid law like this, which says that while you might have a few bucks in the bank, you should put yourself in bankruptcy to support your parents, isn't going to cause that to happen anyway.

The only thing I can see is that we are talking about a group of people who have a hell of a lot of money and who might abandon their parents—

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Watch your language.

Mr. Martel: —because they have never learned to appreciate what their parents have done for them. I suggest that this isn't going to change it. I suggest this is the wrong field we are going into.

I would urge the minister that, if need be, he go and preach in some of the churches that they raise their kids to appreciate their parents and to do it out of a sense of responsibility, rather than trying to legislate something like this. You can't legislate it; it just won't work. In our type of society, with the financial constraints on working class families, that isn't going to happen. I would urge the minister simply to withdraw that section. It is totally ridiculous.

Mr. Bradley: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that in most cases what the member for Sudbury East says is true, that in most cases it would be very difficult for the young people to be able to support their parents. However, it is unfortunate the member for Sudbury East was not present—because, of course, he is not a member of the committee, and shouldn't be expected to be present; I don't wish to imply that—to hear the rather moving address of the member for Welland-Thorold (Mr. Swart) on this particular issue. He was extremely persuasive on that particular occasion.

Mr. Martel: I am not worried what the member for Welland-Thorold says. I have my own opinions. He is entitled to his. I disagree with him.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bradley: I suppose there are some dangers in aiming this at a specific group, but I think it is really aimed at those who are affluent enough to be able to support their parents in circumstances where their parents actually require that support.

I think there are more than one or two instances where the situation of sending property on to the children in form of a gift, and then having the state pick up the tab for the parents somewhere along the line, is taking place more often, or could take place more often than perhaps many of us would like to concede. For this particular reason, I think there is justification for retaining this particular section in the Act.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, I have to say I was rather delighted to hear our House leader say that I was entitled to my own opinion.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: You never know where you will find democracy, Mel.

Mr. Bradley: Give him hell, Mel.

Mr. Swart: I am not sure at this point whether I interpret that to mean that we have a free vote in this caucus—

Mrs. Campbell: Obviously.

Mr. Swart:—but I do want to make some comments on this section. The statement that has been made, that this would only apply or ever be used against a very small percentage of the population, of course, is true.

Mr. Martel: Then don't legislate it.

[10:00]

Mr. Swart: I guess I would have to say that a great deal of legislation that we pass applies only to a very small percentage of the population—the small percentage of law-breakers and so on.

Perhaps the views that I expressed at the committee meeting were somewhat influenced by some experiences that I have had in sitting on a home for the aged committee where I can truthfully say that the actions or inactions on the part of some of the families to their parents who were in that institution were little less than despicable.

I'm not going to go into a great deal of detail on it, but I can think of one person, and there is at least one other person in the House who knows this person, who succeeded in getting the family farm transferred from the father to himself. Shortly thereafter the farm was sold for between two-thirds and three-quarters of a million dollars, and shortly thereafter he dropped his father off at the home for the aged in Welland and refused to pay a solitary cent towards his father for the keep of his father there. The end result was that that parent ended up with a daughter who had a very minimal income because pressure was put on that son to accept some obligation.

I'm sure every member of this House knows of some case where children have not accepted the moral obligation to their parents. In this particular legislation, of course we are not talking about moral obligations to parents, we are talking about legal obligations to parents, although I like to think sometimes that the legislation was pass reflects the moral qualities of our society.

I want to say that the result of the removal of this section could mean, as has already been stated by a couple of other speakers, that there might be some trend towards some transfer of assets to children so that the state might become responsible. I'm not really that much concerned about the state becoming responsible for the parents, except to say that in some instances this would mean that you were subsidizing fairly well-to-do families—

Mrs. Campbell: That's right.

Mr. Swart:—when you would be in fact taking over an obligation which should morally be theirs.

Mr. Roy: Right on.

Mr. Swart: I have to say that one concern about leaving this section in, and this has already been voiced, is the trend of the government of this province—God, I hope it won't be there long—towards reverting to reprivatization in every field and to limit the amount of assistance that they are providing for needy persons in our society. The example of the family benefits I suppose is one, where they have been given an increase of eight or 10 per cent in something like three years while the cost of living has gone up more than 20 per cent.

With that kind of philosophy on the other side of the House I have some concern that that government might use this clause that has never been intended and hasn't been used for many years. There is a reversal of the social philosophy; whether it is the reduction of the property tax to our senior citizens, whether it is social assistance to those in need, there has been a reversal to a tremendous degree on that side of the House with regard to those principles.

I read in great detail the special program review when it was tabled in 1975, and the government seemed to like to give Mr. Henderson the credit for that reactionary document which would even go to the point of sterilizing welfare recipients. But the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) was chairman of the committee that produced that.

Mr. Laughren: That's the problem.

Mr. Swart: I find myself, quite frankly, in great difficulty with regard to voting on this issue. If we had a government on the other side of the House that was committed to humane principles and to equality, I would have no hesitation in voting to keep this section in.

Hon. Mrs. Birch: What a self-righteous character he is!

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Pompous, self-righteous, holier than thou.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Resign.

Mr. Swart: But with a government that is committed to the reverse, then I find myself in great difficulty. I guess between now and the time the vote is taken, I'll have to decide which way I'm going to vote.

Mr. Bradley: Vote with your heart now.

Mr. Martel: Freedom of speech.

Mr. Swart: I want to say in no uncertain terms that the principle embodied in this clause is something with which I agree, that parents take responsibility for their children. And with due respect to the member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Bounsall), I have no vested interest, I'm prematurely grey.

Mr. Ruston: That's telling them.

Mr. Swart: At a later stage in life, I think there is an obligation on children to take care of their parents when they are able to do so.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I want somebody to take care of me.

Mr. Martel: You need somebody to look after you.

Mr. Bradley: Good speech.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: My God, he is moving to the right.

Mr. Roy: I'm pleased to see that the member for Welland-Thorold has kept the same enthusiasm and sincerity he exhibited during the discussion of this clause before the committee studying the bill. As I recall at that time, good as his performance was this evening, he was even successful in convincing his colleague from Windsor-Sandwich, if I recall, to vote to retain the section in the bill.

Mr. Bounsall: That's right. I have regretted it ever since.

Mr. Roy: I think the member for Welland-Thorold has made a concise and compelling argument for retaining the section.

Mr. Bradley: At least compelling.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: You are losing control.

Mr. Martel: I lost the member for Ottawa East.

Mr. Roy: It's interesting that during the discussions before the committee the Attorney General at that time had expressed his personal opinion that it should be taken out, and some of his colleagues disagreed with him. Some of our colleagues on this side disagreed with him.

Mr. Martel: So you're with me after all.

Mr. Roy: I'm not sure if all my colleagues voted to retain it.

Mr. Martel: Yes, you don't legislate for a few.

Mr. Roy: Then the member for Welland-Thorold convinced a number of his colleagues, amongst others the member for Windsor-Sandwich, to vote to retain the section in the bill.

Mr. Haggerty: It must have taken some convincing to do that to his colleague.

Mr. Martel: Delete it; the Attorney General's first intuition was right.

Mr. Roy: I want to address myself to the concern of the Attorney General about this legislation. Let's be very clear. The principle, as elaborated in section 17, is not a new principle. It's been on the books, as the Attorney General has said, for quite a number of years. I'm not sure exactly how many but I would think for something over 50 years in this province.

Mr. Martel: It's time we got rid of it then.

Mr. Roy: I personally think it's a good principle, but as the Attorney General has expressed, it is the type of principle which can be abused. That is a concern expressed by all of us here. At least I have the satisfaction of thinking that while the principle has been on the books for so many years, it has not been abused.

Mr. Wildman: It hasn't been abused though.

Mr. Roy: It has been used but, to my knowledge, it has not been abused.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, it has.

Mr. Roy: I think there is some evidence to alleviate the concern of many members that this is going to be the big stick that people are going to use to say, "Your parents happen to be in an institution and therefore their responsibility is on you," when the children in those circumstances may have financial problems of their own. I have read many press comments—in fact, the leader of the third party has said that what this principle would lead to is in fact the impoverishment of many children in this province in the support of their parents. I say that's not so. The law has been on the books for a period of time and has not been abused.

I say to the Attorney General maybe we shouldn't have bothered to amend the Act and just kept the old Act—what was it, the Parents' Maintenance Act? We should have just kept that Act and we could have avoided, I suppose, the expenditure of a lot of time and effort and kept the principle on the books. I think there is some evidence that this principle in the last so many years has not been abused.

The second thing is that it is a principle I agree with. Apart from the circumstances mentioned by the member for Welland-Thorold, it's a principle I can see is needed, especially in rural areas where you have situations where parents owning a farm and so on make a gift to the children. It's unfortunate that we have them, but we do have circumstances where you get children whose moral obligation towards their parents disappears. You have situations—and I have experienced these situations in my practice—where they just leave the parents and say they are the responsibility of the state, in spite of the fact that the parents have provided for these children and have made important gifts of, for instance, a family farm or a means of support—a business and so on. You get children who then turn around and feel that they no longer have any obligation.

I am not primarily concerned about the fact that the state should be able to intervene—that bothers me, but I am more concerned about the fact that at least the principle is there and that a parent consulting counsel can have that principle on the books and then that legally and morally there would be that right of action on the part of the parents.

These would be exceptional circumstances but at least that right would be there—where you have unconscionable situations. Where children, for whatever reason, after having been given all of these things during their life and having had the family business or family farm for support, turn around and just leave their parents and feel they no longer have any obligation.

I would feel that a parent should at least have that right to consult counsel. If we take that principle away, I am concerned—and maybe you can be of assistance—if there is not proviso or clause within the granting of the business or the farm and so on, what right would a parent in those circumstances have? He wouldn't have any if it is the decision of this Legislature to take away that right, but the court would infer at that point that in our wisdom we felt that was not a principle we should have on our books. That would bother me, because I frankly think that there are unfortunately circumstances where actions on the part of children are unconscionable and they do have that responsibility.

We have laws, in fact, for the responsibility of parents towards their children. We know that is a responsibility that most parents in this province accept willingly, but there are circumstances, unfortunately, where that does not happen and we require legislation on the books—in fact, legislation in the Criminal Code—to make it clear that that is not only a moral obligation but a legal obligation.

I think the same thing would apply in these circumstances. I would hate to see the day when parents who have been mistreated—who have not received justice where children who had taken advantage of the kindness of a parent would turn against them—and the parents, desolate, had no means of support and could not legally as well as morally turn to the children and say, "You have an obligation, in view of what has happened." That is why I would like to keep that principle on the books.

We don't go and set criteria. All we do is state a principle here. I think it is a good principle and I think we should retain the legislation.

[10:15]

Mr. McClellan: I want to speak in support of the deletion of the amendment and try to set forth as social services critic for this caucus why we feel it is so important that this section be deleted.

The Attorney General himself has spoken well, I think, to the kind of interpersonal dilemmas that this amendment can lead to. I'm not reassured at all by the closing comments by the member for Ottawa East. He in a sense validated that concern by the kinds of illustrations he was using.

Aside from that I think the Attorney General addressed himself adequately to that dimension of the dilemma. There is another one. It's very important to me, and I think to this caucus, that these kinds of statutes, these kinds of laws which are based on out-moded social philosophy be removed from legislation because they serve to preserve inadequate social programs.

The social philosophy that is reflected in section 17 states that the child is responsible for the support of elderly people, that the family is the unit of society which is responsible for the provision, if you take it literally, not just of income maintenance but all of the other support services that the elderly need.

We live in a society where our gravest social crisis has to do with the elderly population. We have not even begun to experience the fullness of that social problem and we are already floundering around in our incapacity to deal with the needs of the elderly in this society on all levels, in terms of income support, in terms of residential services, in terms of health services and in terms of social support services of all kinds.

We haven't even begun to address ourselves to that problem. I think one of the reasons why we have failed so completely as a society to deal with the needs of the elderly is that we keep repeating to ourselves and enshrining in legislation social philosophies that bear no relationship to the realities. The reality is that the family cannot provide for the needs of the elderly in this kind of a society, and the needs extend far beyond the need for income.

The needs extend through a whole range of services. It serves no purpose to leave these delusional notions in legislation. We all share the sentiment that has been expressed. We all share a revulsion, each and every one of us shares a revulsion, at the individual child who abandons and treats badly the parent. Each of us realizes that that is sharper than a serpent's tooth, but that does not address itself to the needs of the elderly in the community.

I believe we do ourselves a disservice and we do the elderly a disservice when we do not recognize in law—and this is what we're talking about—the obligation of the total community to provide a total range of support to the elderly. I would hope we could remove this from the law so that we can then go forward with a clearer sense of where our responsibilities lie as a total community towards the needs of the community.

Mr. G. Taylor: I may be brief on this section to the delight of all my colleagues, but I too support the NDP in this situation, which may be unfortunate for my party on this side and my colleagues. When you look at section 17 and see what it does, you find it puts upon the minor that obligation to support his parents. When you extend it past there and look at some of the other provisions we have in this province, when we look at what takes place in the matrimonial situation where, even under some of our present legislation which might be termed social legislation, particularly in the field of the Family Benefits Act, the wife or spouse, as the case may be, seeks out support under those provisions of that Act and finds that she is met with some administrative situation whereby "you will not get support under that Act unless you take your husband or your spouse to court; before you receive our benefits, you apply and go this route." That's administratively done, and sure enough it may be correct or it may not be correct, but it says that before you get provisions from our society you will take this action on your own.

Here again, section 17 could provide, in the hands of administrative authority, that before the parent will receive the benefits from the state, before he will receive hospitalization, before he will go into one of our chronic care units, he is a parent so he will first seek out and sue his child for those benefits. Administratively done, yes, but it's there. It may not often be used in the Act presently in the province and in existence, but there is that possibility; you put in there something that we should be providing for our people in another form over the years, something for which they have contributed to the province.

Where there is a parent, and particularly an elderly one who may fall into this situation, I do not believe it is necessary for us to enforce in a statute those obligations upon a child to support that parent. Some parents should be entitled to it. It may be only at the senior years of their lives that they are entitled to it, but I think they should be entitled to expect something from the state. When we put in social legislation to provide for them at that end of their life spectrum, surely we should not be going back against their child or causing them to sue their children for support.

Indeed, I would support the provision that would delete this, and also leave in section 84 deleting the Parents' Maintenance Act. I support those provisions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bradley: Now what we need is the speech on OHIP increases.

Mr. Stong: Originally, I would have spoken for the deletion of this section. However, I've been persuaded by the eloquent argument of my colleague from Ottawa East—

An hon. member: He always does that.

Mr. Stong:—and I must say that in my respectful submission, the principle in law that is contained in section 17 ought to be retained in our statute. It recognizes an obligation which falls upon the duties of a parent to provide for a child. I suppose that if I were speaking against this section, I would have been persuaded by an argument that was brought to my attention by a mother whose husband has abandoned the family; she had become an indigent. Her very strong point was: "Why should my children be responsible for him because he did not provide for them in their youth?" That was a very persuasive argument and I agree with it. So I cannot speak of section 17 independently of an amendment that I would be moving to section 18.

Section 18, pursuant to my amendment, would require a court—in assessing any support that a child would be responsible to his parent for—take into account the duration and nature of care provided by that parent to that child in his minority. Having taken that into account, we still recognize a principle in our law—for the reasons laid out by my colleague from Ottawa East in such special circumstances—that that right ought to be retained in law. Maybe it has not been enforced recently, but it is there to cover specific situations.

In a situation where the enforcement of that principle would work a hardship, then my proposed amendment to section 18 would satisfy and alleviate any hardship that may be worked on a child.

So in my respectful submission, it is very dangerous to delete from this Act that principle which has been recognized in our statutes up to now and which, in fact, ought to be retained; and if this section is retained, I will be moving an amendment to section 18 that would perhaps take some of the onerous burden, and any of the inequities for hardship, off the shoulders of a child.

Ms. Bryden: I will be very brief. This section appears to me to be—among other sections that have crept into this Act—an effort by the government to shift back to the individual obligations which had been accepted by the state over the years on the ground of fairness and equity. Indigency among people is something that in most cases is beyond their control. It's often caused by sickness, by unemployment, by economic conditions, by the policies of the government, but it is not due to circumstances which either the parents or the children have control over. Therefore to put the obligation for support on to the children is hit-and-miss taxation and it is unfair taxation, because only those who happen to be in the circumstances where they have indigent parents are the ones who pay. It seems to me that to keep this kind of a law on the books is a backward step.

I think we should look at the reasons the Parents' Maintenance Act has fallen into disuse. I think most welfare administrators have found that it put an intolerable strain on family relationships to require parents to sue their children. I think most people recognize that the vast majority of children were not able to provide support for their parents.

It seems to me we should not pass a law to resurrect or to re-enact a law that has fallen into disuse, because it is not in tune with the modern thinking that we should all share the costs of looking after people who are subject to the misfortunes of life today.

Mr. McGuigan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to rise in support of retaining this section. It is difficult to add further argument, but for one whose philosophy is more towards the individual and less towards the state—

Mr. McClellan: Why don't you want to abolish old age pensions then?

Mr. McGuigan:—I would like to—

Mr. Sweeney: If we followed your argument, we would throw the whole bill out.

Mr. Cooke: You want regulation. You want to regulate everybody.

Mr. McGuigan:—I would like to argue in favour of individual responsibility. Being a farmer and not a lawyer, I am not acquainted with all the implications of this law but I look upon all laws as setting a standard that we expect people to adhere to. Only a very few of those people are ever brought into court or forced to do it, but through our laws, we set the social standards that we expect decent people to adhere to and follow. I would like to retain this in order to make it known that it is expected of people they help support their parents.

I can think of a specific instance that might be of concern, largely in the agricultural field where the amount of moneys involved in owning land are so great, and where ownership is such a part and cost of doing that farming, that family circumstances change. One or the other spouse may die and the remaining spouse remarry. You then have a different family situation and a different look towards the grandparents and so on, and this introduces a whole new order of things. So it would be that much more difficult to have family care for those parents if section 17 were withdrawn. On those few items, Mr. Chairman, I would like to urge support of the section.

Mr. Chairman: The question before the committee is shall section 17 stand as part of the bill?

All those in favour please say "aye."

All those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Bounsall: I assume it will be a free vote of all the members.

On motion by Hon. Mr. McMurtry, the committee of the whole House reported progress.

Report agreed to.

[10:30]

Mr. Speaker: A motion for adjournment has been deemed to have been made under provisional order 28(a). I will now recognize for up to five minutes the hon. member for Bellwoods.

MINI-SKOOKS LIMITED

Mr. McClellan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate very much the opportunity to have even a brief debate on this subject. What I want to do is not harangue the minister, or to give him perhaps a well-deserved tongue-lashing. What I want to do is to set before him the serious concern that we have about this matter.

On Thursday I raised a series of questions and presented some material to the minister, consisting of extracts from the financial report of Mini-Skooks Limited. It consisted of computer printouts; it was partial material from a document entitled Mini-Skooks Financial Report. I had given the minister some excerpts of that series of documents which had come into my possession which covered a few brief periods for the years 1976 and 1977.

The issue of great concern to us has to do with the presence of Mini-Skooks Limited in Ontario. Mini-Skooks is a subsidiary of the Great-West Life Insurance Company; it is a multinational corporation and operates a chain of day-care centres across North America. Six of them are here in Metropolitan Toronto. Our objection—and our bias, so there is no misunderstanding—is to the existence of this model of providing human care services. I believe and this caucus believes that it is incompatible with quality human care services to have it provided by a multinational corporation whose motive is not care, whose motive rather is profit. Its motive is profit; it is a subsidiary of a profit-making multinational; and that's what it is in business to do—to make profit.

We have expressed concern over the years about the operation of Mini-Skooks. Those concerns I don't believe have been adequately acknowledged.

On Thursday I presented to the minister documentation which indicated a number of serious problems within the operation of Mini-Skooks. I had asked the minister not to give me a quick reply; I had asked the minister to review the material. But, more importantly, I had asked the minister to use his powers under the Act to obtain the complete information—the entire package, whatever it is, of enrolment data and financial material that is contained within the Mini-Skook computer, among other places, and to study that material. I indicated to him on the basis of the material that I had, and which I had given to him, that there were serious irregularities indicated with respect to enrolment; that there was evidence in nine out of 34 periods—and a period for Mini-Skooks' purposes is a four-week period, the year being divided into 13 periods—at six centres, there was over-enrolment. I indicated some of those periods to the minister today in question period.

There was further indication of violation of the child-staff ratios in the very limited material which I provided.

My concern is that the minister has not done the kind of review that was asked for. The minister is aware that there is an injunction against the publication of this material. That puts a special onus on the minister, because the press will not report the contents of this material and it is not available to the normal kind of public scrutiny.

The questions raised will only be resolved if the minister does what he is responsible to do as the minister responsible for the welfare of kids in this province, which is to obtain all of the material from Mini-Skooks, the complete set of computer printouts from the Mini-Skooks' financial report for the period that it is available, which I believe is from 1975 to the present, and to scrutinize that material and determine whether there has been a violation of the Day Nurseries Act and regulations.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I might say at the outset that I have no misapprehensions with respect to the point on which the hon. member was objecting. He indicates that he objects to the particular model for the delivery of service in the province of Ontario, particularly one which might involve some degree of profit in the delivery of service. I understand his obsession with this particular model.

Mr. McClellan: It's called the social industrial complex.

Hon. Mr. Norton: But if I might address myself for a moment to the specifics of the hon. member's allegations, I would point out first of all that he is in error—to the best of my knowledge, on the basis of the documents he has submitted to me—when he refers to them as a financial report. In fact, what the documents indicate to me are that they are operating statements.

Mr. McClellan: You are wrong.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Also, a repeated error that occurs in terms of the assumptions that have been made in the interpretation of these documents, and in particular in the marginal notations—the marginal notations in the documents, in an unknown person's handwriting include such words as “fraud” or “fraudulent;” and I don't know who wrote those into the margins of these documents—is the assumption that the figures that are shown are profit. In fact, what they appear to be is net income; that's quite a different matter from net profit.

The hon. member's dissatisfaction with my reply in the House earlier seems to be that he assumed that I had failed to inquire completely or even partially into the material that had been submitted by him. Had he asked whether or not I had referred this material for review, my answer would have been emphatically yes. I reviewed this material and so did my staff. In fact, I referred it not only to the day nurseries branch of my ministry but also to the legal services branch of my ministry, and it was thoroughly reviewed by both.

With respect to the staffing ratios at Mini-Schools—which do affect the welfare of children—I have indicated that from time to time our field supervisors did find more children present in some rooms than the space requirements would permit. I have also indicated that at Tuxedo Court a conditional licence was issued in 1975 with respect to staffing.

Mini-Schools were required to hire more staff, and they did so.

We have carefully checked the actual enrolments shown in the documents provided to us, and our review indicates there was an over-enrolment of two at the Queensview Centre for the period in 1977 for which the documentation was provided. In 1976 for one period there were no over-enrolments. For the second period, one centre, Kingsview No. 1, was over-enrolled by 13. Provided that appropriate staff ratios are maintained, nurseries can over-enrol to take into account absences that may occur. If there is space for 150 children, for example, and 10 per cent are regularly absent on any one day, a nursery may wish to enrol up to 165 children. In fact, a 10 per cent over-enrolment is modest because the average absenteeism in day nurseries in this province is 17 per cent on any given day. In this way there can be a higher utilization of facilities, than if the enrolment and capacity are maintained at the same level.

As I stated previously, there has not been an enrolment in excess of licensed capacity at any time when our inspection visits have been made.

Mr. McClellan: But that speaks about your inspections.

Hon. Mr. Norton: As I indicated earlier in the House, we have had probably in excess of 25 inspections of the nurseries in question over the past two or three years. Our great concern is that appropriate staff ratios be maintained and this has not always happened.

Mr. Cassidy: Oh now, wait a minute. Get it straight. Which side are you on?

Hon. Mr. Norton: But where there have been inadequacies detected they have always been corrected with this particular operation.

With respect to the financial data supplied by the hon. member, I previously indicated that per diem rates have been negotiated by the—

Mr. McClellan: Justify 26 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister's time has expired.

Mr. Cassidy: About time too.

Hon. Mr. Norton: May I just indicate that the financial negotiations are a matter between Metro and the contract providers, and at the present time it is my understanding that that matter is under review by Metro and we are awaiting the results of that; although the information the hon. member has submitted indicates no improprieties at this point.

Mr. McClellan: Twenty-six per cent isn't objectionable to you at all?

Hon. Mr. Norton: The assumption of 36 per cent is based on misapprehension. As I pointed out to you earlier—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. minister's time has expired.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —if you people would understand what a balance sheet is you wouldn't make these errors. Dig a little deeper, and before you have somebody steal further information check on the accuracy of it.

Mr. McClellan: Point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: There is no such thing as a point of privilege in the late show.

Mr. McClellan: He accused me of asking somebody to steal something.

Mr. Speaker: There is no such thing as a point of privilege in the late show. You may raise it tomorrow if you wish.

Mr. McClellan: Why is that?

Ms. Gigantes: I don't understand.

Mr. McClellan: Cheap son of a bitch.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Oh, you're such a genteel type.

OTTAWA PSYCHIATRIC FACILITIES

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, the last time the Minister of Health attempted to insult me personally was on the question of Ottawa area nursing homes and was last July. I doubt that he would, based on what he now knows on that subject, take that stance again on that particular subject.

Yesterday, he accused me of being stuffed up because I made a serious comment about his attitude towards a question posed by a member of the official opposition concerning the health of pregnant women and their unborn children.

I proceeded to ask another serious question: Is he ready to respond to the serious criticism of the director of forensic services and the director of psychiatric services at the Royal Ottawa Hospital that his May 1977 promises of funding for improved facilities and services in the field of psychiatric services in the Ottawa area have not been initiated?

I wonder if this Minister of Health has ever experienced the realities of having to send an underpaid constituency office staff person out to spend six hours with a justice of the peace, a police team, a hospital's admission staff, the staff psychiatrist, because a young constituent with an anguishing record of mental health problems was believably threatening violence to himself and other members of his family. I have and I was lucky. My constituent manager was good; the police were good; the JP was good, and the psychiatrists were good. That was just the beginning of a problem and we are not always so lucky.

The final outcome of such cases can be tragic. Last week in Ottawa two sisters, 12 years and 15 years old, were murdered. The person now charged with that murder is their 16-year-old brother. One and a half years ago that brother was admitted to the Royal Ottawa Hospital after a knife attack on a neighbour. The people responsible for his release from his second stay at the ROH were Dr. Selwyn Smith, chief of forensic services, and Dr. Gerald Sawyer-Foner who is the chief of psychiatric services at the ROH.

What they are saying now, in very simple terms, is that we do not have provincial funding in the Ottawa-Carleton area, or indeed in the eastern Ontario area, for decent psychiatric facilities, decent psychiatric treatment or decent psychiatric follow-up care for the people in our communities—and they are right to be angry.

In the fall of 1975 and the spring of 1976 I wrote to the member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. J. Taylor), then the Minister of Community and Social Services, pleading for the continuation of funding for a project in Ottawa called the Mental Health Rehabilitation Centre. It was a good program and it was succeeding in its goal of providing follow-up psychiatric services for people who had been released from psychiatric institutions—services so excellent that the rate of re-institutionalization of its clients was dramatically lower than for other ex-psychiatric inmates. The Mental Health Rehab Centre folded on March 31, 1977. The reason: There was no commitment from Community and Social Services for provincial funding.

I speak now to the Minister of Health, but I quote the executive director of the Ottawa-Carleton regional health planning council when he says, "When you have to deal with more than one ministry, you've got twice as many problems." Let me illustrate the dilemma of the health planning council right now in Ottawa. Their request of over a year ago for a medium-security forensic unit at the Royal Ottawa Hospital lies waiting for approval. There is still a total lack of follow-up care in an area where over 1,000 people who have been residents of psychiatric institutions are released every year.

We are in trouble in Ottawa and in eastern Ontario, and the minister, even after our questions yesterday in the House, accuses the leader of our party in these words, "It's the cheapest kind of politics for him to raise the issue. That's typical of Cassidy to try and cash in on the miseries and sorrow of some people."

Mr. Wildman: Cheap shot.

An hon. member: Not so cheap.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, I don't think that kind of answer is really adequate from our Minister of Health.

Mr. Deans: You do your job.

Ms. Gigantes: This issue has focused in a particularly horrifying way in the Ottawa area over the last few days, and I think we deserve a better response from the Minister of Health.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Lighren: Start by apologizing.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has already explained, she brought to the attention of the House yesterday the tragic murder last week of two members of an Ottawa family and the fact that the alleged suspect who was charged was a member of that family. The member then asked if I was prepared to respond to the criticism that there are inadequate psychiatric facilities in the Ottawa area.

The teenaged boy is alleged to have murdered his sisters last week after discharge from the adolescent unit in the Royal Ottawa Hospital on January 27, 1978. We have been in touch with the hospital today and we were told that on discharge the boy was placed in an outpatient program and had two treatment sessions a week. On the very day the offence was committed he was seen by a member of the treatment team and appeared, in the words of one of the staff of that team, to be happy.

Lack of facilities was not a problem in this particular case. He has been under a continuous form of treatment for the past few years. He obviously did not respond to that treatment. We always hear about the small number of cases that go wrong but nothing about the—

Mr. Cassidy: You don't know.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell:—vast majority of people who are helped. This point was emphasized today by the director of psychiatric services at the Royal Ottawa Hospital. At present there are 13 forensic beds in Royal Ottawa in an unlocked setting. The only locked facilities in the province are at Oak Ridges division of Penetanguishene Mental Health Centre, a special unit for women at St. Thomas Psychiatric Hospital and the recently created Metfors unit at Queen Street Mental Health Centre here in Toronto.

My ministry, along with Correctional Services, the Attorney General and Community and Social Services, received a proposal from the University of Ottawa some time ago requesting a forensic unit for the Ottawa area.

Mr. Cassidy: And before the election you reacted positively.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: That is not true.

Mr. Cassidy: That is what they told me.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I don't care what they told you.

Mr. Cassidy: The ministry was being very positive at that time.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Let me finish this and I will deal with the interjections which are based on total fabrications from somebody.

This proposal requested a new building to house a 40-bed unit situated on the grounds of the Royal Ottawa Hospital. We received some preliminary figures. Members of my staff had a meeting with the group from Ottawa and advised the group to try to obtain some firmer figures regarding construction and operating costs, and to proceed through the district health council so that the project could be prioritized.

Ms. Gigantes: A year ago.

Mr. Cassidy: In January 1977.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to finish the answer.

It is my understanding that the district health council has approved the proposal in principle only, since they feel that firmer figures and costs are required. That is where the forensic unit for the Ottawa region stands at this point in time—still with the district health council.

Ms. Gigantes: Oh, come on.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Regarding other psychiatric beds in the Ottawa-Carleton region, there are 277 beds in total, 30 at the Montfort Hospital, 40 at Ottawa Civic, 40 at Ottawa General, 28 at Queensway-Carleton, 139 at the Royal Ottawa, including the 13 forensic beds which I just referred to, for a total of 277. There are, additionally, 460 beds in Brockville Psychiatric Hospital, which, although 70 miles distant, had in the first two months of this year 38 patients admitted from the Ottawa-Carleton region. The breakdown was as follows: from 15 to 35 years of age, 14 patients; from 35 to 55 years of age, 10 patients; and 55 years of age and older, 14.

Mr. Cassidy: You are wrapped in statistics and can't see the problem.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: As well as the forensic unit program, another high-priority is a psycho-geriatric program in the Ottawa area.

Mr. Cassidy: You're convinced by all that.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: You just babble. I've listened to you babble for six and a half years. You never ever listen. You couldn't care less about stats, let alone people.

Mr. Cassidy: You were wrong yesterday and you're wrong today.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: As priorities are brought to our attention by the district health council, my ministry will endeavour to satisfy the most important needs.

Mr. Laughren: That's your answer? You didn't even apologize.

Mr. Cassidy: You should resign for that answer.

Mr. Speaker: I deem the motion to adjourn to have been carried.

The House adjourned at 10:52 p.m.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1978

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Renwick: Maybe we should have had a special prayer for the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) this morning. It could work a change of heart.

APOLOGY FOR REMARKS

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, may I have a point of privilege? I would like to apologize to you and to the House for my unparliamentary remarks during the adjournment debate on Tuesday.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON COMPANY LAW

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, as you know, it was our plan to spend the morning in committee of the whole to complete Bill 59. The chairman of the select committee on company law indicates that that committee would like to continue meeting this morning. I am prepared with your permission to put a motion to the House authorizing the select committee on company law to meet this morning.

Mr. Nixon: That's going to be in Toronto, is it?

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that the select committee on company law be authorized to meet concurrently with the House this morning.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

FAMILY LAW REFORM ACT

(concluded)

Resumption of the adjournment debate in committee of the whole House on Bill 59, An Act to reform the Law respecting Property Rights and Support Obligations between Married Persons and in other Family Relationships.

On section 18:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moves that subsection 3 of section 18 of the bill be struck and the following substituted therefor:

“(3) An application for an order for the support of a dependant who is a spouse or a child may be made by

“(a) the Ministry of Community and Social Services in the name of the minister, or

“(b) a municipal corporation including a metropolitan district or regional municipality but not including an area municipality thereof, if the ministry or municipality is providing a benefit under the Family Benefits Act or assistance under the General Welfare Assistance Act in respect of the support of the dependant.”

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The proposed amendment allows the ministry or municipality to institute a support claim simply for a child as well as a spouse where the family is receiving welfare or family benefits. The child must be one who is under 18 and who may claim support under section 16, and I want to emphasize the fact that this amendment does not affect the rights of handicapped persons over the age of 18. It's simply to allow the ministry or the municipal corporation to make an application which they can now do for a spouse; but where the spouse has a child or children who are receiving this assistance, it seems to make sense that that claim would be included as well. It does not go beyond that.

Mr. McClellan: I really have a question to the Attorney General, if I may. Generally, I think the amendment makes sense and the overall section is an improvement over the situation that exists now. I have only one concern and I'm not sure how to solve that. It seems to me that the section as it now stands would permit the ministry to make an application for support on behalf of a recipient without any obligation on the part of the Ministry of Community and Social Services to inform the social allowance recipient that this is a condition of receiving social allowance.

I would like some assurance that this would not be done without the knowledge of an applicant for family benefits, because there are more than a few individuals who have refused to apply for family benefits because they were not willing to have a support order obtained. That's their choice. I think that choice has to be preserved and I would hope there would be an automatic procedure of advising an applicant that this is what the law requires, that this is a condition. I don't know how that's addressed. Perhaps the Attorney General has some suggestions on that.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I think I understand what's on the hon. member's mind. I would think any amendment would require an amendment to the necessary family welfare assistance legislation rather than to this Act. Certainly, in so far as this legislation is concerned, such an application could only be made with notice to the dependant. Of necessity, the dependant would have to have notice of the application. I don't see how the application could be made without that notice. In other words, as I understand the legislation, it would be impossible to process a claim without notice to the applicant.

Mr. Bounsall: I'm not sure the Attorney General is right on that point. Maybe he could seek some advice from his staff. It is the Ministry of Community and Social Services in the case of the deserting husband that knows the record of that person's lack of payments if the family is on family benefits. If the woman and children are on family benefits and the support being paid is less than required under family benefits, the woman and her children do not know whether or not he is living up to the agreement at all. His contribution comes through the courts and is paid to the Community and Social Services, so the ministry is the only one that would know whether it's in arrears and whether it needs to take him back to court.

If not, it's quite conceivable that it would not be necessary at all to involve the woman and the children because they're not even aware how much in arrears or how continuous are his payments. Only this ministry is and it is the one concerned about the back collection. It seems to me there is no need for the ministry to unduly concern itself in informing the woman. I would say it wouldn't be necessary at all and the ministry wouldn't be concerned about her not knowing. As a matter of courtesy it could, but it is not involved in the woman or the children in the court case because they don't even know what the arrearage is.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: There's a fundamental element of proof. It would be impossible for the ministry to prove their claim without the involvement of the dependant. There's no question in my mind about that. It's a matter of basic legal proof and it would be impossible to prove it without establishing the fact of the dependant. As a rule, that can only be done with the involvement of the dependant. That's a clear matter of legal proof. If you would consult with any of your legal colleagues, the members for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor) or Riverdale (Mr. Renwick), they would confirm that legal view.

In any event, I can assure the members that the rules that are being developed will also involve the requirement of notice to the dependant, if that will be of any assistance. The rules in relation to this Act are being pretty well completed and they do involve the requirement of notice to the dependant. I give that assurance but, quite apart from that, it would be impossible to prove the claim without the involvement of the dependant.

Mr. Bounsall: Just continuing on that point, I don't know whether the Attorney General realizes it or not, and I don't want to go on on this point at any length at all, but all of the proof resides in the ministry and none of the proof resides in the hands of the dependant in these cases.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: But you have to prove the dependency and the ministry can't do that except on evidence which would be clearly hearsay. You have to start from the facts of the dependency.

Mr. Bounsall: The ministry clearly has that proof or it wouldn't be continuing the mother on her mother's allowance and providing coverage for her children. They have accepted that proof. They are in constant monthly contact with that family to ensure that all the children are still living at home and the mother has not taken a part-time job which would lessen the amount of the benefit coming out of the family benefits. They would handle all that proof on a continuing month-to-month basis.

I am not arguing that it would be nice to involve them or not nice to involve them, but the ministry has all that proof. It can say in court, "Mrs. So-and-so does reside at this address. We send her her monthly family cheques for herself and her three children."

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: That is known in law as hearsay evidence and inadmissible in a court of law under our general rules of the introduction of evidence. I appreciate the member's concern but really that is a fundamental matter of proof in a courtroom. True, the ministry has the evidence, but again what is admissible in court and what the ministry has relied on are two different things.

Mr. McClellan: With respect to my concern, I accept the Attorney General's notion that an amendment is appropriately made to the family benefits legislation and general welfare assistance. I do want to restate the concern though that the section removes the right of decision of the dependants by virtue of making an application for social assistance. Just the act of making an application for social assistance then gives the power of decision to the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Norton). It's essential that at the time of the application, the applicant clearly understands what's involved. I would ask the Attorney General to make a point of advising the Minister of Community and Social Services so that he can bring in necessary amending legislation.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: That's fine, I will discuss that with him. But again the applicant could frustrate any application in the court simply by refusing to co-operate, for the reasons I have just explained to your colleague.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I don't think I need to speak at length. What I was concerned about was, it seemed to me that the hon. member for Bellwoods had made a point which was not really being addressed by his colleague. That was the right of notice advice at the time of the application. I think it is important that this should be very carefully spelled out to anyone seeking any assistance, either under family benefits or under general welfare assistance.

However, I concur in what the Attorney General has said with reference to the proof of any case and the evidence which is necessary. It is true, however, that on the non-payment aspect of it, it is a fact that only those providing the assistance know the record of payment or otherwise. Apart from that, of course, the other evidence has to be adduced in order to make a successful application, I would think. So I am satisfied now with the explanations.

Mr. Bounsall: My concern about this section is of another nature and again a minor one. I understand why we have to have this amendment by the Attorney General. In our efforts in committee to ensure we weren't excluding the disabled from their benefit when they reached age 18, we had it left in this funny situation where only the Ministry of Community and Social Services or the municipal corporation could go after the spouse's support if they were in receipt of those benefits. Where there were children as part of that support, the ministry or the corporation could not go after the support for the children. So this is a very necessary one.

But in the way it's written, I have some concern that we may have opened a slight doorway, I don't know how wide, to pursue the other matter. I talked with the Assistant Deputy Minister of Community and Social Services, Mr. Anderson, quite recently over this. His thought was that it wouldn't normally be pursued by his ministry because he knows the intent of what it is we are trying to achieve. But he himself wasn't sure that there wasn't a doorway left open. He said that perhaps this section should very clearly read that the children we are talking about in the section are the children of the spouse who is receiving family benefits or the welfare award.

Perhaps in the last line, instead of just saying "dependant," to be absolutely sure we should say "in respect of the support of the spouse and the children of that spouse," rather than just leaving it as "dependant." It is then quite clear that in a family benefits application we are talking about the spouse and the children of that spouse, rather than leaving it simply as "spouse and child," lest in some circumstances we are leaving the door slightly ajar again.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: You say an application for an order for the support of a dependant who is a spouse or a child of that spouse? I have no objection to that if it will be of some assistance. Perhaps I might just consult with legislative counsel for one moment. I am quite prepared to amend that in that respect.

Mrs. Campbell: Could I ask when the Attorney General is speaking to his advisers if he would check to see what effect that amendment would have on section 16. I would have some concern with reference to section 16(2) unless I am misunderstanding the suggestion of the member for Windsor-Sandwich. I wonder if that could be clarified.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Could I have your indulgence for a moment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Bounsall: Perhaps in the interregnum period here I could address some comments to the last question from the member for St. George. I assume it is the child between 16 and 18 about whom she is concerned. By definition under that section 16(2), it is a child who has withdrawn from parental control. I am not sure what her concern is, but should we be going after a parent for support of a child who has withdrawn from parental control? I don't see that as being a reasonable application. The child has withdrawn from parental control and left the home. Why should welfare then go after the parent for support from the parent for that child who has clearly cut the ties with the parent?

Mrs. Campbell: This is a strange way to proceed in the House, I suspect, on a bill. What I am saying is that as I read it, and the Attorney General may be able to clarify it, if you remove the word "dependant" and simply make it "child," then I think it does have an effect on section 16(2). The child who removes himself or herself from the home is still a child of the parent, although not within section 16(2) a dependant. That's what I am trying to clarify with the Attorney General's assistance.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I gather the concern of the member for St. George is over what happens if we amend section 18(3).

Mrs. Campbell: If I may, I would think we would have to amend subsection 2 in order to give effect to subsection 3; am I correct?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Clearly the intent of the legislation is not to pursue, as I understand it, a spouse for support of a child over the age of 16 years who has withdrawn from parental control. That child or that young person between 16 and 18 may qualify for social assistance in his or her own right. I'll wait to see what our advisers have to say. I wouldn't have thought that an amendment to make it clear that we're talking about a child of the spouse would affect section 16, but you may be right.

Mrs. Campbell: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I'd just like to explain. It seems to me that what is being sought here is an amendment to subsection 2, which as I see it would read roughly, "An application for an order for the support of a dependant may be made by the dependant or a parent of a child under subsection 3." Then you would amend subsection 3, "An application for an order for the support of a dependant who is a spouse," and then you would introduce the word "child."

I am concerned that there may be confusion if you substitute "child" for "dependant" in that clause, because what I'm saying is it might then—reverting to 2, which spells out the dependency, as it were, of the child—be removed unless we have a very carefully worded amendment. That is my only concern.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I don't think there's any intention to remove the word "dependant."

Mrs. Campbell: I see.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: As I understand it, the phrase is simply to be, after the word

"child," "a dependant who is a spouse or a child."

Mrs. Campbell: Well, that is the intent.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: We just wanted to insert the words "of the spouse" after the word "child." So it will read; "An application for an order for the support of a dependant who is a spouse or a child of the spouse may be made by."

Mr. Bounsall: That certainly was the intent.

Mrs. Campbell: As long as it's clarified.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: So perhaps we could insert those words in, Mr. Chairman, the words "of the spouse" to follow "dependant who is a spouse or a child of the spouse may be made by."

Mr. Chairman: Is it agreeable to the committee to include the words "of the spouse" after the word "child" in the second line of subsection 3?

Mr. Lawlor: I hate to prolong the agony, but perhaps it should be "dependent child of the spouse," for the very reason that Margaret's making here.

Ms. Gigantes: Excellent suggestion.

Mr. Lawlor: A judge would, of course, construe the clause subject to subsection 2 of 16.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Yes.

Mr. Lawlor: But if they didn't happen to advert to that they would then bring in any child and what you want is a specific sort of child.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Could we put the word "dependent" in then?

Mr. Chairman: So subsection 3 would then commence reading as follows: "An application for an order for the support of a dependant who is a spouse or a dependent child of the spouse may be made by" et cetera.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Roy: The member for York Centre (Mr. Stong), who is not here, had an amendment to section 18 (5), clause (p) or (q). I think it's (q).

Mr. Chairman: I have it in my hand here now.

Mr. Roy: I have been asked by my colleague, Mr. Stong, to move this amendment.

[10:30]

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Roy moves that subsection 5 of section 18 of the bill be amended by relettering clause (p) as clause (q) and by inserting the following new clause: "(p) where the dependant is a parent, the duration and nature of the care and support provided by the dependant to the respondent."

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, of course this amendment is contingent on section 17 carrying. In other words, that the amendment that has been proposed by—I am not sure who—I think it is the member for Windsor-Sandwich, his amendment was we strike out section 17 of the bill. Of course, this amendment is contingent on his amendment being defeated.

It is hard to judge exactly which way that amendment is going to go in view of the fact that there appears that there is no unanimity as to whether there will be that principle of support or we carry on with the obligation of a child to support a parent. Anyway, Mr. Stong's concern was that if section 17 remains in the bill that there be this clause in the subsection 5 of section 18 so that that would be one of the criteria that the court look at in judging any support flowing from a child to a parent.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, in the debate that took place on the amendment to section 17 the other evening, and even this morning, it has to be clear that a lot of the concern of the members to section 17 was that the state initiate proceedings against a child on behalf of a parent. I think it should be very clear that under section 18 that is not possible. I did not speak to it when we were talking about the amendment, but it is very clear under section 18, subsection 3—the amendment has been accepted—that the state cannot initiate proceedings or applications on behalf of a parent vis-à-vis a child. Nevertheless, my colleague not being here, I move that amendment on his behalf.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Chairman, I am having difficulty understanding the exact intent which the member for Ottawa East is trying to attach to this amendment. Am I correct in understanding that it has to do with the clauses that we have been dealing with in 17 and in 18(3)? Is it 17 you are trying to relate it to?

Mr. Roy: Possibly I can explain it again to the member for Carleton East. If the amendment, as proposed by your colleague from Windsor-Sandwich is defeated, and we keep section 17—which reads that the child "who is not a minor has an obligation to provide support, in accordance with need, for his or her parent who has cared for and provided support for the child, to the extent that the child is capable of doing so"—if that section remains, Mr. Stong, my colleague, felt that when the court is looking at various criteria for determining support, the amount of support and this type of thing, there should be a clause in there saying that if the dependant is a parent, the duration and nature of the care and support provided by the dependant to the respondent be one of the factors that the court look at in determining whether there should be support and, secondly, what the amount of support should be.

As I say, I am moving it on behalf of my colleague. It may be that on reading section 17 my colleague may well feel it is not necessary, because in section 17 we talk about the fact that there is a need on the part of the parent that he or she has been provided support in any event. My colleague thought that it was necessary and on his behalf I moved it. Do you understand?

Ms. Gigantes: I believe I do now, thank you. Mr. Chairman, as I now have it explained to me and as I believe I understand it, correctly, what we are dealing with here is the very essence of the problem of section 17 and I would like to point out to members of this Legislature that this kind of an amendment makes it so clear why we should get rid of the obligations imposed under section 17, and why our amendment on section 17 should carry.

What the hon. member for Ottawa East is proposing is a new conduct clause. It is a conduct clause that relates to parents. Now we shall ask ourselves, "Have these people been good parents? For how long have they been good parents? And what kind of parental care did they provide?" It's precisely because you have to get into this kind of nonsense when you discuss the obligations under section 17 and we begin developing a new conduct clause—yet another for this bill—that I would suggest that it provides an argument for our amendment to section 17. I can't support the addition of another conduct clause to this bill. I just point out to the hon. member for Ottawa East that this amendment points to the real need for supporting the previous amendment to section 17.

Mr. Roy: All my colleague had in mind in moving this amendment was to look at duration; it is not wanting to establish new conduct. In fact, section 17 talks about "his or her parent who has cared for and provided support for the child." The principle is already established there and all my colleague is talking about is the duration and nature of care and support provided by the dependant. It is not showing anything different from the principle that is established in section 17. I want to make it clear as well that, obviously, if section 17 doesn't carry, this amendment would be redundant.

Mr. Renwick: I have a feeling that probably it is not in order, because the phraseology in section 17, "who has cared for and provided support for the child," is the same thing, and I think the member for Ottawa East agrees.

Mr. Roy: You may be right. Look, I gave an undertaking to my colleague that I would move his amendment. Don't be unduly harsh.

Mr. Foulds: He should be here to take the flak himself.

Mr. Chairman: Any further comments? If there are no further comments, are you ready for the motion?

Shall the amendment carry?

Mrs. Campbell: With respect, Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Earlier on in dealing with this bill—

Ms. Gigantes: In the middle of a vote?

Mr. McClellan: In the middle of a vote?

Mrs. Campbell:—we refused to stack certain motions or questions because of the implications. If we are putting this particular amendment in the absence of the determination of the motion under section 17, I don't know where we are heading. This is a redundancy of the section 17 vote.

Mr. Chairman: Order. I have already put the motion.

All those in favour will please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

The motion is defeated.

Ms. Gigantes moves that in subsection 6 of section 18 all the words after "spouse" in the second line be deleted.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Chairman, in beginning to discuss this amendment which is, to my mind, one of the more important points in the bill before us, I would like to refer you back to this clause in its previous form in Bill 59. Originally, the clause—it was numbered section 18, subsection 5—read as follows: "The obligation to provide support exists without regard to the conduct of the spouse requiring the support, but the court may limit the amount of support, having regard to a course of conduct that is an obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship."

What we are dealing with here, and what we had originally before us, was a clause which allows the courts to decide how much support shall be provided to a dependant and to take into account conduct. The Attorney General, when he presented this clause to the justice committee in a previous hearing, argued that the phrase "regard to a course of conduct that is an obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship" was a reference to "gross and obvious conduct."

We had a discussion of that previously, in which I spoke to the Attorney General and told him of my feeling that there's a great difference between "course of conduct that is an obvious and gross repudiation" and "gross and obvious conduct." Many of the examples he cited to try to reassure us about the application of this clause by the courts, were from English law and involved the use of the phrase in English law "gross and obvious conduct." What we had before us initially was not "gross and obvious conduct" but "obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship."

I make that point because I think it's an important point to know that what we are writing into this law, and what we were presented with first, is not a precedent that we have long experience with in the English system. This is a new kind of phraseology, and it's a phraseology that concerns me. I'm not happy, either, with the phraseology "gross and obvious conduct," but "obvious and gross repudiation" is even less assured of interpretation than is "gross and obvious conduct."

When we come to the bill now before us, as amended by the justice committee, we find that a new section has been added that allows the court to consider not only the conduct of the dependant in an application, but also the conduct of the respondent, the person who will provide support. The clause before us now reads: "The obligation to provide support for a spouse exists without regard to the conduct of either spouse but the court may, in determining the amount of support, have regard to a course of conduct that is so unconscionable as to constitute an obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship." That extra amendment too, I'll draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, which came from the justice committee, reads, "a course of conduct so unconscionable as to constitute an obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship."

It's obvious that those two amendments—the addition of "either spouse" and the addition of "so unconscionable as to constitute an obvious and gross repudiation"—which passed the justice committee are obvious evidence to me and should be to this House, I think, that the justice committee in its long consideration of this particular clause, now numbered section 18(6), was anxious about what the interpretation of this clause by the courts would be. There was anxiety there, and it's reflected in the amendments that we have incorporated in the section before us right now.

I think that anxiety is a well-placed anxiety. One of the reasons I feel that way is that when discussion first began on this section of the bill when I was on the justice committee back in the early part of 1977—

Mr. Lawlor: In 1953.

Ms. Gigantes: —when we discussed this particular clause, and I asked about how the Attorney General thought the courts would interpret the clause, he provided me first of all with a written example from an Ontario court case, a divorce proceeding and an application for support and a counter-petition. I was not convinced by his example—if he considered that example to be a good example of how very carefully the courts would consider the matter of conduct before making it a major determination in a support application.

It was an example that disturbed me very much. It was an example of a marriage of some length, an application by the wife for divorce and support and a counter-petition by the husband claiming that she had entered into a relationship with another man. I did not see from the facts presented about that case by the Attorney General just how this was going to be a very carefully worked use of this very delicate phrase, "obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship."

Once again, it seemed to me in that case what we were dealing with was an examination of the behaviour of one party. It will always be a problem in cases such as this one to try to deal with behaviour by either party because the person whose behaviour will be examined carefully, scrutinized, analyzed and judged will be the applicant. That's the nature of support application. As the hon. member for Ottawa East likes to say, that's the way the real world operates.

Mr. Roy: Not always.

Ms. Gigantes: Not always, but far too often. In any case, the example provided immediately, back in that early consideration by the Attorney General, was not to me a reassuring one. My concern is a general concern that this kind of clause leaves open the door for judges in the court to make judgements concerning what constitutes appropriate behaviour, particularly by a wife. It's a kind of way in which judges could be allowed in Ontario to continue the tradition of accepting and perhaps even reinforcing the old double standard as is applied to judgements on behaviour of men compared to women.

I think there are enough examples currently of the effects of this kind of double standard and the propensity of some of our judges, not only in this jurisdiction but in others in the English law system, to exercise a double standard of judgement on behaviour that one has to be concerned. One has to ask oneself why we continue to perpetuate an opening in our law where judges may exercise a double standard. The Attorney General later provided members of the committee and in subsequent discussions since this past Christmas a long list—I think there were about 10 cases in total—of case studies involving gross and obvious conduct as a factor in support.

Those cases were not very reassuring to me either. One, I recall in particular, was a case of a wife who refused to reside in the home that her husband had purchased. The judge decided that her behaviour constituted a gross and obvious repudiation of the relationship in spite of the fact that she had not been consulted about the house. She didn't know which house he was buying. She had not approved. She had not been asked by him whether it was an acceptable house. When she decided she wasn't going to live in that house for what she felt were good reasons, the judge decided that she had in a gross and obvious way repudiated their relationship.

I will read you one little note which my colleague from Lakeshore gave to me just this past month, in February 1978. It's a news story from London, England, and I am going to read it for two reasons: one, because this tends to be a heavy discussion in general and, two, because I think it points to what I am talking about when I talk about the double standard, and to my concern that this legislation with this clause 18(6) in it still permits judges to enforce a double standard. It's a news story, a CP news story from London, England, and the headline is "Sex Life Lag Not a Reason for Divorce." The article goes as follows:

"A wife who complained that her husband had not made love to her for 10 years was refused a divorce when Mr. Justice John Balcombe ruled that this was not grounds for ending the marriage.

"Iris Crafer, 46, of Forest Gate, London, complained that her husband was selfish, unsociable, lacked ambition and did not help with the gardening or home decorating.

"But Mr. Justice Balcombe in the High Court family division said the wife had 'blown up trivialities into major issues'. It was clear, he added, that the husband always sent his wife cards at Christmas and gave her presents on birthdays and other anniversaries."

Now, that's a funny story—unless you're Iris Crafer.

Mr. Roy: That's divorce; that's not support.

Mrs. Campbell: Such generosity.

Ms. Gigantes: No, I'm sorry. My friend from Ottawa East says that's divorce, that's not support. The same kind of double standard applies right through our courts. We know that. We know of cases here in Ontario. Within recent months we had a case when one of our judges told a witness that he could not accept her as a reliable witness because she was a woman of a certain age.

Mr. Roy: That is the exception—not the rule, for God's sake.

Mr. Renwick: If that is the exception to the rule, Albert, you're one of the exceptions.

Mr. Roy: You really don't believe that.

Ms. Gigantes: We cannot continue to permit any judge who may have such prehistoric notions about the female sex and its capacities, capabilities and needs, a judge who may have those views of the world and life, to go on without any kind of real bindings on his free use of discretion in these judgements on what constitutes good behaviour from a wife and from a woman. We can't allow this kind of opening in our law. Section 18(6) needs to be removed.

Mr. Roy: Is there no conduct that should affect—

Ms. Gigantes: In the real world, which my colleague from Ottawa East kept raising whenever we discussed conduct in the justice committee—he kept referring to the real world, saying, "You have to take these things into account in the real world. Conduct is important in the real world, and that's a fact"—there are some things about the real world and the way it's operated that we want to change.

The kind of discretion that judges have exercised, and have exercised in intolerable fashion, to say to the public, to the world, and to an individual woman, what the proper role of a wife is and what proper behaviour from a woman is—that has to be changed. That has gone on for far too long.

We have had a lot of arguments, and it's funny how these arguments have changed, Mr. Chairman. I remember the first discussions on this particular bill two years ago, when I first became involved in studying it. The examples we were given of why we needed some kind of conduct clause in this bill generally had to do with the young, blonde female swinger who married the older man for his dough and then divorced him.

It's fascinating though, as the months have gone by, how that example has dropped out of the parlance of the argument. Instead, what we're being given these days is the drunkard husband who beats his wife, who is a working woman. He has no job, she works hard at her professional life; why should she have to give him support when his behaviour is so intolerable?

Mr. Bradley: In other words, it works both ways.

Ms. Gigantes: I am just delighted how the cases have changed and how we swing around now, once you get right down to it, to the protection of women. We're going to be protected again for our own good. In this area I prefer self-defence, unimpeded by such clauses as this conduct clause. Take that last case, Mr. Chairman. I'm going to read to the members of the Legislature here assembled the number of ways laid out in section 18, subsection 5, clauses (a), (b), (c), (d) right through to (p)—I'm going to read every one of them. These are all the ways within this bill that a judge can use discretion to vary the amount of support.

I want to read these all out because I want legislators to ask themselves, once we have all these clauses (a) to (p), do we really need to have this conduct stuff in here? I won't read them all. You can read them yourselves. But let me suggest that you turn now and look at the frightening array of circumstances which a judge can take into account to vary the amount of support given to a dependant.

Section 18, subsection 5, clauses (a) to (p) includes everything from the length of time of the relationship to the capacity of the dependant to become independent. Under these clauses—under section 18, subsection 5, clause (b)—the judge can say to that bum of a husband—that drunken lout who beats her when she is just trying to carry on as an honest, professional woman, and who is making a claim on her money: "I'm looking at the capacity of you, Mister, to provide for your own support." He can say as a judge, "I say to you, Mister, I think you've got full capacity if you'll use it so I'm not going to give you a cent of support."

Mr. Roy: He's got a drinking problem.

Ms. Gigantes: "Your problem is that you haven't decided to make yourself financially independent and there is no reason why your hard-working, honest, professional wife should have to provide support for you while you refuse to face your own problem."

The sections we have here before us allow enormous discretion to judges to decide how to apply to provide support for a dependant in a relationship. I cannot see why we have to get into the kind of opening in the law that allows for judicial judgement on the behaviour, principally of females, that exists in 18(6) at the moment.

I'll put one more point to you, Mr. Chairman. Even if the judge, without having the benefit of being able to look at the conduct of the party who is seeking support, without having that luxury to make a judgement about proper behaviour—even if the judge, going through section 18(5) (a) to (p) doesn't find a good reason for making a good decision about how much support should be provided—if he makes a mistake—there can be an application to reconsider that decision within six months under this legislation. Any circumstances which change in any period of time can be varied by an application to the court within six months of a support order.

I think I feel more strongly on this section than I did about the assets section, because most people in this society don't have many assets anyhow. The principle involved in this clause, which deals with conduct and which will end up with dealing with women's conduct, is one which I find an absolute principle. We have to remove the discretion which judges have freely exercised with some of them—I won't say it, I get so angry on this subject.

I think if we make section 18 a positive statement that there shall be no consideration of the conduct of either spouse in determination of one spouse's need for support from another, then we will have done a great benefit to the standard of family law in the province of Ontario.

[11:00]

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, the member for Carleton East makes a very strong and I think important point with reference to this whole matter of the conduct clause. I am sorry that I was not in the committee in January to hear the discussion on this clause, but I very much participated two years ago when the matter was before a committee. I have taken this position on the matter of conduct because I am of the opinion that the member for Carleton East is abundantly correct in her view of the way in which judges have been functioning.

I was very pleased to have the opportunity to discuss three cases with a member of the Attorney General's staff to try to see the way in which the British jurisprudence was functioning under its somewhat similar section. The case to which the member for Carleton East referred was to me a perfect example of just the way in which judges seem to approach this situation.

It's interesting that in the other two cases we discussed, where the conduct of the male spouse was discussed, one of them was a case where the conduct was determined to be a "gross repudiation of," within the meaning of their terminology. It was a case where he had battered his wife—smashed her hands so that she would not be able to work. That seems to me in rather marked contrast to the determination in the case of a wife who simply refused to move into the matrimonial home.

The other case where gross repudiation, I presume, would flow in Ontario as a result of this precedent was a case where a husband entered into an incestuous relationship with his daughter-in-law, and in fact drove the wife and his son out of the home while he continued that course of conduct. I would think it wouldn't take too much imagination to interpret that as a "gross repudiation" of something or other. The contrast, though, between the types of decisions in these cases I am afraid really does bear a great deal upon the way in which women review any conduct clause in our society today.

I think perhaps the case that we read about this morning, while it didn't relate to conduct, had a kind of approach to this woman that bothered me somewhat. I don't think two partners to a marriage should be able to contract the state's support into their agreement in any way, but it was the attitude of this judge in adjourning the matter which is a part of the general approach of the courts to this situation.

I do have to say that I have been asked by a number of women—the member for Carleton East will probably not agree, but there are a number of women who have been battered and who have asked that this kind of clause with some protection should be in the Act. Since that is on the increase and nobody is doing anything about it, it does cause me some concern.

I cannot understand why this particular clause should be needed under section 18. It was interesting to me when I was on the committee that the male members of my profession were the experts in this. They made their presentation and they didn't blush or feel any sense of shame that women had been driven to take this kind of position through fear because of their long-standing experience in the courts.

The women who appeared before the committee were put down as nothing experts. They weren't within the machinery of the Canadian Bar Association or anything else, so what they had to say on this subject was negligible. I regret, as it happened, the Attorney General was not able at that point to be present to hear what they had to say.

I don't know what the discussion was in the committee. In my view, as long as people have no confidence in the law—and it isn't just the judges—this is the problem. Women have no confidence in the legal profession basically in these cases before the court. I had one woman who is a battered wife. It took some 10 months even to get her husband out of the house where she was trying to protect her children, simply because the members of the bar don't take that particular situation seriously. And some of them grow up to be judges. That's the problem.

I've tried very hard to look at both sides of this particular question. Speaking personally, I have to support the amendment of the member for Carleton East.

Mr. G. Taylor: Might I speak briefly on this and to the Attorney General on this matter? I too might side with my colleagues on the opposite side of the House on this amendment, indeed to the point of deleting the section entirely, as the member for Carleton East had in her earlier motion. I look at this and it does not give to either party, male or female, anything but a penal section. I do not hope that our judges, either male or female, are the fount of all knowledge and that their prejudices come out in all their decision-making powers, but it does allow there for a penalty. Do you get $2 for one punch or $3 for four punches? Do we bring in some great tort lawyers, such as a Mr. Melvin Belli, to plead pain and suffering and who will ask a jury to be present and will expand upon what is going on here so that we can embellish our damages to the point that we will see large cases coming out of the matrimonial situation, where we get a large damage result rather than the ending of a marriage through means that would be socially acceptable to the legislation?

I look upon the entire section as maybe one of the most heinous sections in the Act when we are looking to the conduct of each party and seeing how it should measure up, seeing if we can put a dollar value on this life that has gone on before, of either party, be it male or female, to the ending of the relationship. When we look at the Divorce Act, it has in there some words saying the conduct of the party should be looked at, but it doesn't get down to the conduct that is then amplified and modified by gross repudiation.

When I look at the wording of the section I don't know whether or not the parties can separate or end the relationship because it is a gross repudiation of the relationship. As the modification of that section looks to me, it just works out to a dollar value. When you are putting in an Act a section that determines the amount of dollars, I can see endless litigation and endless time used up in the courts and in the court system, particularly in the matrimonial situation, which is a hard enough situation, a difficult situation to litigate and put people through a court system anyway. To then work it out so that we can put dollar values on this relationship that is going asunder becomes a very difficult process, both for the participants, the litigants, and the judges involved.

So, Mr. Attorney General, if you can see your way clear to this amendment and if this side of the House can see its way clear, I would support my colleagues on the other side to delete that entire section. There is plenty in the earlier section of the Act to determine what should go between the spouses in a monetary matter without putting what can be categorized as a penal section into the Act.

Mr. Renwick: I would like to address my remarks specifically to the Attorney General. I was very heartened when the member for St. George said that she would support the amendment proposed by my colleague, the member for Carleton East. I had for one brief, fleeting moment thought that perhaps we were going to achieve what the member for Simcoe Centre and the member for St. George and the member for Carleton East have tried to indicate to the House is necessary. I'm going to try to add my still small voice to that particular argument.

I find the specific clause so offensive that it's difficult for me to marshal my thoughts about it and express them articulately in the English language. For once in my life I'm going to allow myself a brief personal allusion, because I have heard two or three times during the course of this debate from those people who are fortunate enough to have been happily and permanently married.

I want to address these remarks, because I very seldom do this. I want it clearly understood that neither in my own personal experience or in the experience I've had in relationships with advising clients in similar circumstances—although it's not a specialty that I practise—I have never, ever seen a situation where you could impute conduct to one person that wasn't a response to the conduct of another person and vice versa.

Mrs. Campbell: Exactly.

Mr. Renwick: It is always that way. There is no such thing as a case of marital relationship where of the conduct it can be said that the one person is black and the other person is white. It just doesn't work that way. I'd say to the member for Ottawa East particularly, that's the real world—that's the real world.

Mr. Roy: You're wrong, you're wrong.

Mr. Renwick: I may use one example, because the two persons are no longer living, and I use this quite advisedly, because I'm upset about the fact that we have to talk in horror stories to make this understood. The woman was an alcoholic over a period of time. It would take Freud to have figured out whether the relationship was the cause of the alcoholism or not. There was no question that the person was an alcoholic.

The husband engaged in a course of conduct which to my mind was depraved: when he wanted to go away himself for a week he'd bring liquor into the house. When he wanted to be at home, he would prohibit any alcohol in the house. He had it very skilfully worked out as to how many bottles a day the wife could drink, so if he wanted to go away for a week he'd bring X number of bottles of liquor into the house.

Would you ask me how anybody can sort out whether the course of conduct of the wife would prohibit her from getting support in a situation where the husband was engaged in that kind of contribution to the very conduct which was going to be used to deny the support?

[11:15]

I want to make one other point. You may think this is pure logic, but it's not pure logic. In the English language that clause doesn't make sense, because the amount of support which is needed for the future has no bearing whatsoever on the conduct in the past. If there is a reduction in the amount of the support payment which would normally—

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Riverdale wish to continue?

Mr. Renwick: No. I will continue when I have the attention of the Attorney General. The amount of support which is required in the future has nothing to do with the conduct in the past. Therefore, if you reduce the amount of support because of past conduct, somebody else is going to have to pick up the difference, be it the government through welfare assistance, or be it some other form of support. Somebody is going to have to make up the number of dollars required for that person to exist in our society. It is just that simple.

Do you allow one spouse to transfer a portion or all of that responsibility to the state or to somebody else and allow him, which is mainly the case, to escape the support obligation? I think we have to be tough. People make mistakes. There are marriages which flounder and are finished and over with. But that is tough. That doesn't eliminate the responsibility which in a civilized society we are trying to impose for the support for the future.

If you make a mistake, sure you have to pay somewhere. You can't transfer it to somebody else. That may sound very tough and very awkward and very difficult, but that is the way in which the real world should function because you are responsible for your own mistake in judgement. The marriage doesn't work out the way you want it to work out, but that shouldn't allow you to escape the obligation which you have accepted by entering into that arrangement.

I have a complete sense from listening to the discussion here that in a funny way the attitude of this assembly appears to be to support this clause, despite what the member for St. George said and despite what the member for Carleton East has said. It seems to me to reflect very clearly the very concerns which they expressed about the court system. Even the members of this assembly get to be judges one way or another. I think it reflects exactly the problem which is before us.

I want to make a further point. What the member for St. George said was so very clear. If there is one area of English law—that is, the law of Great Britain—that has no place in the Canadian scene it is their law related to family relationships. The divorce jurisdiction of those courts and the way it was handled over the years reinforce time and time again the points which have been made that that is a male-dominated society and, despite successive Labour governments, it still is.

The Attorney General knows that it was the courts of Great Britain that fastened the law of domicile on to divorce jurisdiction, that fastened the proposition that a woman had no separate domicile but had the domicile of her husband by the very act of marriage, which meant she could never sue in the court for a divorce unless she could sue in the jurisdiction of the domicile of her husband. The Attorney General knows as well as I do the intricate legal measures that had to be revised through legislatures to overcome that particular judge-made rule. Flowing from that jurisdiction which came from the ecclesiastical courts there has been an acceptance of the proposition that the woman was an inferior partner in the marriage relationship and we are doing our very best in this bill to reverse many centuries of that kind of thinking.

I say to the Attorney General that to permit to be put into issue past conduct for the determining of the amount of money required for future needs without any clear avenue in the bill, if you insist on going this route, for the conduct of the other partner to be put into issue as well and have it all thrashed out, if that is what the government wants to happen in its family courts, then at least have it as a clear issue so that if on a support application it is intended by the respondent to put in issue the conduct of the applicant, the respondent has to so specifically state. The applicant can then state before the court one of the issues is the conduct matter and we will thrash out all of the two sides of the relationship before the courts.

Why do you want to impose on the courts with this kind of jurisdiction that kind of problem? What is the point in doing that? Why don't you simply say, "Past conduct has nothing to do with future needs. Sorry, it's tough. The only ameliorating provisions are the ones which are itemized in the items from (a) to (p)" and to (q) if that—well, no, that other amendment was passed—and those are the ameliorating circumstances? Let's not disrupt the whole of the conception of this subsection 5. Let's not disrupt the whole of the basic conception of it by throwing in at the tag end this proposition of past conduct.

I think it is an intolerable burden to put on those judges in those courts. It will not come up in a few cases, it will come up in many cases, because in the deterioration of a marital relationship between two people, much of which is in private, then you can be certain that someone will try to get off the support hook by calling in aid the past conduct of the other party, and the court will then have to make that decision. Perhaps the Attorney General would listen to his colleague, the member for Simcoe Centre, and agree that this amendment must be accepted by this assembly.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Chairman, I rise objecting to the amendment.

Mr. McClellan: Naturally.

Mr. Sweeney: I rise, in fact, to support leaving this clause in the bill and I would suggest to my colleague from Riverdale that it is really not so surprising that he senses the majority of members in this House, in fact, believe that such a clause should be in here. I would suggest to the member for Riverdale that, in fact, we are probably reflecting the mood of our society and that mood, that Jewdao-Christian tradition which moves our society.

Ms. Bryden: It's a double standard.

Mr. Sweeney: Whether some members like it or not—

Mr. McClellan: What we don't like is your sanctimonious hypocrisy.

Mr. Sweeney: —that particular tradition suggests—

Mr. Lawlor: Sweeney, you are living in the midst of gross paganism.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sweeney: —that people are responsible for the consequences of their actions. This has already been changed. It is clearly suggesting the words "so unconscionable" and "gross repudiation" and when such actually occurs then it must be taken into consideration. I must also disagree with the member for Riverdale that the situation is not always that both parties are equally responsible.

Mr. Renwick: Always.

Mr. Sweeney: I disagree with you, sir, I'm sorry.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Renwick: On a point of order, I did not say that in all situations each party was equally responsible. I said it was impossible to determine whose conduct caused what conduct. You can't equate the matters.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Kitchener-Wilmot may continue.

Mr. McClellan: The court is not the confessional.

Mr. Sweeney: Thank you for the interpretation.

Mr. Roy: We listened to you. We didn't interrupt.

Mr. Sweeney: The point I would make is that there are sufficient examples where it is clear that one member of the marriage relationship has been seriously wounded by one other member and that factor must be considered. If this legislation is going to take the real situation and the real world into consideration, we cannot afford to leave this out.

Mr. Renwick: It has never been in it.

Ms. Bryden: I rise to support the amendment. I think it's one of the key amendments that is needed to make this bill operative in the true sense of the preamble, which is to bring the spouses into equality before the law. I welcome the support of the member for St. George and the member for Simcoe Centre. I hope they will persuade their colleagues, when the vote comes, to support it also.

Many of the women's organizations which appeared before the justice committee or which sent in submissions to the committee felt very strongly that the question of conduct should be deleted from the legislation. They felt that in applications for support the sole consideration should be the need of the applicant and the ability to pay of the other spouse. They have good support from a body of distinguished researchers in the law, namely, the Law Reform Commission of Canada, which recommended strongly that conduct should not be considered either in divorce actions or in awards for support.

I won't repeat all the arguments that have been made very eloquently by my colleagues, the member for Simcoe Centre and the member for St. George, but I would like to summarize what I think are the five reasons why this clause must be amended so that conduct is excluded.

The first thing is that the women's organizations particularly which appeared before us drew attention to the fact that the length of litigation in any support litigation was greatly increased because of the introduction of conduct and the bringing in of evidence about conduct. That means that the costs of such actions were also greatly increased. I think that that is a very strong reason for not including it and not adding to the judicial costs in this particular realm.

Secondly, we are moving to the no-fault concept in other fields. We now have no-fault divorce, if the spouses live apart for three years. We now have no fault auto insurance.

Mr. Roy: Not quite.

Ms. Bryden: We have that partly because it was felt that the difficulty of establishing fault for something that happened in, say, 60 seconds—

Mr. Roy: No, we don't have no-fault insurance.

Ms. Bryden:—and which may have been witnessed by a dozen people was still extremely difficult and that in some cases it was better to have the no-fault concept if we wished to see that justice was done.

In the case of marital relationships it is even more difficult to establish fault because, as my colleague from Riverdale has pointed out, conduct by one spouse is often a reaction to conduct by the other spouse. More important, it is impossible to establish a course of conduct that has been going on for many years and which has been going on in most cases behind closed doors without witnesses.

By asking a judge to determine conduct, we are asking him to take on the powers of God, to be all-knowing and all-observing. We are asking this Legislature to legislate an impossibility, to determine fault in a marital relationship, particularly one that has gone on for many years.

The third reason why we should exclude it is I think a humanitarian one; that is that bringing conduct into litigation for support means great embarrassment to the spouses. It can mean real pain and suffering. It can prevent the possibility of any future reconciliation or make it much more difficult. It can even prevent the possibility of a continuation of an amicable relationship between the separated spouses and, I think, it is very important that there should be an amicable relationship, particularly if children are involved.

The fourth reason—and I think it too is a very important one—is the double standard. We are putting blinkers on if we say that it longer exists—that the requirements for the morality of a woman are considered to be different from those for a man. Judges and lawyers as well, as the member for St. George pointed out, are still influenced by double-standard thinking. Therefore, in their arguments and in their decisions they will be influenced by the double standard.

The clause we hope to strike out has words that are capable of many interpretations. While other jurisdictions have similar words, none of them has an identical wording. Therefore I do not think we can argue that the interpretations that have been put on similar clauses in other jurisdictions will indicate what interpretations will be put on these words.

The fact is that the words are capable of many interpretations and they can be broadened to include a great many areas of conduct, not just the few extreme cases that some people talk about.

The fifth reason is I do not see why we should give to judges the power to award punishment for what happened in a marriage relationship. Punishment is something for the courts to impose when a law has been broken and, in the case that the member for St. George cited, if somebody has been injured by the other spouse there are recourses in the law for compensation or for damages. To give a judge the power to award punishment for what has happened during a marriage is again to put him in a position of God, because he does not know in great detail what went on in those periods and he cannot bring enough witnesses before a court to establish it.

My final reason is that retention of the conduct clause in the bill means that the bill will discriminate against women, because they will be the applicants in 90 per cent of the cases and they will lose out if the conduct clause is invoked and is made to stick against them in any way. I think it is disgraceful, in a bill that purports to be bringing the spouses into equality before the law, to continue a clause that will discriminate against women.

We must, therefore, have a clear guideline to the judges that conduct is not to be considered. There are plenty of other guidelines there to guide the judges in producing what we hope will be justice between the spouses, but we will not achieve justice because of the reasons that I have just cited if we retain the present clause in the bill.

Mr. Roy: This question of conduct has been a concern of the members of the committee since the bill was introduced. We have discussed it in various forms, we have heard submissions from various groups. I recall it was exactly because of this concern when we first sat on the committee—what was it, a year or a year and a half ago?—that we asked the Attorney General to narrow the clause of conduct down. It appears to me that having done so—having narrowed it down to its present form—that we have gone about as far as we can go in responding to a piece of legislation which will be socially acceptable.

I've listened carefully to the different points of view that were brought forward. I'm pleased to see that when the member for Carleton East was bringing forward her amendment, she finally realized something. She made a comment which I thought was interesting.

When we talked earlier about certain amendments dealing with assets, there was posturing on the part of people on my left about how absolutely important all of this was. Then she made the comment that assets were not really that important. Finally we saw what it was all about, that assets were not all that important and that the importance was on conduct. I'm pleased to see the member agrees that basically in our society all males are not millionaire chauvinists. That's not the case.

As I listened to the arguments being brought forward by certain members, there was an attempt to try to make a general rule out of an exception. We must be careful about that. First of all, from the way the amendment is phrased we're making it clear to the court that the conduct we were referring to generally in the old days—when they were saying that the courts were taking advantage of and were being unduly harsh on females; in the days when we were talking about dum casta clauses in separation agreements and things of this nature—is no longer a factor for these purposes. We are giving guidelines to the court.

I find it ironic that in attempting to make the rule out of the exception, we distort the whole situation out there. I've been criticized very often in talking about the real world. There is one and we've got to be aware of it.

Interjections.

Mr. Roy: Every time I say that I get my colleagues to my left excited because very often they are not living in the real world.

Mr. Bounsaal: It's a very unusual real world you live in.

Mr. Roy: Out there we're trying to have a piece of legislation which responds to a situation and will be acceptable to the majority in our society.

Interjections.

Mr. Roy: We have narrowed down the conduct provisions. I find it interesting that the member for Carleton East says: "If we leave that in, those male chauvinist judges are going to be jumping on us all the time to disentitle the female spouse." Then she says: "Take it out and then those wise judges"—all at once you take it out and then the judges become wise and experienced and no longer chauvinists.

Ms. Gigantes: Did I say that?

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Carleton East.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Deputy Chairman: She has risen. I have to hear what she rises on before I can rule whether she is in order. On what point are you rising?

Ms. Gigantes: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman. I am being seriously misquoted by the member for Ottawa East. I did not use the phrase "male chauvinist."

Mr. Roy: I didn't quote her.

Ms. Gigantes: I did not use that phrase and I think it infringes on my personal privilege to have that attributed to me.

Mr. Roy: I didn't quote her.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Ottawa East may continue.

Mr. Roy: I would only say to the Chair that people on all sides have sat here and listened with graciousness to the comments made by all the members. I would appreciate the same discretion given to us.

Mr. Bradley: They have two sets of rules.

Mr. Roy: We're getting used to that. I was making the point that what basically the member for Carleton East was saying is that the courts cannot be trusted with section 18(6). But, if we take it out, according to the member for Carleton East, then the courts become all-wise and will look at other factors under section 18(5). They will disentitle, for instance, that alcoholic drunk who keeps beating up his wife. The point is this, once you take conduct out completely then the criterion for support, according to this section, is based basically just on need and capacity.

Ms. Gigantes: That's right.

Mr. Roy: There, she agrees with me. What it does invite, Mr. Chairman, is decisions by the court that are so unjust and so unconscionable that the law is made to look like an ass. That's basically what some of the points mean.

I was impressed with some of the things that the member for Riverdale said because he said them with sincerity. I agree with him, as one who has practised in the courts and has done family law. I agree with him, basically, that in most situations it's not black and white that the fault is entirely on one spouse or entirely on the other spouse, but I can say to my colleague from Riverdale that I have seen situations when, in fact, you can see the black and white.

In most cases it's the male spouse who is the villain in this, where you have some tolerance on the part of certain female spouses in this province and in this country which border on sanctity. There are those situations. We have to keep these things in mind, and surely this clause under conduct is meant to deal with situations that are unconscionable. That's the purpose of leaving the clause in.

The other factor that the members must consider—I can just see it happen—is that if we were to accept this amendment the legal profession would just simply turn around and the emphasis would be put on disregarding this legislation for purposes of support and going into the realm of divorce under the Divorce Act where, in fact, conduct is a factor. As I understand it, and maybe the Attorney General can correct me, but once you proceed under the Divorce Act it supersedes this legislation. We're trying to put forward a piece of legislation here which we say is progressive, which has a certain amount of balance in it.

By making it so unreal we're inviting the legal profession and the public out there to disregard it and proceed under another statute, which I suggest to you is the Divorce Act, and we have no jurisdiction there. It's a federal statute. In fact, we're inviting people to use the Divorce Act to circumvent certain equitable provisions of this statute. I'm saying to you that we shouldn't do this. What I am saying is to accept this amendment borders, to a point, on inviting decisions that are so unjust and so unconscionable—

Ms. Gigantes: Have a little faith in your judges.

Mr. Roy: Have a little faith, the member for Carleton East says. I say, have a little faith and leave the section in. That's the way to have faith.

Ms. Gigantes: That much faith I don't have.

Mr. Roy: You can't have it both ways.

Ms. Gigantes: Neither can you.

Mr. Roy: The way the conduct provision is framed—and they get annoyed when I say in the real world, but there is a real world out there—

Interjections.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Roy: —it's very much like the mental and physical cruelty aspects under the Divorce Act. There are very few instances—it's the exception—I don't have the statistics, but I would think that under the Divorce Act there wouldn't be more than one or two per cent of divorces under mental and physical cruelty where, in fact, the male is the petitioner. That is a clause that is beneficial to the female spouse more than it is to the male. I frankly think that the way we have framed this legislation is fair and that the people who would suffer the most by taking this section out would be the people the member for Carleton East is saying she is trying to protect, whose interests she says she is upholding. That's what frightens me about it, that where there appears to be on the surface some proper intent, some sincerity in trying to do something, the results are exactly the opposite. I say to you that we, and I hope my colleagues agree with me on this, by and large are taking a responsible—

Ms. Gigantes: They will.

Mr. Roy:—approach and, by and large, by leaving it in we are saying that there is certain conduct. I hazard to guess, Mr. Chairman—I appear before the courts—that I can say judges lean more often in favour of the female spouse than the male spouse.

[11:45]

Ms. Gigantes: Oh, boy!

Mr. Roy: You just can't do, as one member has done, and refer to certain cases that she's read about a judge in England or about some judge who has made a comment about women of certain age. Surely to God that's the exception. We have thousands of judges in this province, male and female, who certainly don't have that approach. You can't make the exception. You can't say the whole judiciary is biased or male chauvinist or whatever because there happen to be certain misguided souls. You don't make the exception the rule.

We have faith in the judiciary, and I say that to accept the amendment by the member for Carleton East is to invite unconscionable decisions. We have more faith in the judiciary than she appears to have. We feel there are situations, especially situations affecting the female spouse, which will invite absolutely ludicrous decisions if we take that section out.

Mr. Bounsall: You'd love to be part of that judiciary.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, in the spirit of diversity which appears to exist within all caucuses here today—

Mr. Roy: Way to go, Mel.

Mr. Swart: Albert, you almost drove me to staying in my seat. Another speech, I think, perhaps would have.

Mr. Roy: At least you are consistent.

Mr. Lawlor: Sweeney would have been worse.

Mr. Swart: Especially the comment you made about my colleague from Carleton East, implying that she had said that assets were not important.

Mr. Roy: That is what she said.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Swart: My interpretation of what she said—in fact, what she said—was they were extremely important but this was perhaps even more important.

Mr. Roy: You read Hansard.

Mr. Swart: I listened rather carefully to the debate, and I have to say that I am somewhat bothered about the debate that has taken place. I am a little concerned about the implications by some that the clause that we have before us under section 18(6) is a clause that provides inequality between the spouses or inequality between the male and female.

I think we would all agree that the original clause which was presented to the committee did provide some inequality where the conduct of the spouse requiring the support was the one that was to be considered. But it seems to me that a clause which reads, "The obligation to provide support for a spouse exists without regard to the conduct of either spouse, but the court may in determining the amount of support have regard to a course of conduct that is so unconscionable as to constitute an obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship," would apply equally to the one who would be applying for the support as well as the one who would be responsible for that support.

I am not a lawyer but it seems to me that interpretation is rather clear.

Mr. Lawlor: I agree with you.

Mr. Swart: I, too, am concerned about the court system, which I think over the years has shown some partiality to the male. I think that is disappearing. I hope it's disappearing. But I am not sure that legislation should be changed to take into account that partiality if any is there. It seems to me that it's the job of the Attorney General to see that there is no partiality, and it seems that is where the change be made. I wear a button which says, "50-50." I support that fully, and it seems to me that the clause which we have here is a 50-50 clause.

The second part of the debate that bothers me a bit is the discussion about conduct, which seems to imply that the conduct clause which is in there could be used in almost every case. Again, I am no expert in wording and no lawyer, but certainly it would be my intention, and I made some changes, and my interpretation of it now is that it would only be used in extreme cases. The English language, of course, is not exact, but when you say "a course of conduct that is so unconscionable as to constitute an obvious and gross repudiation of the relationship," it would seem to me that any reasonable judge would interpret that to mean only the very extreme cases.

I am particularly concerned about the discussion—and it was introduced by the member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. G. Taylor)—which said this clause was a "penal" clause, saying that it could penalize some person from getting the amount of money to which he or she was entitled. I suggest there is another side to that coin, or that dollar, whatever the case may be, and that it could be a very great injustice perpetrated on an innocent party if you assess tremendous costs against that person for something which took place that was not primarily his or her fault or doing.

I know it is difficult to decide in these things where fault lies, but there is not one of us who doesn't know some case where you have a pretty strong opinion, a pretty justifiable strong opinion, about where the majority of the fault lies in a breakup. Certainly in the case of battered wives and other cases of extreme abuse, it seems to me that somehow or other in our assessment of penalties on moral grounds we should not apply those penalties against the innocent party.

The things that I have talked about here bother me somewhat. I feel that I as much as anyone else want to see fairness done between spouses when there is a marriage breakup. I want desperately to see that wives are treated in the courts, and because of the laws that we have, in the exact same way that husbands are treated. I desperately want to see justice done to both sides. In any marriage breakup there are injustices, but I guess it is because I feel there can be greater instances of injustices if the clause is removed than if it is retained, I feel there is merit in keeping that clause within this bill.

It is always a difficult position to be in when you are not in full accord, even in one instance, with the colleagues for whom you have so much respect, but in this instance I know of people to whom there would be a tremendous injustice and a tremendous hurt done if their conduct could never ever be considered in awarding support. I felt compelled to rise to make these comments here today, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bradley: The voice of reason.

Mr. Lawlor: I have two concerns in rising. One is that we have to have this legislation through by 1 o'clock today and therefore I will truncate my remarks. I intend to speak rather quickly from time to time in order to get on the record the few now hoary, worked-over, full of ordure, ideas that I have left on this subject.

Of course, I want to support my colleague in this particular clause. I have done so from the beginning and continue to do so. It seems to me that the repudiation of conduct in human relationships, particularly of this kind, necessarily imports a repudiation of responsibility. To claim that you can't segment these things out, it seems to me, is to claim that you can't operate in everyday life in a way of trying to straighten out relationships or to even live with other human beings as to where the weight falls, et cetera. We do it all the time. It's part of maturity and it's part of growing up, et cetera.

I would make perhaps a distinction between no-fault divorce and support obligations under this kind of legislation. There is the inextricable skein of the marriage, et cetera, and if they want to cut the bond why then go into all the interminable interstices of who is at fault here or there? That's not quite the truth here.

If this clause were knocked out, as some of my colleagues wish to see it, would it not encourage—maybe that's too strong—a particular mode of conduct and a way of life which is the very thing, using this legislation, we want to rule out? If conduct has no bearing at all and need is the sole consideration, would not one of the spouses be subsidizing the questionable, to say the least, behaviour of the other? Wouldn't the other one feel quite free to engage in a range of activities which is quite blatant and thumb his or her nose at the whole operation of the courts? Doesn't the opposite and malefactive aspect come into play if the clause remains? It seems to me that it does.

Secondly, as my colleague points out, there is a reciprocity in the clause. If the offending spouse, let us say, is the husband, it's not a penal clause at all, but it's penal to this extent, that exemplary or punitive damages might be levied against for a particular exacerbation of the relationship. There are circumstances in ordinary life where the mode of sexual conduct is so blatant and so heinous and so prolonged, and there are instances where the cruelty as between spouses is of such a kind that it has to be taken into cognizance in trying to weigh any just decision in the matter. That goes without saying.

To swing the opposite way because of abuses, because of an inherent tendency, particularly in English law—I don't think it's as prevalent here or in the United States by any means; the British superior court judges have something of a reputation for this—that's disappearing and will disappear.

I'm anxious to bring this debate to a close. We've said, I think, in the past everything we can possibly say about it so I'll sit down.

[12:00]

Mr. Bounsall: I rise in support of the amendment by my colleague from Carleton East, and in so doing I wish to say that I listened with great interest to the remarks of the member for Simcoe Centre and the member for St. George in support of our position in the deletion of conduct from the bill.

I must admit to the House that I do not, and cannot, get quite as emotionally involved in this one as I have over the division of assets, which I find to be completely and totally offensive as it now rests—which is a good thing, I think, for my presentation—but I certainly feel very strongly that this should be omitted.

I know the Attorney General, in defence of the case, has always given the extreme example of the professional woman who should be relieved of any obligation to support her ne'er-do-well, probably alcoholic husband, who beats her at every opportunity; that being the most extreme case one can think of.

My colleague, the member for Carleton East, is exactly correct when she points out that this type of situation is fully covered in section 18(5) of the bill and in several other clauses, in particular in clause (g) which reads: "The measures available for the dependant to become financially independent and the length of time and cost involved to enable the dependant to take such measures . . ."

Section 18(5)(g) would allow a professional woman before the courts to get, after a period of time, the alleviation of any support if the husband, as a ne'er-do-well, has not taken the appropriate steps as required by this bill to take his obligations into account, to become financially independent and to take and grasp those measures which are available and at hand for him to do so. Section 18(5)(g) is perfectly adequate in most cases to account for the most extreme horror story which the Attorney General brings forward.

I must say, in terms of what sort of real world people live in, that I am confident in this regard that the Attorney General does live in a more real world than does the member for Ottawa East. I don't know what kind of real world he lives in, but I am sure it is not the real world that most people live in; however, it is a shade more real than the member for Kitchener-Wilmot lives in, which, as far as I can see from his remarks, is certainly a very convoluted, restrictive and restricting world.

Reality is how one has perceived it and how one experiences it, but the totality of real world experiences of the colleagues in this party certainly does not fit with the real world experiences as outlined by the member for Kitchener-Wilmot or the member for Ottawa East.

Mr. Bradley: He got under your skin, didn't he?

Mr. Bounsall: I might just say that I have never been convinced in this clause that, in fact, we have limited the course of conduct or the conduct by which the courts may consider this matter when it is brought before them. Therefore, in that regard, by leaving this section in the bill we are going to ensure that when the support considerations come up before the courts in any divorce where there is any bitterness or any minutiae of contest, all the arguments are going to be dragged forward.

As a member of the committee, I insisted in mid-January that there be provided to us those 10 case law histories on which the British law is based and from which the phrase "obvious and gross repudiation" comes. I have read in detail, and carefully, all of those cases. I would just like to make very short reference to two of them.

In the one, Trippus vs. Trippus, where the husband and wife were married for 16 years, what then occurred was a period of 11 years in which they drifted in and out of the marriage. They were apart for various periods and back together and apart again and finally after 27 years of being formally married they separated. Of course, a divorce action by the husband was launched and a counter-divorce suit launched by the wife back in 1970. Finally, a decision came down by the judges in the matter and in January 1972 the husband, Ron Trippus, appealed the decision that the judge was wrong in law in his proceeding, in his erroneous view that the wife's adultery should not be taken into account.

What happened after the 27 years is that the wife went to live with a married man. The husband thereafter formed an association with a woman, a woman whom he intended to marry once the divorce action took place. The wife had not made up her mind whether she would marry the man with whom she was living. The husband had appealed the decision of the judge that the wife's adultery should not be taken into account and the case proceeded before the court of appeal—Lord Denning, Mr. Phillimore and Mr. Scarman—and after due consideration, in February 1973, the first proceeding before the courts having taken place in 1970,—

Hon. Mr. Davis: He wants his QC.

Mr. Foulds: He deserves one.

Mr. Bounsall: —the decision came down—and I quote from the decision: "Where it is clear that conduct does not play a significant part, it seems to me wrong to load the court with affidavits about ancient or modern discontents. A better use of the court's time and of counsel's and solicitors' time would be to concentrate on what really matters, namely, the financial position of the family."

We are trusting to luck here in this province by leaving the conduct section of this bill in; that, based on the decision of this court, none of these cases based upon adultery only will find their way into the court system. But I expect we will find the conduct argued interminably before our courts, as these appeal court judges have found.

We will, in fact, have before our courts affidavits about ancient and modern discontents and courses of behaviour, and will be looking through those affidavits rather than concentrating on what really matters—and that is the financial position of the family and the statements as outlined in clause 15 of the Act before us, which should be the only operative part of this support section, in that the spouse has the obligation to provide the support—if that spouse has the means—in accordance with the need of the other one.

That is what should be operative and it should not be modified at all by any conduct section allowed in this bill. The Attorney General could have made the conduct section somewhat better and could have remedied this if he had added after "course of conduct" the phrase "before the separation took place." Because, of course, what this conduct section allows for—if I may give what would be a reasonable example—is of one spouse before the separation having lived a life with the spouse in which on the first spouse's part there was no course of conduct that could be argued under this conduct section of the clause.

A separation takes place but there are now some months or even years before the divorce takes place. In the course of that time, if the spouse whose behaviour up to this point was exemplary, went out and over those months or over those years went to live with someone else, that could then be argued by the spouse providing the support that indeed a course of conduct was now set up which constituted "a gross repudiation" of that marriage relationship which they are still in, because a divorce has not taken place.

So what this clause means is that between the time of the separation and the time of the divorce, there must not be any course of conduct on the part of either that would be a repudiation of that marriage relationship which by law they still have, but which by law they have not yet severed by a divorce. That could be cleared up by making it very clear in this conduct section that we're re-referring to a course of conduct before the separation took place, but the Attorney General and his staff have chosen not to so limit it.

They have therefore invited, before the courts of Ontario, repeated applications on the part of one or both spouses for a new determination of the amount of support based on the conduct of the spouses who have separated. This is because the conduct since the separation can be called a course of conduct which repudiates that marriage relationship which in law still exists and for which the support is asked.

Mr. Stong: No, that would be turfed out. Any right-thinking judge would turf that out.

Mr. Bounsall: I'm saying that the judge may well turf it out. The point is the courts are going to be loaded down with applications, because this section allows for it. If you don't believe this is going to happen, then you do not live in the real world of what is going to find its way before the courts of the province with respect to courses of conduct set up after the separation has occurred but before the divorce action has been finalized. But of course that would be only another small improvement in a section in which there have been improvement attempts made, but as far as I can see leaves everything wide open before the courts.

The second case of the British law that I wanted to refer to was, of course, the case of West vs. West. It was finally decided in 1976 and has been briefly referred to by my colleague from Carleton East. It is the case where the husband and wife were married and the wife continued to live in the home of her parents. The husband could never find a house in a location in which the wife chose to live. He could find suitable houses in locations where the wife wouldn't live, but in locations where she would be agreeable to live, he could not find a suitable house. Finally, the husband went out and bought a house anyway, moved into it and said, "Move in." That house location was not acceptable to her as far as the house was concerned. I gather the location was all right, but it was the house itself that wasn't. She continued to live with her parents.

What took place thereafter, over the course of the next couple of years, was that the husband spent every weekend with her at the home of her parents, they proceeded to have one child and in fact they took all their vacations together and so on. But the refusal of the wife to move into the house which the husband provided was found to be a "gross repudiation of the marital relationship."

The point I want to make here is that this case, used as part of the case history, will allow all sorts of cases to come before the judges in the province as a gross repudiation of the relationship. It applies, in particular, I could see, to members of the provincial Parliament who came from ridings outside of the city of Toronto, where we are away from our respective residences for four to five days of the week. Based on this case of West versus West, should a divorce or a separation come up in our family situations, this case could be argued as the one which would provide the gross repudiation of our marriage relationship.

Hon. Mr. Davis: But never in your case, Ted.

Mr. Bounsall: Let me tell you what happens in my case—

Hon. Mr. Davis: It's an hour's flight to Windsor.

Mr. Bounsall: But not always at convenient times, I might point out to the Premier.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, I know you. You can find a convenient time anytime.

[12:15]

Mr. Bounsall: Not always when I am needed or required. I have had in my own situation, my spouse, Joanne, phone me up from Windsor and say, "I have a very important constituency case which demands your immediate and emergency attention at the moment." The case which she refers to, as the constituent needing the great help, is the fact that she, Joanne Bounsall, is in desperate need of having the backyard grass cut immediately, and will I please see to that, as an MPP on behalf of a constituent of the riding.

Hon. Mr. Davis: So you go home and cut the grass.

Mr. Bounsall: I usually wait till the week-end. She wants to ensure that that constituent need is taken care of. Under those kinds of needs and under those kinds of situations that arise, in particular for out-of-town MPPS, as the case of West vs. West exemplifies, it is that kind of allowance, which was allowed by the way, which under obvious and gross repudiation can very easily be argued in the case of an MPP from out of town. I do not fear this argument ever being placed in my case.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I don't ever expect to see Bounsall vs. Bounsall in the reports.

Mr. Bounsall: Should there ever be a time in which a separation or divorce occurs in this particular Bounsall family, it will be an amicable one. It will not be one which has to find a way into courts, except for the final formalities which one needs to go through. At least, this would be the hope. There certainly would be no problem in the equal 50-50 split of all assets acquired since marriage between the two of us and our family. This is the understanding between us which we have not felt the need to commit to paper. If there is ever a need on the part of my wife to see this committed to paper, there would be no problem in my saying that the asset split as we have proposed in our amendments to this bill in fact be that asset split which occurs between my wife and myself in the unfortunate event that that should occur.

Mr. Nixon: You could make a special agreement with your wife on that.

Mr. Roy: You would act as your own counsel?

Mr. Bounsall: Actually, I would feel much more confident acting as my own counsel than ever to have you acting as my counsel.

Mr. Roy: Then you would have a fool for a client.

Mr. Bounsall: If there ever was a disagreement between my wife and myself and I surely wanted to win my point, I would counsel my wife to take as her counsel the member for Ottawa East. Then I would be in a sure and winning situation.

Ms. Gigantes: You would never do that surely.

Mr. Bounsall: It would be such a vicious move on my part to do to my wife that really in all fairness I would not allow that to occur in her own interests and the interests of my children subsequently.

I will conclude by saying it is completely unconscionable for members of this House to allow this conduct section of this bill as it regards support to remain in this bill. It should be removed and I appeal to all fair-thinking members of the House to follow the lead of the member for St. George and the member for Simcoe Centre in ensuring that this clause is deleted from this bill.

Mr. Nixon: Let's vote on it.

Mr. Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye."

Those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the "nays" have it.

I declare the amendment defeated.

Mr. MacBeth: What happened to all the NDP?

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moves that section 19(1)(g) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

“(g) the payment to an agency referred to in subsection 3 of section 18 of any amount in reimbursement for a benefit or assistance referred to therein, including an amount in reimbursement for such benefit or assistance provided before the date of the order.”

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, this amendment is complementary to the amendment we have already passed in section 18(3). The proposed amendment makes it clear that the ministry or municipality may claim reimbursement of family benefits or welfare but no other kinds of assistance provided. As I say, it's a complementary amendment to achieve that end.

Motion agreed to.

Section 19, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 20 to 23, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 24:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moves that section 24 of the bill be amended by striking out “the respondent or debtor is about to leave Ontario” in the third and fourth lines and inserting in lieu thereof “the attendance of the respondent or debtor is necessary and it appears that the respondent or debtor is about to leave Ontario in an attempt to evade the obligation to provide support.”

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The proposed amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to define the conditions under which a court may order the arrest of the respondent or debtor who is about to leave the province. The existing section as it presently stands really incorporates an existing section of the Deserted Wives' and Children's Maintenance Act, which contains no limits whatsoever on the court's discretion to arrest. Our proposed amendment really is in response to a request from the Ontario branch of the Canadian Bar Association to provide some limits on the discretion of the court to order the arrest of the respondent or debtor on a support obligation.

It's felt that the power of arrest should be used sparingly and with some guidelines. Otherwise, it could be abused if it were left in its present form and I think this proposed amendment clearly states the intent of the discretion; otherwise, somebody could perhaps approach a justice of the peace and seek an order or warrant to be issued when the matter really has very little to do with any concern with respect to the respondent or debtor leaving the jurisdiction.

Mr. Bounsall: I have just one concern about this, and I assure the Attorney General that under this section I will not go through my other worries and concerns about all those people who have in fact already fled Ontario into the United States, about how one can at least prevent the application of those persons for landed immigrant status in the United States rather than work permits which they operate from and which allow them to flee to one of the other 37 states with which we do not have reciprocal agreements. We now have or are about to have agreements with 13 states shortly.

I will not go into my arguments there. My concern is that you have the word “and” here. You have added the phrase “the attendance of the respondent or debtor is necessary and”. I would be happy, I suppose, with an “or” there. With the “and” it implies to me that not only do you have the consideration of the debtor leaving Ontario, but in addition you have to have that person in both categories; not only about to leave Ontario but also require his or her attendance. I think that is an additional burden added to the consideration about whether they're about to leave Ontario, although I don't see it as harmful as it sits by itself, to link the two of them together by the “and” requires that both considerations be taken into account. I gather that a court could, in fact, allow a judgement in his absence if the respondent or debtor does not appear in court, because he has not taken the time nor trouble to appear. So what is key is whether or not they're about to leave Ontario to try to avoid the whole obligation, rather than whether or not he is present or not for the hearing. With the “and” added there, it sounds as if you would have to consider both; you're about to leave and you must appear. So if the Attorney General would insert an “or” instead of an “and” I would be quite happy with that amendment. The amendment would be okay with me, but not with the “and” there.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: With respect, I don't see how you can look at them separately, because I don't see why the court would want to order the arrest of the person unless his attendance is necessary. For example, if the attendance of the person is not necessary and they're going to leave the jurisdiction I have difficulty in seeing the need for the warrant for the arrest, so I really see the two as being tied together.

Mr. Bounsall: Could I just perhaps state my concern? If in the case of a husband who is living in Ontario and who has had decisions from the court requiring him to pay support—that's already taken place—the evidence now comes forward that he is setting up a business in Chicago, Illinois—

Mrs. Campbell: Make it Quebec; that's not a very good example.

Mr. Bounsall: —he's made an application as a landed immigrant to the United States and the business is being set up in Chicago, in Illinois, which state has consistently refused to enter into a reciprocal agreement for alimony and child support with the province of Ontario. So the move there is certainly a move simply to evade the obligation to provide support.

I can see where, as one of the moves to make the evasion of support more difficult, a warrant for his arrest might be appropriate to let him know that the attempt to evade support by moving to Chicago, Illinois, has been noted as a move specifically to evade the obligations of his support.

He would not be obligated to appear in court. The court-ordered support payments in Ontario have been made; he is already making those payments and will be making them as long as he is in Ontario, but his going to Chicago, Illinois, of course, will result in no payments being made whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: If I may just briefly respond. Then, of course, his attendance would be necessary before the court in order to enforce the orders that wouldn't be enforceable in Illinois. I think it's just an illustration that you can't separate the two, because in the illustration you just gave, his attendance would be necessary before the court to enforce the law.

Mr. Lawlor: I'm inclined to agree with the Attorney General on that.

I have another point that I would like to bring to your attention. The bar, in order to correct one error, emasculates, in my opinion, the position of the court completely. If you read the second part: ". . . and it appears that the respondent or debtor is about to leave Ontario in an attempt to evade the obligation . . ." that imports what is known in criminal law as mens rea or some kind of intention. How is a judge, in issuing a warrant, to know whether or not he's leaving Ontario for that particular purpose or for 100 other reasons, et cetera? How is it to be established that this is an attempt to evade? That can be strenuously argued by counsel seeking to resist the prevention of his leaving the province under that particular head.

[12:30]

My feeling about the matter, pending what the Attorney General has to say in reply, is that you should leave the clause alone just as it is. It simply says, as things stand, there is no intention that the respondent is about to leave Ontario. One of the impacts of his doing so is going to deprive a spouse in this province of a legitimate support obligation.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: It may be that the person is about to leave Ontario for an entirely legitimate reason and it has nothing to do with respect to avoiding the obligation. I think in those circumstances it would be quite wrong to issue a warrant for a person's arrest. Surely there can be other reasons for people leaving the province that are unrelated to a desire to avoid this obligation. I think this is the concern.

Mr. Lawlor: And the claim would be that those reasons were operative in each instance.

Mrs. Campbell: I must agree with my friend from Lakeshore. It seems to me that when you are discussing the issue on civil warrants, it is going to be difficult to ascertain basically why a person is leaving in any kind of material evidentiary terms. I am concerned about that, because I suppose if a court is aware of a course of conduct that would be clear cut—

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, if it's the request of the justice critics of the Liberal and NDP parties to withdraw the amendment, I will withdraw it. I didn't mean to cut off the member for St. George, but I think the bar association has a legitimate area of concern. I am quite prepared to communicate to them that this proposed amendment was not acceptable to my distinguished colleagues, the justice critics of the other two parties. So be it.

Mr. Chairman: Do I take it that the hon. minister is withdrawing the amendment?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Yes.

Section 24 agreed to.

Sections 25 to 39, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 40:

Mr. Chairman: Ms. Bryden moves that section 40 be amended by the addition of a new subsection:

"3. Where premises are the matrimonial home of two spouses and only one of the spouses is registered as the owner of the premises, the other spouse is deemed to be and is entitled to be registered as a joint owner thereof."

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Do we have a copy of this?

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I submitted copies to the House leaders of all the parties, as well as the—

Mr. Chairman: I would hope that the member could supply other copies to the parties concerned.

Ms. Bryden: The bill as it stands now provides that both spouses have possessory rights to the matrimonial home regardless of whose name it is registered in. On marriage breakup, either spouse can seek a court order for possession. The bill will also make it impossible for one spouse to sell or mortgage the family home without the written consent of the other spouse.

Mr. Roy: You can't now under that section.

Ms. Bryden: Under the present law, I agree, under dower, you can't. So in effect there is no advance in that. I am just summarizing what the bill does about the family home.

In addition, the matrimonial home under this bill will be subject to 50-50 sharing on marriage breakup under section 4.

These provisions, particularly the last one and the possessory rights one, are important additions to the rights of the spouses. But they confer only a deferred right, which happens on marriage break-up. Yet in most cases the acquisition of the home during marriage is the result of regular mortgage payments, in many cases made out of the earnings of both spouses and sometimes out of the earnings of one spouse who is enabled to go out and earn because the other undertakes the bulk of the responsibility for child care and household management.

Since they are purchasing the asset by their joint efforts during their marriage in many cases, either spouse should have the right to ask for immediate vesting in them of his or her right to co-ownership. This kind of provision was in the Manitoba Marital Property Act, which was passed by the previous Manitoba government and which has not yet been repealed, but has only been set in abeyance by the present government while they study the matter.

A considerable number of the briefs submitted to the justice committee asked that the bill follow the Manitoba pattern and establish immediate co-ownership of the matrimonial home for all couples. I would like to point out that the clause is not mandatory, it is permissive. It does not require the immediate vesting of the house in both names unless one or the other spouse requests it. It makes it possible, however.

The main arguments I have heard against this kind of an amendment is that it will prevent a spouse—in most cases a husband in business—from escaping his creditors by putting his home in his wife's name. I submit this is a red herring. In the first place, the number of spouses who are in unincorporated businesses which are likely to go bankrupt are very few. For those who are, there is still the option of incorporation and there is also the permissive nature of this amendment. They can still leave the house in the name of one spouse or the other if they so wish as a joint decision.

If we accept this particular red herring as the main reason for rejecting this motion, we are legislating against the interests of the vast majority of spouses in the mistaken notion—and it is mistaken, as I have just pointed out—that we are protecting the tiny group of people operating unincorporated, risky businesses who may wish to have the house in one name only.

Mr. Roy: She is really up on business.

Mr. Martel: She really understands her law.

Ms. Bryden: By not establishing the right to immediate co-ownership of the matrimonial home, we are in effect denying full recognition of the 50-50 sharing principle in the bill, which is written into section 4. The principal family asset for most families is the home. If we do not provide immediate co-ownership, we are not really giving the vast majority of the women of this province anything by this bill except a deferred right.

What is even more important is that we are denying this right to spouses who happen to have their marriage end because of the death of one of them. We have already rejected amendments which would extend the operation of this bill to marriages which end in the death of one spouse. Therefore, it is even more important that we make sure that the vesting of the co-ownership happen during the marriage, rather than just on marriage breakup. Otherwise, we are continuing what I have pointed out is a discrimination in the Act against two classes of spouses: those whose marriage ends on death and those whose marriage ends on breakup.

In addition, this amendment confers, in my opinion, a significant psychological advantage on the non-owning spouse. It means that if there are negotiations regarding the house—placing a new mortgage on it or putting it up as collateral or something of that sort—both spouses participate in those negotiations as equal owners. It's true that the one spouse has a deferred ownership right, but I think the psychological situation of participating as equal owners makes them much more able to participate in any negotiations on an equal basis, and with both their voices heard.

Therefore, for those reasons, I think we should make this change in the Act. I point out it is only a permissive change, but it will greatly enhance the sense that the bill is going to give something to the vast majority of the women of this province in recognition of their rights.

Mr. Chairman: If there is no further discussion, all those in favour of this amendment will say "aye."

All those opposed will say "nay."

In my opinion, the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Chairman: Are there any other sections on which anyone wishes to make comments?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Section 57.

Mr. Roy: Just before we get to section 57 I must make my usual diatribe; it's in relation to section 50.

Sections 41 to 48, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 50:

Mr. Roy: I won't move any amendments, because I've discussed this in justice committee. I did not receive sufficient support, and I'll not take up the time of the committee on this. I would only say that in my view, in relation to section 50, we shouldn't permit cohabitation agreements. I've made the argument fully in the justice committee and in my personal opinion this is going to be extremely misleading to the spouses in this province, in the sense that they feel that they'll have a certain amount of security within a common-law relationship but in a sense they will not.

You know my views about giving any status or legislative approval to common-law relationships, especially when there are no children. The common-law spouses by and large are not interested in it; and I should express my views on that.

Mr. Chairman: With all the paper on my desk, I missed section 49. I believe there is an amendment to it.

On section 49:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moves that subsection 2 of section 49 of the bill be amended by striking out all after clause (b) and by adding thereto the following clause: "(c) a proceeding to determine the rights as between spouses in respect of property has been commenced or adjudicated before this part comes into force."

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: This is to make the application of Part III of the legislation consistent with that of Part I under the new section 12(c), so it would apply to all matters whether adjudicated upon or not.

Mr. Roy: If I might just make this point and ask for the guidance of the Attorney General: as you recall, under section 12 we moved a similar amendment, but the part that bothers me again is the question of adjudication.

Mrs. Campbell: You can't go back.

Mr. Roy: No, but I want to express my views on that.

Mr. Lawlor: There's a limited time, you know.

Mr. Roy: Listen to who's talking about time.

Mr. Cassidy: The women of this province are talking about time.

Mr. Chairman: Would the hon. member direct his comments to the amendment?

Mr. Roy: What bothers me is that in relation to the matrimonial home, let's say there has been adjudication, would the prescription period apply, for instance, if the adjudication had taken place six years ago or something? I can see a situation where a disposal adjudication has been made to the matrimonial home where it's been under, let's say, the Partition Act, it's been divided up five, six, 10 years ago, and in fact the spouses are not yet divorced; would it then be open to one or other spouse to come back after that period of time or would the prescription period then be a factor? I am talking about the general prescription period of six years under the Limitations Act? Would that be the only prescribing element when we are talking about this Act applying even to cases where there has been previous adjudication? [12:45]

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: As I understand it we were providing a new cause of action in this Act, and all persons would have the right to take advantage, if that happens to be the case, of this new cause of action. So I don't think you are really talking about adjudication on an old cause of action, you are talking about an entirely new cause of action.

Mr. Roy: Just to make the point clear. Theoretically, there could have been adjudication 10 years ago in relation to a property, in which the property disposed of is in the hands of somebody else. We are coming in with a new cause of action in which we are giving a new right. I just want to make sure we know exactly what we are getting into; I have a concern about going backwards, which may well cause real hardships in some cases.

Motion agreed to.

Section 49, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 51 to 56, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 57:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved that clause (c) of section 57 of the bill be amended by inserting after "provision" in the first line "in a marriage contract or cohabitation agreement".

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment is relating to the provision invalidating clause for custody or of access to children in foreign domestic contracts. We wish to amend this to confine its applications to marriage contracts or cohabitation agreements, as is the case with Ontario contracts. In other words, we would like to have clauses in Ontario separation agreements applicable outside the jurisdiction.

Mr. Bounsall: Very good.

Motion agreed to.

Section 57, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 58 and 59 agreed to.

On section 60:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved that section 60 of the bill be amended by renumbering subsections (2) and (3) as (3) and (4), and by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) The damages recoverable in a claim under subsection (1) may include; (a) actual out of pocket expenses reasonably incurred for the benefit of the injured person; (b) a reasonable allowance for travel expenses actually incurred in visiting the injured person during his treatment or recovery; (c) where as a result of the injury the claimant provides nursing, housekeeping or other services for the person injured a reasonable allowance for loss of income or the value of services; (d) an amount to compensate for the loss of guidance, care and companionship that the claimant might reasonably have expected to receive from the injured person if the injury had not occurred."

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Hopefully, the amendment is clear, to give the courts guidance as to the kinds of damages recoverable in a new action for a non-fatal injury. And also I want to emphasize that the list is not exclusive.

Mr. Roy: Might I just get this clarification from the Attorney General? Did you feel that the present guidelines that the courts are following, through jurisprudence and whatever in relation to property, general damages and this type of thing, was not adequate in dealing with this situation?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: In discussions with members of the practising bar it was felt, because we really are creating a new course of action, it would be helpful to have these guidelines.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Motion agreed to.

Section 60, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 61 to 79, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 80:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved that clause (a) of subsection 2 of section 80 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefore: "(a) section 16."

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: It was a typographical error.

Section 80, as amended, agreed to.

On section 81:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved that section 81 of the bill be amended by adding thereto the following subsection: "(3) Section 118 of the said bill as amended by the Statutes of Ontario 1975, Chapter 30, section 7 is amended by striking out 'alimony or for the maintenance or custody of children is joined with' in the amendment of 1975 and inserting in lieu thereof 'other relief is joined in.'"

Motion agreed to.

Section 81, as amended, agreed to.

Section 82 agreed to.

On section 83:

Mr. Chairman: Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved that section 83 of the bill be amended by striking out "5 and 8" in the first line and inserting in lieu thereof "and 5, subsection 6 of section 6 and section 8."

Motion agreed to.

Section 83, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Any further comments on any section?

Mr. Roy: I would like to speak to section 84.

On section 84:

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I just want to address these comments to the Attorney General.

If, of course, section 17 is retained in the bill, it would make sense that we agree with section 84. If, for instance, the amendment that has been proposed to section 17 was accepted would you retain section 84 and get rid of the Parents' Maintenance Act completely?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I think if it is the will of the House to remove section 17 that we really should leave section 84 in the bill because it would reflect the mood either way.

Mrs. Campbell: Exactly.

Mr. Roy: Okay.

Sections 84 to 91, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 92:

Mr. Bounsall: I don't really speak to the substance of section 92 at this point, Mr. Chairman, although there are some other names for this bill which do occur to me, in the form in which we still have it before us. I won't bore the House with the fantasies and the nightmares I have about this bill and what the test in that name should provide, except that I want to say at this point in the bill that a communication given to me by the Clerk of the House indicated that the proper place to discuss the preamble is, in fact, after all the clauses of the bill have been considered.

Because of the shortness of time I don't intend to enter into a debate on the preamble. We covered that extensively in committee. I will say that if time permitted I would have been inclined to add an amendment to the preamble which would indicate what marriage should be while marriage is in progress. This is the very thing included and outlined in the marriage contracts common in the country of Sweden. It comprises the very statements which the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) introduced into this House at the time of the debate on my private member's bill back in 1975.

I will not introduce that amendment because of shortness of time, but what is lacking in this bill dealing with family law reform and matrimonial relationships and which should be, preferably, in the preamble, is an expression of the obligations of the spouses during marriage.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Chairman, I'd just like to express my appreciation to all members of the House, regardless of the outcome of the votes, with the very responsible manner in which they have gone about their task of shaping and bringing into being this very important legislation.

Mr. Chairman: Shall section 92 stand as part of the bill?

Section 92 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: There are a number of amendments before the committee. It was agreed that they'd be stacked. I'd like to remind the members of the committee that there will be a 10-minute bell.

Mr. Chairman: Order. The first amendment before the committee:

Mr. Swart moved that section 3(b)(i) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(i) Money held by one or both spouses in any account with a chartered bank, savings office, credit union, or trust company, if such money was acquired during marriage or as a result of appreciation during marriage of money held prior to marriage."

The committee divided on Mr. Swart's amendment to section 3(b)(i) which was negated on the following vote:

Ayes 25; nays 54.

Mr. Chairman: The next amendment: moved by Mr. Swart that a new section 3(b)(ii) be substituted.

Mr. Renwick: We are very interested in the record and we would appreciate it, Mr. Chairman, if you would read each of the amendments as they're called in full.

Mr. Nixon: They're going to punish us for being right.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Mr. Swart moved that a new section 3(b)(ii) be substituted and the present subclause 2 and subsequent subclauses be renumbered accordingly:

"(ii) Shares in a corporation and bonds owned by one or both spouses for investment purposes during marriage and the accrued appreciation during marriage of shares and bonds acquired by one or both spouses for investment purposes prior to the marriage."

The committee divided on Mr. Swart's amendment to section 3(b)(ii), which was negated on the same vote.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Swart moved that a new section 3(b)(iii) be substituted, and the present subclause (iii) and subsequent subclauses be renumbered accordingly:

"(iii) Rights in a pension or retirement savings plan acquired during marriage by one or both spouses, and the accrued appreciation during marriage of rights in a pension or retirement savings plan acquired by one or both spouses and be accrued appreciation during marriage of rights in a pension or retirement savings plan acquired by one or both spouses prior to the marriage."

The committee divided on Mr. Swart's amendment which was negated on the same vote.

Section 3 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Ms. Bryden moved that subsection 3 of the said section 4 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(3) The rights under subsection 1 are personal as between the spouses but any application commenced under subsection 2 before or after the death of a spouse may be made or continued by or against the estate of the deceased spouse and, for the purposes of such an application, a reference to spouse in this part shall be deemed to be a reference to the estate of the spouse as the case requires."

The committee divided on Ms. Bryden's amendment which was negated on the same vote.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Lawlor moved that section 11 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"11(1). Where property is transferred from one spouse to the other and delivery or registration is effected, or where one spouse directs property to be placed or taken in the name of the other spouse, unless there exists proof of a contrary intention, the transfer shall be deemed to be a gift to the donee spouse except that,

"(a) where the property is placed or taken in the name of spouses as joint tenants, unless there is proof of a contrary intention, each spouse shall be deemed on a severance of the joint tenancy to hold a one-half beneficial interest in the property; and

"(b) money on deposit in a chartered bank, savings office, credit union or trust company in the name of both spouses shall be deemed to be in the name of the spouses as joint tenants for the purposes of clause (a).

"11(2). The rules of law applying the resumption of advancement and resulting trust and questions of ownership of property as between husband and wife are abolished."

The committee divided on Mr. Lawlor's amendment, which was negated on the same vote.

Section 11 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: The next question is, shall section 17 stand as part of the bill?

The committee divided on the question, which was approved on the following vote:

Ayes 51; nays 29.

Section 17 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Ms. Bryden moved the addition of a new subsection, 3, to section 40:

"Where premises are the matrimonial home of two spouses and only one of the spouses is registered as the owner of the premises, the other spouse is deemed to be and is entitled to be registered as a joint owner thereof."

The committee divided on Ms. Bryden's amendment, which was negated on the same vote as the first vote.

Section 40 agreed to.

Bill 59, as amended, reported.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the committee of the whole House reported one bill with amendments.

FAMILY LAW REFORM ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved third reading of Bill 59, An Act to reform the Law respecting Property Rights and Support Obligations between Married Persons and in other Family Relationships.

Mr. Philip: There's no doubt that this bill has taken a major step forward. The sections concerning the matrimonial home, marriage, marriage contracts and support obligations are certainly desirable, enlightened and welcomed by all members of the House. As chairman of the committee that struggled with the bill, I have warm feelings of satisfaction over those sections in the bill.

I have listened closely to the arguments on all sections of this bill and I am disturbed by the conduct clause which is still being left in the bill. I am incensed by the injustice of the division of assets section of the bill. I feel so strongly about the need for a more equitable distribution of assets that for me to vote for the bill on third reading will be unconscionable. Therefore, it's with great emotion and considerable regret that I and my colleagues will vote against the bill on third reading.

Mr. Reid: Better to die of thirst than to have one drink of water.

Mr. Roy: As one who had the honour of sitting on the justice committee for the two years that we have been working on the bill and listening to submissions, I would like to join with the Attorney General in saying that it was a worthwhile experience in the sense that we exchanged views. No matter what the differences were between various members, I think the intent of all members was to see we had a fair and balanced bill. We disagreed as to the method and the way we should achieve it, but by and large I think there was excellent co-operation. We received from the public a variety of briefs, and this bill is evidence of parties in minority government working together in arriving at what I consider to be excellent, progressive legislation.

We on this side have no hesitation in supporting the bill. I would only say to the chairman of the justice committee that if he felt so strongly about the conduct section it's unfortunate that members of his party weren't here to force a vote.

An hon. member: There were only four of them here.

Mr. Warner: The question is why did the member for Ottawa East support it? He should have had some conscience on it.

Mr. Roy: I am sorry to say to the member that the NDP caucus did not give full support to the poor member for Carleton East in not supporting her proposition here.

Ms. Gigantes: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Carleton East on a point of privilege.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, my point of personal privilege is this: I believe it to be an unfair slander on my colleagues in my caucus.

Interjections.

Ms. Gigantes: I take on myself the complete responsibility for the unfortunate fact that we did not have a sufficient number of members present when that vote was called.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of privilege.

Ms. Gigantes: It was my responsibility that fell down, and not that of my colleagues.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that when the vote was called, all I could count over there was four.

Mr. Renwick: Don't say anything, Albert, just sit down; you are out of order.

Mr. Martel: At least we are here five days a week.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Are you terminating your remarks?

Mr. Roy: I am completing my remarks.

Mr. Kerrio: Say you're sorry.

Mr. Roy: All I can say is that this legislation is not perfect. But I say that in the circumstances it is a step forward and I, as a member of the committee, feel pretty proud to have participated in the deliberations.

Mr. Bounsall: He has his judgeship now.

The House divided on the motion for third reading of Bill 59, which was approved on the following vote:

APPENDIX

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1978

STANDING RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE

The committee met at 10:05 a.m.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BOARD

Mr. Acting Chairman: I now see a quorum. If it meets with the committee's approval, the chairman of the board will make an opening statement.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I would like to introduce the people who are with me here from the Compensation Board: Al MacDonald to my left, vice-chairman of administration, Doug Hamilton, corporate board member and appeals commissioner, and Ken Harding, our secretary.

Mr. McClellan: Could I have a copy of the opening address?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Yes, sir, it will be distributed to you.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Minister and members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, the board's 1976 annual report was tabled in the Legislature last June and, of course, we are all here ready and prepared to answer any questions concerning that report. However, I would also like to review for you the highlights of our operations in 1977 and the opening months of this year in order to bring you up to date.

In the past two calendar years the board has annually been authorizing payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act for approximately 400,000 claims and awarding upwards of $350 million, with most of this money going directly to injured workers. The enormous work load represented by such figures has been sustained by our organization day in and day out, while at the same time significant improvements have been installed in our systems.

I would like to itemize just a few of our activities at the board since January 1, 1977, and I offer these as representative of a host of other activities all directed at the same objective, and that is helping the injured worker and his family.

We established and opened three new information service offices in 1977—at Timmins, Sault Ste. Marie and St. Catharines—and a fourth one last month, at Kingston. Thus, we now have 12 local offices outside the Metropolitan Toronto area, as compared with six three years ago. Our staff in the claims adjudication branch was increased by 85 in 1977, and we now have approximately 300 claims adjudicators altogether.

I think we have mentioned on previous occasions that it takes three years to train a claims adjudicator, and many of our adjudicators are still in the training phase as a result of our expansion to provide a better service.

Concerning industrial disease, we conducted extensive investigations last year in Hamilton steel companies to locate possible victims of cancer from coke oven byproducts. A team from the board visited 15 asbestos product companies during the year to search for employees who may have died from or contracted mesothelioma, lung cancer or gastrointestinal cancer. Last December, the board recognized lung cancer from above-ground exposure to radon gas as compensable, and in January we decided to award permanent disability pensions for white-finger disease caused by vibrating tools used by miners. If we were not the first jurisdiction to make such awards, we were among the first.

The board's staff of vocational rehabilitation counsellors was increased from 86 at the year-end of 1976 to 114 a year later, permitting an average case-load of 74 per counsellor in 1977, which was down from 91 the previous year. This enables us to provide vocational services more quickly and in greater depth than before.

In March of last year, the board welcomed the governor of Ohio, the hon. James Rhodes, on a study trip to our hospital and rehabilitation centre. He was accompanied by a considerable entourage of state officials, specialists and newspapermen. He visited Toronto for one purpose only: To inspect the board's hospital and rehabilitation centre, because of Ohio's need for similar facilities. He was just one of 963 visitors who came here to study our centre last year from the United States, from Canada, Australia, Mexico, Cuba, South America, Japan, New Zealand, Argentina, China, Sweden, England, and other countries.

Mr. Laughren: See what publicity does for you?

Hon. Mr. Starr: We always welcome good publicity.

Incidentally, about 50 per cent of the patients who come to our centre are admitted at the request of their own local physician or specialist, and about 40 per cent of admissions were arranged by board doctors, attached to our claims adjudication sections, who monitor the quality and effectiveness of treatment provided to injured workers throughout the province.

One of the major values of the centre's location in Metro Toronto is the availability of a wide range of highly experienced consultants from the Toronto teaching hospitals, who provide us with a concentration of expertise not available elsewhere in the province.

One more word about our hospital and rehabilitation centre: Last year it received class A accreditation from the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation, for the training of medical and paramedical personnel in rehabilitation medicine.

I would also like to direct your attention at this time to some relatively recent developments in our appeals system. Last November, we changed the function of appeals examiner to that of appeals adjudicator. The appeals adjudicators have decision-making authority, and this change is expediting the appeals process.

[10:15]

Beginning in January of this year, we scheduled the first hearings of appeal boards outside the city of Toronto. The appeal board, a panel of three commissioners, is the final level of appeal, and from now on appeal boards will travel regularly throughout Ontario to hear appeals in various larger population centres.

Last year, the board received about 3,600 appeals, including many which derived from claims made in earlier years, and compared to the enormous number of claims decisions made in 1977 the number of appeals received was very small. However, appeals represent some of the most difficult and complex problems we deal with and therefore require a heavy investment of time by experienced personnel.

In the recent past, you have undoubtedly heard, as I have, some critics of the board stating that we should give more individual attention to injured workers. I have heard it said, for instance, that every injured worker in the province should be entitled to at least one interview with a board counsellor.

As I have already stated, the board authorizes payment on about 400,000 new claims each year and this is, of course, in addition to the service we are providing to many many thousands of active claims from previous years. Surely, Mr. Chairman, I don't have to go into the elementary mathematics which show that individual counselling could not possibly be provided to such large numbers of people.

More than 60 per cent of the claims we pay in any given year are medical aid only claims where the injured worker has not been disabled beyond the day of the accident from earning full wages. In these cases, the worker goes back on the job the same day or the next working day and the board pays his medical bills. Of workers in this category, obviously only a few would have any reason to see a counsellor.

The other 40 per cent of claims are lost-time claims. In these cases, the worker is off the job, he is in a hospital or at home, and in these cases we pay compensation, 75 per cent of lost wages, tax free. However, in 80 per cent of all lost-time claims, the injured worker's claim has been adjudicated and paid, his treatment has been brought to a successful conclusion and the worker is fit and ready to go back to his job all within eight weeks.

The vast majority of these injured workers have one basic demand. They want their compensation cheques in the mail as soon as possible and their medical bills paid. Within the limitations of outside factors and our own capabilities, that is the service we deliver to this majority. In the process of meeting this demand, while complying with the requirements of the Workmen's Compensation Act, we receive more than four million pieces of mail. We post nearly five and a half million outgoing envelopes and we issue more than one and a quarter million cheques every year.

However, we do have another constituency that requires and receives a very different kind of service. I refer to those injured workers, who for any number of reasons, need individual, person-to-person service and need a great deal of it. Some of our most experienced claims and rehabilitation executives estimate that 90 per cent of the work in their respective divisions is accounted for by 10 per cent of all claims received by the board. That is, 90 per cent of our work load is accounted for by those injured workers who need and are given individual attention.

Let me give you a few numbers as examples. Last year 38,000 injured workers visited our seventh floor claims counselling section at the head office. They met there with claims counsellors and other specialists. There was no time limit on any of these meetings. The problems at hand were resolved in 35 different languages. If any of these visitors needed money that same day because of hardship and were entitled to it, they got it. We disbursed $3.8 million this way last year in instant funds in the form of cheques drawn up immediately.

Or, again, consider the work of our vocational rehabilitation counsellors. Last year these counsellors conducted 22,000 personal interviews in the Toronto area and made nearly 100,000 out-of-office visits throughout the province to homes of injured workers or to employers on their behalf. I submit that our record of service to injured workers is a record of achievement.

I hope that the foregoing summary of our operations will refute ill-informed criticism.

I am going to discuss a matter which will, I am sure, interest all members of this committee. I am referring to the decentralization of claims adjudication. The idea of decentralizing claims adjudication is a simple one and on a superficial basis it is very attractive. From other viewpoints—equity, consistency, administration and cost—it is enormously complex.

Last year the board directed its management committee to assess the possibilities and the committee, after considering the matter carefully, brought in a recommendation. Their recommendation was that the concept of decentralized adjudication be accepted in principle to the extent that the board should commission an independent analysis by a firm of management consultants of the impact of decentralized claims adjudication, as it would affect our entire organization. The management committee's recommendation further said that the consultants should carry out detailed research and planning on methods of implementing a system of decentralized claims adjudication and provide us with an estimate of the associated costs.

We are now evaluating research proposals from several leading consulting companies and I expect a decision will be reached very shortly. We anticipate that the consultants we appoint will be able to report to the board with recommendations by the end of September this year. I think it is appropriate to remind you that a good deal of decentralization of board activities has already taken place.

I mentioned earlier in these remarks the opening of four new local offices. This, together with the strengthening of our existing area offices, has resulted in the deployment of more claims counsellors throughout the province. Many of our vocational rehabilitation counsellors have been moved out of the Toronto area to be based in regional cities. For some years now, board physicians evaluating permanent disability have been conducting examinations throughout the province. Last year more than 2,300 patients were examined outside Toronto for this purpose. Our new travelling appeal boards are another move in this same direction.

Before I close, I would like to mention that within the past year we have reorganized and strengthened our communications functions. Our public affairs division has been divided into a communications division and a safety education division. Under new direction and with augmented staff, the communications division is explaining the board's functions to the public and preparing and implementing programs to enlist the cooperation of workers and managers with the objective of making our services more effective. I am confident that our newly reorganized communications division will play a major role in dispelling misunderstandings and in refuting misrepresentations about the board that have become current in recent years.

Finally, I wish to pay a well deserved tribute to our board staff. No one who works at the board finds life a soft touch. We are a very demanding employer and the injured workers we serve can be more demanding than any employer ever could be. However, you won't find any professional complainers at the board.

An hon. member: Only grieving workers.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Our job is to serve the injured workers of Ontario with concern, with commitment, with expertise and with a lot of hard work. That is the job we do.

Mr. Mancini: First of all, I would like to thank the minister for being here today. We all know how rough she feels this morning. I would also like to thank the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board for his introductory remarks. I appreciated the information that was made available to the standing resources development committee this morning by the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, but there are still many things left unanswered. I am going to have many questions and I am going to try to fit them all in with my opening statements.

Let me say I am quite pleased to be here on behalf of the Liberal Party and to give the opening introductory remarks. First of all, we must realize that Canada, being an industrialized country, has and has had one of the highest, if not the highest, death rate from industrial accidents of the 10 most industrialized countries. Secondly, we must realize that deaths, especially in the construction area, have also been amongst the highest, if not the highest, of the 10 most industrialized countries of the western world over the past few years.

Once we assume that and accept those facts, we realize just how important the Workmen's Compensation Board is in our society. We realize why members of the opposition, and even members of the government party, have been critical, and possibly very critical, of the board's handling of matters over the past few years. We are this way because the problem is huge and we are this way because injury is devastating to the family life, the social life, and the wellbeing of the person in general.

We hope when we come before the committee and we give strong criticisms and strong recommendations that they are taken in that light. It is done this way because of the tremendous social implications that injury causes and not because we want to be chronic complainers. I am sure we can do other things with our time than be chronic complainers.

In the next few minutes I have I would like to strike up two or three basic themes that I hope to carry on. One is that I firmly believe, even with your decentralization, and even with your many improvements—and we know you are trying—the board's appeal process is still very complicated. I would say the reason you have had only 3,600 appeals to the final appeal board adjudication is that many of the injured workers get lost in the shuffle.

When you respond to my remarks, I want to know if you have any kind of a system which you have developed over the many years the board has been in operation to better ensure that injured workers do not get lost in the shuffle through the appeal board system. I want an answer to that.

Secondly, I would like to touch on the theme of payments to injured workers. We know that injured workers have not had an increase since July, 1975. Thirdly, I would also like to touch on the representation that injured workers receive as they are going through the appeal board process. Let me take the issue of payments first.

I don't think any institution that provides the type of service the board does can give any good sound reason as to why it has not increased the widow's pension; as to why it has not increased pensions to workers who were injured 10 and 20 years ago; and as to why the ceiling of $15,000 has not been raised. There is no good reason why injured workers should have to lose their Canada

Pension Plan benefits and their Unemployment Insurance Commission benefits.

I have raised this question in the Legislature with the minister. She continually says she is working on the problem, but she never issues any press releases as to what she has done or what she intends to do in the future about this matter. We heard in the Legislature not too long ago, after a question by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. S. Smith), why injured workers have not received an increase in pay since 1975. The minister responded, as reasonably as she could, I imagine, that the reason they have not received an increase—it will be three years this July—is that the board was doing a study.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. member to check Hansard? I didn't say the board was doing a study. The board is not doing a study.

Mr. Mancini: Well, who is doing the study?

Hon. B. Stephenson: It was commissioned by me. The Wyatt Company is doing the study.

Mr. Mancini: You are doing the study then.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes.

Mr. McClellan: The board asked for a study?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No.

Mr. Laughren: They didn't? That's disgraceful.

Mr. Mancini: If I could have the floor back, the minister gave a speech to the Industrial Accident Prevention Association conference on April 4, 1974. I can give her a copy afterwards if she likes. On page 6 it says: "We are at this time undertaking a major financial review of the funding function operation of the board to ensure that we are not overlooking any areas in which improvement of a functional or financial organization may be affected." I take that to mean you have been reviewing the area of benefits to injured workers since April 4, 1974. I take that to mean that you are taking an awfully long time to decide whether or not injured workers need or deserve an increase in their benefits.

I submit to you that it doesn't need to take this long. All we have to do is to look at the rate of inflation we have had over the past two or three years and any reasonable minister would have instituted at least some type of raise for these injured workers in the meantime. If she really needed this report, she would have had some measure or some program in the meantime to help these people out.

Also in the same speech on page 8, the minister stated: "We have had 433,000 claims made to the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1976." Yet this is the same minister who opposed the standing resources development committee's effort to have mandatory safety committees in all the work places. I want that to be on the record.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is a non sequitur, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Laughren: It shouldn't bother the minister.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It doesn't.

Mr. Mancini: Another matter that has been raised by myself in the Legislature, concerning the rights of workers and how to better ensure that workers do not get lost in the shuffle and are able to receive proper representation—other than having their local member there, and we can't be at all of them—is the hiring of more workmen's advisers. In 1966 the Workmen's Compensation Board had one workmen's adviser. Twelve years later, in 1978, we have two workmen's advisers.

I guess if a person wanted to look on the positive side, we could say we've had a 100 per cent increase in the last 12 years. But if you want to look at the other side of the coin, I guess you could say that we are drastically short of workmen's advisers and that we need more.

Most of the workers I talk to don't even realize that there are workmen's advisers and not only do the workers not know that there are no workmen's advisers, I submit that most of the smaller unions and worker representatives outside of the district of Toronto probably do not know that there are workmen's advisers. I say this from personal experience. We have a rather substantial industrial area in my riding and the representatives of the workers there were not aware of the workers' advisers system.

On many occasions I have had to cancel hearings on the appeal board procedures because I could not get the workmen's adviser because he was already tied up. There's no possible way that you, as minister, can justify having only two workmen's advisers there. I asked a question on this at least six or eight months ago, and I haven't heard of any other workmen's advisers being hired. I would like to say, though, that I believe that the workmen's advisers have done a fair and equitable job. I think that they have been really good for the Workmen's Compensation Board but I don't understand why you don't hire a couple more, or as many as we think we need.

Recently, the board has put out a booklet, The Workmen's Compensation Board of Ontario—How It Works and How It Works For You. On the inside front page, it says: "Protecting Ontario's working men and women: In the early years of this century before the development of the Workmen's Compensation Board in Canada, a worker injured on the job was alone in seeking financial redress. Some employers voluntarily accepted their responsibility for taking care of injured workers. However if an employer was not so inclined then the courts were the only recourse available. This was a long and costly process with odds stacked against the limited resources of the worker."

Although things have changed and although it's now the duty of the Workmen's Compensation Board to give redress to a worker and although he does not have to hire legal counsel if he does not wish to, I still submit to you that the process is long and the odds are stacked against the injured worker. I say that for one or two reasons.

Take an injured worker who has a severe injury. The management of the institution where he works refuses to accept that injury as an injury having taken place in his work force on his work site. The injured worker makes his claim, his claim is refuted; he goes before the local appeals adjudicator and the management staff—and probably two or three months have passed with no money coming in before he's had this date set up. If he accepts sick benefits then he cannot continue to appeal his claim; so he doesn't accept funds from the sick benefits and continues to appeal his claim for the very simple and sole reason that he is going to need a compensable pension, because in future his injury will probably get worse. So at the present time, he cannot accept his sick benefits because he's appealing his workmen's compensation claim.

Interjection.

Mr. Mancini: Don't tell me it's not true, because it is true. I'll document the cases after, if you wish.

So, secondly, he goes before the appeals adjudicator in the Windsor area, for example. The claim is heard. The gentleman says, "Fine. Thank you for being honest. We like your forthright manner. You'll be hearing from us." It takes another three to four weeks.

If the claim goes against the worker then he has to make the appeal to the final appeal board level here in Toronto. It takes, I would say, at least six or eight weeks, if not longer, to set up that hearing. If he can get a workmen's adviser at that date, fine. If not, he has to postpone it and wait until he can. So we're talking about a period of possibly four, five, six months from the first time the man has put in his claim until he finally comes down to meet with the appeal board.

Many hundreds of workers go in front of the appeal board and after the hearing the board says, "Fine, thank you. We'll let you know." A period of time passes. If the man's claim is accepted, fine; he gets all the back pay. I don't know what he's had to do to keep his family in their home and to put food on the table for the previous six months. They probably had to go on welfare, or they probably had to get a second mortgage on their home or what have you.

Do you think that is fair? Do you think that is right? Why is it not set up so that if an injured worker is appealing his claim against the Workmen's Compensation Board he is automatically allowed to receive sick benefits from his place of work? He should be automatically allowed to receive these benefits.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But there's nothing that says that he can't receive these benefits.

Mr. Mancini: Well, maybe when you're down in Leamington, I can take you to the H. J. Heinz Company and we can go speak with the personnel manager there, and maybe we can go over the whole thing.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's got to be a management decision.

Mr. Mancini: Now we're getting to the point where maybe you're not agreeing with your own booklet. It cannot be a management decision. It's got to be a decision of your ministry in conjunction with the Workmen's Compensation Board. It's got to be your decision that when a person becomes injured on the work force, he doesn't have to go bankrupt or go on welfare or go six months without any kind of money before his claim is finally adjudicated. I think that's a fair and just privilege that we should give to our injured workers.

I'd now like to talk about your second injury and enhancement fund which provides relief to employers who hire disabled workers. I have some questions about this. Maybe the chairman could answer when I am finished.

I'd like to know how many employers have taken advantage of this program. I'd like to know how many injured workers have been hired under the second injury and enhancement fund, and I'd like to know what this has cost the board. And I'd like to know how many inquiries per week, per month or per year—whichever is easiest for the board to answer—they have had from employers concerning the second injury and enhancement fund, because I'm not too sure how successful this program is. It should be a successful program because we need to hire injured workers here in this society.

That leads me to another situation—the pensionable benefits for injured workers, what the Workmen's Compensation Board requires them to do, and what makes this second injury fund so important as far as I'm concerned. For example, we have injured workers who have suffered substantial injury—and I'm using your standards of 40 or 50 per cent pension. My own personal experience as a member has been that before the board gives out a 40 or 50 per cent pension, the worker is severely injured. In my opinion, it is almost impossible for him to go back—no, I would say it is impossible for him to go back—to his former employment or anywhere near his former employment.

These people have had their wages cut in half. What are we doing—what is your ministry doing, what is your board doing—to ensure that these people are given a fair shake in life; to ensure that they are going to be hired; and to ensure that you have a program which is successful in this area? That's why I ask the question about your second injury fund.

We all know that we need proper staff and that we need good people to take care of the many thousands of injured workers that we have in our society. I was slightly disturbed when on January 20, 1977, some information was brought to my attention that in the province of Ontario industry felt, or government felt—or someone felt—that we were short of many hundreds of occupational health nurses and occupational hygienists, and short of some occupational health physicians. I'm sure the minister would know about this.

You are, supposedly, to work with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. I wonder if in your answer you could inform this committee exactly what has been done in the last year or two to speed up enrolment in these areas where we need these professional people to assist our injured workers.

Also, I would like to know what types of links you have set up between your occupational health and safety branch and the Workmen's Compensation Board. I would also like to know when you're going to raise the benefits for the injured workers; when the injured workers could expect their first increase in almost three years.

Not too long ago I was going over the report of a task force done, I believe, in 1973. The present chairman was a member of that task force, I believe. They made many recommendations concerning the Workmen's Compensation Board and they had a little summary in the back of what the board would look like in 1980. I think we have to renew our interest in that area, and I would suggest to the minister that she immediately set up a task force of all members of the Legislature so that we can go through the issue of the Workmen's Compensation Board in a very concrete—

Mr. Lupusella: Is this a standard procedure which your party is following these days?

Mr. Mancini: Pardon? Shut up your button there.

I would suggest to the minister that we have a task force set up immediately so that we can look at the board's activities—

Mr. Lupusella: That's a new way of doing it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I can see that.

Mr. Mancini: —in a fair manner and, hopefully, make recommendations to the minister and to the chairman of the board. I submit to the chairman that if it was necessary in 1973 to have this done, then it is necessary again in 1978, so that we can be prepared for the eighties. With that I will close my remarks.

Hon. B. Stephenson: If I could just lead off briefly, I would point out to the hon. member that the representation by workers' representatives is noted in five languages in the brochure which is sent out in every case of rejection of a claim, so that each individual workman knows precisely what his rights are under the appeal system. It is spelled out, I think, relatively clearly and the presence and availability of workers' representatives is spelled out in the very last paragraph on each page, and it's in five languages. Why unions would not know that it's there, I really can't tell you, but if they read the information which is provided they should know.

The relationship between the Workmen's Compensation Board and the occupational health and safety division of the Ministry of Labour has been raised. The information-sharing procedure is enhanced over what it has been in the past, which will be of value to both of us, and I think this will undoubtedly help both the occupational health and safety division and the Workmen's Compensation Board to better service in prevention and in dealing with problems than they have been able to in the past.

I can tell the hon. member that the bulk of the funds which have been available to the Ministry of Labour under the provincial lottery grant of $5 million have been directed towards educational programs at community college levels and at universities. I would say almost 90 per cent of that funding at the present time has gone to that kind of program—to community colleges to provide the basis for training for occupational health nurses and hygienists and to universities to increase the research base and the capability for professional training in medical schools and engineering schools.

So, indeed, there is a—actually I shouldn't say it's a renewed focus because it is a brand new focus on occupational health and safety which has not been there before and which is most certainly being supported vigorously by not only the health professionals but by the funding which we have had made available to us. That is where it has gone, because we really do have a dire shortage of professionals in this area and it is a need which must be met as rapidly as possible.

Hon. Mr. Starr: If I can just add to what the minister has said, on every decision which is not to the satisfaction of a claimant, he has a right of appeal. He is advised in each and every instance, as the minister has pointed out, in five languages, and certainly in the appeals section the matters are not stacked, as the hon. member has pointed out, against the claimant. Far from it, as a matter of fact. There is about 30 to 40 per cent reversals of decisions which went originally against the claimant through the appeals section.

We have two workers' advisers and now we have hired a third one just within the last few weeks in order to augment that service, which is looked upon by most people as very excellent with good results.

Of course, when you mention union representatives who represent workers, they know of the appeal system; every one of those people knows. The union people are all well versed. They have had, over the years, seminars throughout the province where our people have attended and they are well equipped and knowledgeable in this area. In nine cases out of 10 they want to represent the workers themselves, their own union members.

Mr. Mancini: What about the second matter mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Starr: On your other questions, which are statistical in nature, you can rest assured that we will gather the information for you.

Mr. Mancini: Okay, fine. Thank you.

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: We can give you the dollar figure now. It's $30 million last year for the second injury fund.

Mr. Mancini: $30 million?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: That's about one-tenth of the awards.

Mr. Mancini: If we can get that information later that will be satisfactory.

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: We have made a note of your questions. We'll get the other statistics for you.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Would you also please give us the name of that individual at the H. J. Heinz Company?

Mr. Mancini: Sure, no problem.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Something is rotten in that case. I'm not sure what it is, but there is no proscription against the receipt of funds through the insurance program within the company on the basis of an appeal to the Workmen's Compensation Board, to my knowledge at any rate.

Mr. Hamilton: There is no bar on that.

Hon. B. Stephenson: None.

Mr. Haggerty: Has the board any up to date information that the committee could be using this morning in our discussions? I notice you have a brief there with—

Hon. Mr. Starr: In addition to the annual statement for 1976, my statement now covers the additional aspects.

Mr. Haggerty: You haven't anything current then? You are almost a year behind.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No.

Hon. Mr. Starr: My statement covered other matters and was right up to date almost in that respect. If there are any questions about information we haven't been able to give you, that's what we are here for. We would like to get it for you.

Mr. Bounsall: I might just say I am glad to be back as our party's critic for the Workmen's Compensation Board after a rest of a couple of years or more. The party decided I could only stand the board for so long, and close to five years was enough. I am glad to be back in a masochistic sort of way as the spokesman for our party on the Workmen's Compensation Board. Following the 1975 election, as you know, this post was quite ably taken up by the member for Dovercourt (Mr. Lupusella) who will be speaking in some depth later on this morning and for the last 11 months by the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) who will be speaking in some depth this morning.

Having had the post back for only five weeks now, I am not as prepared this morning as I will be this fall, when we will be discussing your annual report for the year 1977. This is rather an unusually late time in the year to be discussing the 1976 report but we know how that arose, because of the election and the short sitting of last fall. So we look forward this fall to looking at the annual report for 1977. In that regard, what I would like to do with the board some time between now and then, probably shortly after the annual report comes out, is to sit down with the board—probably the critics from the two parties—and in the discussion which we have on that annual report to develop a method of how we are going to approach it.

What has been weak in the past and probably will be weak again for this set of estimates is the way in which the approach will be very scattered. One person will talk on rehab and answers will be given. Someone else will come in later and bring up the same point. What I am saying is not to discuss estimates per se of the Workmen's Compensation Board but to set it up as if we were discussing estimates by topic so that there will be a certain section at a certain time.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Pardon me, I think, sir, in addition to that, which is a very excellent suggestion, those who will be responsible could spend a couple of days at the various areas they are interested in at the Compensation Board to see how it functions. That would be valuable to the members.

Mr. Bounsall: Right, that would be valuable to many of them. I think we have to sit down and set it up. For example, I would say we could usefully spend four two and a half-hour periods per year on the annual report of the Workmen's Compensation Board before committee. If we organized what topics were coming up in what order and how many hours were assigned to them, that would allow you to bring the particular staff members down for those particular meetings rather than having all of the staff here throughout the course of it, even though today, because of the time sequences and the lateness of the discussion, it's all being done on one day. That is a most unusual pattern to be following.

In my remarks about the board and as critic for some years in the past, I kept rather strictly away from the personalities of the board. I always felt uncomfortable in dealing with issues that related to personalities. I did not applaud your appointment as Workmen's Compensation Board chairman, Mr. Starr, as many in our party did, partly because I see the person filling the job as chairman as being able to have some sort of general influence on the attitudes or the operations of the board. That is the function of the personality of the person that we watch for, but in day-to-day terms and how things should be operating, those are much more matters of principle.

I'm not saying it's unimportant who is chairman of the board but I'm saying his powers, or his ability to have basic changes occur in the board, are limited. He or she can only do so much. So, in terms of my criticism in the past and from here on in, it will not be personally-related. I didn't applaud you because I didn't think you would be better than the previous chairman. I did not applaud you because I thought that in most areas—although you, as a person, could set an attitude and an atmosphere—whoever occupies the post could not basically change the method of operation. The method of operation touches on matters of principle.

That's the way I will proceed, as far as I can see, for the future—not that in one particular area this morning I find myself having a focus on a particular personality because of the results of that person's approach to doing the job. I'll have some suggestions as to what the board might do about that particular person.

I can well see that the chairman may not react favourably to the suggestion of Mr. Mancini that there be another task force report on the Workmen's Compensation Board, because a task force report resulted in the appointment of you as the chairman. I would think maybe from your point of view that might not be too positive a thing to do at this point.

On that same point, Mr. Chairman—if I can break my rule and be personal—I don't know how many years you have to go until retirement, but I would be very interested—and I hope you have this in mind and will take the suggestion at least semi-seriously—if you would publish your memoirs. I would really like to see written out, at some point, your view as chairman of the board. I don't mean in any defensive way, but your story of your years spent as chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, the problems as you saw them and the ways in which you tried to encounter and overcome those problems and where those problems came from. I'm sure the majority of your problems—we would like it to be so and this is why the memoirs would be interesting—do not come from the NDP members of the Legislature. I'm sure you have problems in your day-to-day operation of the board which are much more vexing than the statements that come from various members of the Legislature or from our party. I'm sure the major problems come from the Ministers of Labour with whom you have to deal. I'm confident of that.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No doubt.

Mr. Bounsell: No doubt.

You touched this morning in your statement upon publicity of the board, and a comment came from the member for Nickel Belt about always welcoming publicity. I think you should. Whether that publicity appears at the time to be very stiff criticism, one should always welcome it and not react unduly defensively to it. There may be inaccuracies, usually not from our party, in that criticism—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Who is writing your script this morning, Ted?

Mr. Bounsell: I haven't written anything out, that's the problem.

Mr. Laughren: I knew there was a problem.

Hon. Mr. Starr: If I may, Mr. Bounsell, say in augmenting your statement regarding publicity, I welcome it, particularly from members who are very critical. It gives me an opportunity to fill in the gaps that they have regarding the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Mr. Laughren: He is speaking as a private member this morning.

Mr. Bounsell: I will leave that argument to be very aptly placed by the member for Nickel Belt when he has the floor. I don't think there are many inaccuracies in our report that came from rambling around the province with a committee on which I served. But to be serious, I'm a little bit concerned about the defensive reactions to that report. To point out, if you can, where the gaps are is quite legitimate. But the kind of publicity given to the board—overstatements of that sort—can be very useful in terms of the short term and long term operations of the board. People at the board should recognize this and not take an undue over-reaction at the time to what appears to be, and is, a critical document.

In the matters of principle that I wish to speak to today—and I will be relatively short; I'll be much more detailed in the fall—the one area that is of major overall concern to myself is the way in which the pensions are related. They are unrelated to the recipients' employability. They are related primarily to the degree of physical disability, not to their employability. That, basically, has got to change for Workmen's Compensation Board pension recipients in the province.

If I may quote the Act, it says: "Where permanent disability results from the injury, the impairment of earning capacity of the employee shall be estimated from the nature and degree of the injury and the compensation shall be weekly or other periodical payments during the lifetime of the employee." My comment is how those words about "impairment of earning capacity" have become changed in their application. The Act goes on and says, "The board may compile a weighting schedule," and that schedule has become almost totally related to the degree of physical disability. It is not related to any employability factor or any impairment of earning capacity. That is what must change for fairness and equity to prevail for the injured workmen of Ontario who have a residual permanent disability and must go on a pension.

I can give you some very simple examples of how—I'm sure I don't need to for the members of the committee who have ever handled a Workmen's Compensation Board case—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. Bounsall, in those cases, for the purpose of a disability pension, we also apply section 42(5).

Mr. Bounsall: I'm looking at section 42(5) now—I had it in place before me on a sheet.

The problem is, though, there is a transition period that exists now that didn't used to exist, in which you do pay an additional sum to someone who has applied for vocational rehabilitation and is sent out to work. I'll cover that. If those persons get back to work, I'm fully aware that if the earnings are less than what they had before the injury there is provision in the Act to pay that difference in the amount, or a large part of it. That is one part of that approach; but you have really missed the main thrust when you say that does it.

We are talking about those persons who are mainly disabled to the point where they are having one hell of a time finding employment, irrespective of the employment situation out there. In basing their pension primarily on physical disability, with only small consideration given to their employability, that person is severely disadvantaged.

Hon. Mr. Starr: May I interrupt? We have to go back to July 1974 when the first amendment came into effect, and that was section 41. Prior to that, any person who was reported by his physician to be able to take any light work at that time was immediately cut to 50 per cent, which we felt was rather unjust. Then section 41 came into being and that person—co-operating with the vocational rehabilitation counsellor and on his own looking actively for work that he could perform with his injury—would receive his full compensation indefinitely.

Mr. Bounsall: Is that a commitment? Because it does not happen in Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Oh no, as long as he is co-operating and looking for work that is suitable for him. There is no time limit.

Mr. Bounsall: I will not today point out the cases where this is not the case in Windsor. That is not the purpose for these estimates today, except to say that that is the theory.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That is the way the Act reads. It is set out in the Act.

Mr. Bounsall: That is the way the Act reads. In the application of the Act that in fact does not occur indefinitely.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Okay, then let's look at the disability award. Immediately when that person is given a disability award, and he does co-operate in the same way as though he was on full compensation—he's looking for work and co-operating with his vocational rehabilitation counsellor—he is eligible for that supplementary which brings him up to full compensation. In exactly the same way. That is all I wanted to say. There is no limitation set out in the Act.

Mr. Bounsall: Let me finish making the general suggestions to the board and to the minister—which I hope you will take seriously—and I will cover what happens in the vocational rehabilitation offices around the province as my second point.

Both Manitoba and Saskatchewan have these two components of disability recognized separately—the physical disability and their earning capacity loss. They recognize them and compensate for them separately. I am saying to the Workmen's Compensation Board here, this is now the way you should be operating—or something close to that.

What they tend to do is—I am not sure this is a great idea; that can be thought about more—they give a lump sum settlement for the physical disability side of it, and a pension related to the earnings capacity.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We do also, providing it is 10 per cent or less.

Mr. Bounsall: It needs to be a more widespread situation. Let me just give you two examples.

The researcher who helps me in our caucus on this points out that under the present board situation if she lost a limb at work—got her hand mangled in the photostat machine and ended up losing a limb—her earning capacity would not be endangered one iota. She would continue to function as a researcher for our caucus with no impairment of earnings. Yet she would get a substantial lifetime pension because of the loss of that limb. Yet a typist, in a much lower earning capacity, not able to continue at her chosen profession, would get a permanent disability award which because of her earnings in the first place would be considerably less, and there would be virtually no prospects for her continuing in that profession. That is the general sort of case we have in the province which must be changed in order that that sort of discrepancy is not widespread.

A second instance I have is an individual in the city of Windsor, whose name will go unmentioned here. He is one of those few people who has completely recovered from what would commonly be called a broken back, but his pension rating was given at the time in which it looked as if he had stabilized. Needless to say it was a rather high pension. This person is now fully back to work at the job he has, receiving a very high pension from the Workmen's Compensation Board, because at one point he had this very severe back injury. He is one of those funny examples of now having no back problems whatsoever—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you want to give us his claim number?

Mr. Bounsall: No, I don't.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I didn't think so.

Hon. B. Stephenson: If he's old enough his osteoarthritis will take care of it anyway.

Mr. Bounsall: Right, there could be that sort of a problem in the future.

Mr. Lupusella: That is the way the board has been operating for the last two years: "Give me the claim number and we will try and solve the problem." That is completely wrong.

Mr. Warner: Never the general problem.

Mr. Lupusella: We are here to raise certain principles.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Order please.

[11:15]

Mr. Bounsall: All I'm saying is you have a system which should adequately take care of those anomalies which occur more equitably than it does. You have to devise a system which, in my opinion, as the months and years go on is much more subtle and more sophisticated than the approach is now in a whole host of areas.

I just want to touch on, and say it very briefly, it's taking an incredibly long time—this is not to the chairman of the board per se but primarily to the minister—to get this financial study completed, which will result in this long overdue increase in the pensions which are in so many cases badly needed.

Since 1975 the cost of living has increased about 17 per cent by now, the average industrial wage has gone up slightly over 20 per cent, and there should be an automatic provision in this Act to adjust it, I would suggest to the industrial composite average not the cost of living average. There's one area in which you could argue that it should be tied to the job rate or some industrial composite rate. Of all the programs that one has in the province of Ontario, the Workmen's Compensation Board is one area where it would be reasonable so to do, rather than tie it to the cost of living. If you like, relate it to the gross provincial product as a better index, so they share in the ever-increasing wealth of the province rather than the simple cost of living.

I could go on about widows' pensions. In Ontario, they're at $286 a month. If the spouse has been killed or dies after receiving 100 per cent pension, the sharp drop that occurs needs to be provided for. You have the worker who is killed in the work place and then that widow goes to the $286 a month with some adjustments if there are dependants. We understand that, but it's an abrupt change in lifestyle and earnings for that person and I think one could get into the transition type period that occurs in both the Saskatchewan and the Manitoba plans and in Australia.

In Saskatchewan, the widow or widower receives the 100 per cent pension for a five-year period, during which time that gives them time to adapt, get back into the work force, at which point the present figure in their Act is a reduction to $300 a month thereafter. Manitoba pays 100 per cent to the widow or widower, reduced by a factor called the dependency factor. That factor is dependent upon whether that widow or widower is working full-time, part-time, or what have you, and we need some plan of that sort in order that you don't have that abrupt change. We need something to compensate for that abrupt change that occurs. There should be a transition period.

I suspect that I would opt for a period as long as Saskatchewan's. You may well opt for a period shorter than Saskatchewan's, I suspect. You may well prefer to take the dependency factor approach of Manitoba to it, but something should be done to alleviate that abruptness of change in those very critical and shocking cases where the worker is killed in the work place. The view of the shock of that, plus the loss of income shock which also accompanies it, there's got to be a transition period that gives widow or widower time to adjust.

Just briefly, on the rehabilitation hospital in Downsview, may I just say of your statement of this morning that you have received a class A accreditation from the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation for the training of medical and paramedical personnel in rehabilitation medicine, I am not surprised at that because I think you probably do a good job in the training of medical and paramedical personnel in rehabilitation medicine.

Before I give you any more accolades, let me say that you probably have—no doubt have—a deserved accolade in the way in which you have treated, in medical rehabilitation terms, the amputee. You have, in fact, a world-wide, well-deserved reputation in how you handle the amputee situation, and I say to the injured workmen of Ontario who come at the rate of four per Saturday morning into my constituency office, "It's too bad the injury did not result in an amputation, because you would be in a much better position re treatment and pension from the Workmen's Compensation Board than the current state in which you are, in which the board doesn't know how to deal with that particular kind of injury."

The vast majority of them are back injuries—not that I'm saying that their backs should be amputated—but you have not made that much headway ever in the back-injury category. I would say to you that with the expertise you clearly have in medical terms in some areas, with back problems being as big a problem as they are—and it's not an easy one to resolve—you should start making now a major research effort to become the world's best authority on how you treat and how you handle back injuries.

You've done it with amputees; let's now do it for the one category which is so hard to determine, and that is the back injury. Put your mind to it, do it; start the doing of it. You've probably started the doing of it now, but do whatever you have to do to make yourself the world authority in determination and dealing with the back-injury problem, even if you have to import specialist doctors from other countries of the world.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We are away ahead of them in that respect.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Miles ahead.

Mr. Bounsall: Get at it, because that research will become world-wide research. I guess that simply points out how far the world has to go yet in dealing effectively with back injuries, because it still isn't being done yet to any degree of satisfaction—certainly not emotional satisfaction—in the province of Ontario.

On vocational rehabilitation, we all welcomed the change in the Act in 1974 that got rid of the 50 per cent level and brought in the recommendation that if you're continuing to receive vocational or medical rehabilitation, you would continue on your compensation. That really was a change, a very large step forward in your attitude towards injured workmen. You have to look, however, very carefully at what is going on out there in those vocational rehabilitation offices, because those offices are slowly becoming as big a source of frustration to the injured workmen as other parts of your program have been in the past.

Your guideline to those vocational rehabilitation officers which says to them, again taking the wrong attitude—the completely wrong attitude, I might say—that the degree of retraining, the amount of retraining they will give is going to be related to, and must be related to, the degree of physical disability, irrespective of how employable that person may become if he goes on a certain program, is again an attitude which just blows my mind.

There are all kinds of examples, I'm not going to give specific cases, of people in their twenties who, if given two or three years of training somewhere, would be a useful person employed in the work force, and you say to that person, "Your disability is only 10 per cent, therefore this qualifies you for only eight months of retraining and that's it. We don't care what you need to be retrained for, or what Manpower says you're capable of taking."

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's not a question, it is a statement.

Mr. Bounsall: I'm sorry. That has been my experience—and it's not just the Windsor rehab office.

You had better look at your guidelines which those rehabilitation officers have in front of them in black and white to follow in that regard. They are instructed to do that. Less than 10 per cent, no training. Ten per cent, eight months. Twenty per cent, a year and a half. That is what they have in front of them. I had it read to me over the phone by one of those officers. That is what is happening out there.

Mr. Wildman: If he is an older man forget it.

Mr. Bounsall: That's relating it directly to the degree of disability, not to their employability nor their loss of income, which is again an attitude which must change.

Interjection.

Mr. Bounsall: I don't have a copy in my possession. I suspect I can get one that has that down in black and white.

I want to go into the attitude that is increasingly frustrating the persons who go to rehab. Let me just say that there are some excellent vocational rehabilitation officers in the province who, when injured workmen go to them, try and plan a program of vocational rehabilitation. On those workers' contacts with those officers of the board and the programs they get into there is absolutely no complaint. The workmen have only praise for them. But let me tell you what some of the others are doing.

They say to them, "Well, before we try sending you to school; before we take that step"—and I quote—"as the last resort we want you to see if you can't get back into the work force." Fair enough. They say, "You must have 10 job searches a week. Come back and report to us on them." And the chap with the injured back, a 22 per cent disability, says, "Who is going to hire me?"

We still haven't passed the changes to the Human Rights Code or Employment Standards Act or whatever, which causes employers to hire back some of their injured workmen or those who are disabled, which would be helpful in this regard. They go out there and when asked, "Have you ever been a Workmen's Compensation Board recipient?" which appears on virtually all employment application forms in this province, that is ball game over. Let alone the back injury, even if they have lost the tip of one finger on their left hand and they are right-handed, it's ball game over for that person's getting a job.

That's not your problem, but it means that the vocational rehabilitation person who says, "You go out and get 10 job interviews a week," is in essence, under the current situation, putting that worker through one hell of a hassle. When the worker comes in after they have gone through this six and seven weeks of trying to look for a job when unemployment in this province is hovering around 10 per cent comes back into the rehabilitation officer and says, "Look, I just don't see any sense in this." The rehabilitation officer then says, "You are not co-operating with me," and they just cut off compensation.

That's what's happening out there. It is completely unrealistic and should not be allowed to continue.

Mr. McClellan: The awful thing is that this seems to be news to the chairman.

Mr. Bounsall: I might say of another part of the report that I certainly welcome the move to the decentralization which has occurred and the management study you have done which will probably result in decentralized claims adjudication by September of this year. However, I don't, I suppose, have to caution the board to be exceedingly careful in who you have in those local offices so they do have sufficient expertise and we are not involving ourselves in more problems with variation around the province.

Let there be some means by which the claims adjudicating group out in the field is able to meet regularly so there are not large disparities between one part of the province and another. The major key to that is being very, very careful in your hiring and in your training so that you have very bright, capable people out there in your local offices. You may have to pay higher salaries than you are in order for that to occur, but I would say be very careful of your hiring.

I want to talk about one person—and this is one time I will personalize it—one medical doctor at your Downsview hospital; actually I am not exactly sure where she is located but she comes into contact with injured workmen, both while they are at the rehabilitation hospital in Downsview and from time to time out in the local community. I am going to be personal at this point because of the type of attitude which I think existed far too often in the board under the previous chairman and a lot of which has been alleviated under this chairman.

I would say of this person that, unless the board wants to perpetuate the totally unfeeling attitude which seemed to exist under Chairman Legge rather than the more personal sympathetic attitude and atmosphere that has existed under your chairmanship, that this person should be shifted to a position where her medical background can be used but one in which she contacts no people whatsoever—no injured workmen at all.

I'll give you examples of what she has done in two of my cases. A woman with a back injury—actually she finally had three discs fused in December,—and we've now just fought an appeal case for her in Windsor to establish her claim back to when she was cut off last July. These details aren't important. I might say at this point, though, that I ran into the most sympathetic claims adjudicator in that case that I have ever run into; and where accolades are deserved, they should be given.

He is a Mr. C. Wellman, who understood everything about the case from the start. It was one of the shortest hearings they've ever held; it lasted all of about 12 or 13 minutes. Actually it should never have gone to that stage. If there had been more efficiency at the board level when I put my initial queries through on her case, it should have been adjusted at that board level.

At the end of June, when she left the Downsview rehabilitation hospital, to which in her desperation she finally asked to be admitted last May, she was told by this particular person, "I do not care"—and I can remember the phrases because I dealt with the case just on Monday of this week; I don't need the documentation to look up what was actually said to her—"I do not care how much pain you have. I do not care whether you have to take 20 pain pills a day. I am saying to you, 'You get out there and work.'" And she said: "I don't want to hear of you going to see a specialist to see if anything further can be done for you."

That's what she said. By chance, in September her own family doctor had an injury himself and was in hospital. Her own family doctor's replacement had a look at her and said, "My God, what's my colleague been doing all these months?" referred her to a different specialist, put her on therapy for three months and on December 13 had the fusion.

In June, this particular doctor at the rehabilitation hospital told her, "Don't dare go and see a specialist." When she finally got to one, she found she was going to have her major back problem resolved.

In the second case, this same person came to Windsor to establish the permanent disability rating of a particular person in Windsor. I won't go into the details of the injury, except to say it is a rather unusual one; the back muscles are all pulled away from various locations in the back and all grouped up at various other places. It is rather an unusual injury and difficult to treat; one doesn't know quite how to treat it. When he walked in, she said, "Undress for the back," pulling off his shirt and undershirt and so on, and when he was pulling off his shirt and undershirt, he winced. He's still in considerable pain.

She said to him, "Stop the overreacting!" When undressed—and this person has a large accumulation of the muscles on his left shoulder grouped in a knot, an obvious lump—when he had his shirt off, she grabbed that muscle lump on his back and when he winced at that she said, and I quote: "If you don't want to co-operate, get your clothes on and go. I'm being paid by the board to examine you people and get you back to work. Do you know what pain is? I've had a back operation and that's pain." That's the quote I was able to get.

There was more, as you can imagine, on which I haven't got direct quotes, through the rest of that interview to establish that permanent pension. You might say to me, "Look, these are injured workmen who string you along, who really aren't telling you exactly what that person said."

I will attest to the absolute honesty of both of these persons. If you want to know a little bit about—if this is any influence at all upon it—the honesty of this last case I quoted, his likely honesty in reporting to me, he happens to be the nephew of a former Speaker of this Ontario Legislature, M. C. Davies, who was the Speaker in the 1950s in the Legislature. This is the Reverend M. C. Davies's nephew, and he is an extremely honest person and one not given to overstating the case. In fact, he appeared in my office the next day in disbelief as to what had happened when he went to have that interview for that permanent disability rating.

How long is this person going to be allowed to come into contact with injured workers in this province? Give her something else to do that makes use of her medical skills, but not contacting injured workers in this province. That's the kind of attitude and kind of performance that should never be occurring in the province of Ontario.

I'm taking up far too much time. My other caucus members will be champing at the bit to get in, but let me just say another couple of things here. I would like this figure from you. Could you get for me—and you may not be collecting data in this way at all—the number of schedule two employers in the province and the breakdown as to whether they pay their workers their net pay or their gross pay; these ones that you reimbursed, the city or the school board or what have you? I would like to know if you have statistics on what percentage of those who, in paying their workers, normally pay their workers their gross pay or their net pay.

One other thing, very briefly, on that is the whole area of the payment of 75 per cent of gross earnings non-taxable. In discussing the report two years ago there was one person from your board—I'm sorry, I haven't seen him since then and I've forgotten his name—one person in the board who understands the problem; that is, that you have a basic unfairness again in your system by paying 75 per cent non-taxable.

What this does is it allows a single person to receive higher benefits than a person who has dependants and earns the same salary. Also, and this is because of the income tax deduction, it works to the benefit of the person who is at the highest level of the board. You're being discriminatory against the low wage worker and the worker who has a large number of dependants because of that straight 75 per cent of gross non-taxable which you pay as compensation.

It's understood by this one person, but let me say you've got to now start to be a little subtle and a little more sophisticated in terms of how you base your compensation so that those kinds of discrepancies do not continue to exist. Manitoba and Saskatchewan have pensions that are calculated on net rather than the gross. That's my information. Sorry, that's a recommendation to them both.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's a recommendation. It has not been implemented.

Mr. Bounsall: Yes, those are recommendations all right, but do it. It requires a little bit of work. You have people capable of doing financial calculations at the board. Get them on it. Let them spend a week or two on it. It is not going to take that much more. I know you have one person who is fully aware of the problem. Put him on it for a while and get that proposal worked out for yourselves.

I would suggest that the level should be roughly about 90 per cent of net or 80 per cent of net if you include both the UIC and the CPP coverage. Let me tell you an interesting thing about that. Dealing with schedule 2 employers in Windsor, both the city of Windsor and the school boards, that both pay the net pay to the worker while they are on compensation, the net regular 40 hour-work-week pay, in that payment they pay for that worker not only his OMERS throughout but his UIC and his CPP, and there is absolutely no flak from the Unemployment Insurance Commission nor from the Canada Pension Plan.

They pay that on their total earnings. There will be no objection from UIC or CPP at the federal government level, if you should decide to do that at the Workmen's Compensation Board as part of that compensation amount. I suspect it depends how you ask the question. If you want them to say no, you ask the question one way. If you want them to say yes, you ask it in another way. I would suggest you do that.

I think I have covered all the points in principle I would like to cover and I will leave some of the other very interesting areas to the rest of my colleagues.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We will convey the response to your question later.

Mr. Lane: Before I pose any problems, I would just like to say that I think Mr. Bounsall was a little confused when he started. He said that he had to have a recess from being the critic for his party because he could only stand the board so long at a time. I think maybe it was the other way around. The board could only stand him so long at a time, but in any case, so much for that.

Mr. Laughren: He said he would avoid personalities today.

Mr. Lane: The other thing I think rather unfair is to expect the chairman to be responsible entirely for the actions that may be done or the various phrases that may be said by some member of the staff who may work under him at some point in time. I think that's just as unreal as to think that your leader would be responsible for everything you guys would do or say or that Premier Davis would be responsible for everything that I would do or say. I think it's very unreal to expect that.

Mr. Bounsall: You don't know how our caucus operates.

Mr. Lane: I wouldn't want to have to be responsible for everything you guys do or say. All I would just like to say is that as far as I am concerned I have had nothing but courtesy from the chairman and from the members of the staff I have dealt with, not necessarily because they have done what I wanted them to do, but at least every time I approached the chairman or members of the staff I was treated in a very courteous manner.

I do have some concerns other than what have been reflected by my colleague this morning. I brought this up before and maybe there's nothing that can be done about it. The 75 per cent of wages to the injured worker, seeing that it's not taxable and so on, seems to be reasonably fair to me at the outset. But in many cases we find that that worker eventually gets to the point where there has been some improvement and he's now maybe classed as 40 per cent totally disabled. So he gets 40 per cent of 75 per cent. Maybe I am speaking to the Act more than I am to the board because I think probably the Act doesn't allow for this. Really what he settles for is 40 per cent of 75 per cent rather than 40 per cent of 100 per cent. Especially if this happened to be some years ago when wages and the cost of living were so much below what they are today. It means that the person is really not getting very much help from the board. I would just like to think that we might look at that to see if there is any way we could correct that problem.

The other thing that concerns me a great deal is that in many cases a worker is on total disability for a period of time and then he starts to make some recovery. At some point in time he or she is advised that they can now do light work, and their pension is cut to a minimum; in some cases, discontinued. Yet, a person might have no work to do; and there is very little chance of getting light work, especially in the industrial area such as Elliot Lake where there is mining and heavy construction going on. There really isn't much opportunity for light work. We find that person being confronted with a loss of income; yet, there is really no other possible source of income.

The other thing I'm concerned about and it hasn't been brought up is that it seems so often, especially among older workers, that a portion of the body is injured in an accident. I'm not a medical person by any stretch of the imagination so certainly I'm not qualified to make any proposals. But maybe the shoulder is injured and, subsequently, there is trouble with the arm or with the neck. The members of the board seem reluctant to feel that this is a part of the original accident. I think it's only reasonable to assume, especially with an older person, that a person will have some troubles with other parts of the body if he has a severe injury in any part of the body. I think we should not necessarily be concerned only with the location of the injury—whether it was the shoulder, the knee or whatever. I think there are many, many cases where the injury causes other problems in parts of the body that were apparently not damaged at the time of the accident but which are now suffering from the effects of the injury. I think that's a valid situation we should look at.

There is only one other matter I'm going to raise, Mr. Chairman, because I realize there are other people who have a lot of concerns. I have a lot of concerns too, but I think they're being dealt with reasonably well.

The other thing that I know has happened occasionally is, I feel, difficult to pinpoint. Again, taking Elliot Lake, we have some pretty tough guys up there; they don't give in easily, because they're in a tough business. I know of certain circumstances where injuries have occurred and where the injured person didn't lay off work. He went to first aid, had some treatment and kept on working. There was no claim set up but, subsequently, difficulty set in and there was a serious problem resulting from the injury. It just seems pretty near impossible to get that recognized as a case that should be covered under the Workmen's Compensation Board. With one particular person I assisted it took three efforts before the board before we finally convinced them that this really was a claim even though the record showed that he went to first aid and so forth. We just couldn't seem to get it accepted as a claim. So some of our people who are tough and don't want to lay off if they don't have to but who subsequently find they have to are probably finding it very difficult to justify a claim at some later date.

I won't take you time any longer, Mr. Chairman. I do think those are valid concerns and I shall listen with interest to other people.

Mr. Haggerty: On December 16, 1976, the standing resources development committee carried a resolution directing the Workmen's Compensation Board to establish a comprehensive study relating to the accumulation of the many programs available to employees, and measures of integrating all the present programs of assistance to provide a measure or means of economic security to injured persons and survivor's benefits; and it was regardless of injury caused in industry or off the job.

On April 12, I believe it was, I raised a question with the minister concerning this study, and I think she advised at that time that the first stage of the study would be completed in June 1977. The minister was kind enough to forward to me a letter indicating the terms of reference. The first stage of it was: "to determine the present value of the following items: (a) current funds; (b) the future payments of existing claimants; (c) the portion of future assessment rates specifically earmarked to meet future payments on existing claims.

"The financial review consists of the following tasks: (a)(1) review the Workmen's Compensation Act with emphasis on benefits, provisions and the board's legislative responsibilities; (a)(2) review invested assets; (a)(3) valuation of actuarial liabilities for claimants; (a)(4) the actuarial deficit funding philosophy; (a)(5) consideration of questions of equity among employers; (a)(6) review administrative cost; (a)(7) review the claims administration procedures; (a)(8) valuation of accrued liabilities for benefits for employees of the board; (a)(9) specific concerns for schedule two employers; employers classified as schedule two under the Act are individually liable for claim costs of their own employees, whereas schedule one employers are collectively liable to the employees in schedule two to include municipalities, et cetera."

What part of this first stage is now completed?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The interim report was submitted at the end of November or early December. I am aware that the terms of the study have been broadened for the secondary portion of the report. I anticipate that it will be available to us at the end of March.

Mr. Haggerty: What is the name of the company?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The Wyatt Company.

Mr. Haggerty: That is the only one involved?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes. It will be available to me then.

Mr. Haggerty: When will it be available to the lowly "us"?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I make no such distinction.

Mr. McClellan: When will it be available to the members of the Legislature?

Hon. B. Stephenson: As soon as we have the completed report and we have had an opportunity to study it in conjunction with the report of the recommendations of the joint consultative committee.

Mr. Lupusella: When will the report be completed?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I believe the report of the joint consultative committee is available now.

Mr. McClellan: That's very clear.

Mr. Haggerty: The second stage of the terms of reference was: "to review the benefit levels available to workers from insurance schemes providing coverage for industrial accidents and diseases, including workmen's compensation, Canada Pension Plan; (3) to review the inequities if any resulting from the fact that Workmen's Compensation benefits are non-taxable." I'm sure that the minister and the chairman have heard the comments of some members this morning concerning this particular area, where there is inequity. "(4) review the benefits available to the dependants of workers; (5) review alternative approaches for establishing the level of benefits for permanently disabled persons.

The benefits review consists of the following task: (b)(1) comparison with other provinces and countries; (b)(2) the interrelationship of workmen's compensation with other sources of benefits; (b)(3) taxation of benefits includes inequities between single and married workers and between low- and high-wage earners; impact of taxation policy on the relationship between total after-tax benefits and after-tax disposable income from employment; (b)(4) the philosophy of benefit design; (b)(5) the alternatives for benefit design; (b)(6) related problems in present legislation."

It covers a rather broad area; but I thought that perhaps this report, as important as it is, should have been available to the members of the Legislature, and members of this particular committee, who could perhaps review it before pending legislation comes forward; hopefully, it is going to come forward. The member for Sudbury East says "No."

Interjection.

Mr. Haggerty: I can see some merit in this report, but I am amazed at the delay in finally bringing it into the Legislature. There was an article in one of the newspapers—I think it was the Welland-Port Colborne Tribune—which suggested that perhaps there was a leak out on the financial conditions of the Workmen's Compensation—

Hon. B. Stephenson: A what?

Mr. Haggerty: A leak—a report that perhaps got out to the press somehow. I think that is what the heading of it was.

Hon. Mr. Starr: But the report was based on the financial report we issued publicly for the year 1976.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's right.

Mr. Haggerty: For 1976? But this indicated a further study on the financial conditions or constraints that the board is finding itself in presently.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That was set out very explicitly in the 1976 report. That is where the story came from—as a result of reading the report.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am informed that the second portion of the report would have been available at an earlier date had there not been a number of submissions to The Wyatt Company or the people carrying out the study by both employers and unions. There have been a very large number of submissions made which had to be taken into account in writing the report.

Mr. Haggerty: Were these inquiries sent out to specific unions, or were they advertised? How were they informed?

Hon. B. Stephenson: There was a statement in the House and a press release—

Mr. Haggerty: That's right. Yes.

Hon. B. Stephenson:—and unions and companies which were related to the Workmen's Compensation Board inquired of the availability of the study group to hear their concerns and we referred them to the study group.

Mr. Haggerty: But there were no invitations from other areas of the province except, say, the core of Toronto. I don't know. It seems to be a hidden report and we have been waiting for it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: If I may say there were no invitations at all. But indeed there was some widespread information about that program regarding the establishment of the study. I have responded to everyone who has corresponded with me, informing them, making them aware they could make submissions to The Wyatt Company. But there was no request for submissions to anyone.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Before we continue I would like some guidance from the committee as to when we will adjourn for lunch and whether we will sit this afternoon, et cetera. I have quite a list of speakers here.

Mr. Martel: I have something to say about the minister's health, Mr. Chairman. She doesn't appear to be well. I don't mean that to be off-colour in any sense, but if you would prefer to try to reschedule I would be prepared to accommodate the minister.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Having managed to get the chairman back from his holiday and the staff of the board here today I would rather that we completed it today. I'll survive, thank you. It may take a few more pills.

Mr. Bounsall: I would suggest that we either quit at 12 noon and come back at 1:30 pm, or go to 12:30 and come back at 2 p.m. I am easy on whichever we do.

Mr. Haggerty: We'll adjourn at 12 and come back at 1:30 p.m. then.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Is that satisfactory to the committee?

Mr. Haggerty: Is that satisfactory to the minister?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I would be back shortly after 1:30 p.m.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Then we will recess at 12 and come back at 1:30 p.m., if that is satisfactory to the committee.

Continue, Mr. Haggerty.

Mr. Haggerty: I would just like to know when we can expect this report—within a couple of months?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I hope we will have it within a shorter period of time.

Mr. Haggerty: And when can we expect legislation to follow then?

Hon. B. Stephenson: As rapidly as we can possibly develop whatever it is necessary to develop.

Mr. Haggerty: I am sure there is room for improvement in the Act. Hopefully we can get on with it then, bringing forth amendments that will improve the workmen's compensation.

Mr. Chairman, I am deeply concerned about the recent layoff of a number of employees at Inco in Port Colborne due to the huge inventory there. A number of employees who had a number of years service and who, through some injury in the past, had some slight disability have been included in that layoff. I find now that a number of these employees are not too happy with some of the decisions that have been handed down by the board. They have been told there's no light modified work within the company.

[12:00]

This started almost a year ago. I'm sure the chairman has received a letter from Mr. Moreau, president of Local 6200. I can recall letters, his and your letter in reply, concerning this problem. I think the president could see it was going to run into some difficulties in the months ahead. I believe it's coming to a head now. These men who were employed by Inco have now been placed outside of the plant and have no jobs and I don't think many of them will ever find a job due to their disability. There are a number of them with back problems. Some have had surgery that has provided some assistance for them.

When they have to go out and apply for a job, as the rehabilitation officers who have been in the area tell them, when they apply to Manpower, as Mr. Bounsall also stated, they have to show just cause, where they have been and what jobs they have been looking for. These persons have been pensioned off from Inco with a small pension. They received a small pension from Workmen's Compensation that could vary from $60 a month to $120 a month, which is not sufficient income to support a family, particularly for these men who are around the age of 35 to 50.

There's little hope of them obtaining gainful employment. One of the reasons is their educational background. A number of them perhaps are of ethnic background, particularly those persons who came from Italy. They have provided a good service to the industry, and have worked hard, but they now find difficulty obtaining employment with their degree of disability and educational background. There's very little hope they will be gainfully employed.

I've appealed it on section 42 and 42(5) of the Act with little result. I've tried to inform the chairman of the appeals that this is a difficult area and that further consideration should be given to these particular employees of Inco. I'm sure the member for Sudbury will have the same problems in that area up there in that a number of these persons have lost their jobs through disability. I've known cases, and you can talk to Manpower, of persons who have applied seeking employment through Manpower. Manpower has a file they call a dead file. For any person coming in there with a degree of disability, a person who has problems with workmen's compensation, that's where his application form is placed—in a dead file.

As I said, there's no hope of these persons being gainfully employed. Rehabilitation is not available for them or upgrading in education. I don't know what we're going to do with them. I can tell you that these persons can't survive and maintain a family, particularly a young family going to school, with about $240 to $345 a month to pay for their home, et cetera. I think an injustice is being done here by the industry and by workmen's compensation. I don't think it's right.

It's wrong that the company should say their services are no longer required and shove them out the door. The board accepts its responsibility by saying "Your degree of disability is 10 per cent or 15 per cent or 20 per cent. You could have a benefit of about $60 to $120 a month." That's not good enough in our society today. I think Inco has an obligation to these men and so does the Workmen's Compensation Board when one looks at the impairment of wages.

These men don't want to be lying around home complaining of back problems, et cetera. They want employment and many of them can't obtain employment because of the degree of their disability. I feel the board has to improve compensation benefits to this particular group of employees.

The committee recessed at 12:02 p.m.

The committee resumed at 1:35 p.m.

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Chairman, I'm just trying to place my notes together here. I mentioned previous to the lunch break the matter of the persons employed at Inco. There is another plant in the city of Port Colborne, Algoma Steel, that has phased out its operations, and I find a number of employees who were previously injured are now having difficulties in trying to survive on what little benefits and what little pension there is available through the companies that had dismissed them through lack of employment within the industry.

I was hoping that the board would give consideration to these particular circumstances when an appeal is made to the board. Often we get the same old answer, the same reply, "Refer them to light modified work." That's an area that's very contentious. Some industries may be able to adapt to light modified work while in other industries a person who is disabled is automatically put right out the door. I think Mr. Bounsall mentioned the Workmen's Compensation Act, in particular section 42. I would like to have another interpretation of that particular section, regarding the manner in which the board interprets section 42 where there is an impairment of earning capacity.

That's a question I usually ask every year and one of these days I hope that I'm going to get the right answer that I'm looking for. I would sooner have it come from the chairman. I don't want it to come from any of these other gentlemen out here. I want it from the chairman or somebody that's higher up the ladder there.

Mr. McClellan: Play "stump the chairman."

Mr. Haggerty: Yes, this is right. I'm sure that you've encountered the same difficulties there.

Mr. Lupusella: The hon. member must like a ping-pong game.

Mr. Haggerty: That's right. I want to go right to the top.

Mr. Laughren: Where is the minister, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Acting Chairman: She said she'd be a little late but she'd be here as soon as she could. I recall her saying that.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Would you repeat the question?

Mr. Haggerty: I would just like your interpretation of section 42, and perhaps all the way right straight through to subsection 5, where you can add a supplementary amount but it depends upon the nature and degree of his injury. Let's have a clear understanding of the interpretation of that particular section there and how the board interprets it.

Hon. Mr. Starr: If a person is able to perform some sort of work, based on the medical certificate that is provided to him by his doctor, he's now able to perform certain work other than what he had been able to perform because of his injury, and he has a disability pension, then if he, in the same circumstances as if he was on full compensation, is available for that type of work suitable to his ability, is out looking actively—much in the same way as unemployment insurance; you can't draw unemployment insurance unless you are available for work—if he's actively engaged in trying to find that suitable type of employment and is co-operating with his vocational rehabilitation officer, then he gets what is, under section 42(5), the difference between his pension and what was his total, full compensation—at least 75 per cent of his earnings.

Mr. Haggerty: So he has to be registered with Manpower.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's right, that's the first step.

Mr. Haggerty: I suppose if he can get any letters from other industries telling him the reasons why he cannot be hired—

Hon. Mr. Starr: He has to co-operate by reporting to his vocational rehabilitation officer that he had actually been at these places and he has to have the signature of the employer that he was there for that purpose. The vocational rehabilitation counsellor does not necessarily leave it up to him. He also is out knocking on doors on his behalf trying to see if he can place him, or he should be.

Mr. Haggerty: He should be. Where do you think the industry has a responsibility in this particular area where they have dismissed an employee through an injury, said he is no longer required in this particular industry and shoved him out on the labour market under today's circumstances looking for employment? Don't you think the industry has a further obligation here, if a person has been maimed, particularly in that industry?

Hon. Mr. Starr: As you know, Mr. Haggerty, there is no compulsion in hiring these people. I have had experience as Minister of Labour for Canada when the older worker was not hired and I wrote to all the employers because there was no legislation forcing anybody to hire anybody over 45 years of age, and this applies the same way now. There is no legislation forcing these people. If they refuse to hire him, it would be pretty difficult to prove he was not hired because of his disability. All we can do is I hope that if a person gives service to a particular industry for a great many years that that industry will feel obligated on its part from a compassionate and human-caring standpoint to take the man back on again in some capacity he can perform.

Mr. Haggerty: In this particular incidence when the layoff happened at Inco when it phased out one particular operation in Port Colborne, many of these persons had 20 years or more service. Some had 10 years service. Normally it's over 10 years service, and that's quite a period to be working for a particular industry. I feel the industry and the Workmen's Compensation Board have an obligation in this particular area so that these persons just can't be cast aside by saying to them, "We have paid our share of responsibility at $60 a month pension." I don't think that is justified today, but that's what's taking place even within the board.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We have augmented that vocational counselling aspect, particularly in the area where these people go out to the employers and tell them they have a man who is able and willing to work to do the type of work they have there. They ask the employers to hire him. We only had one or two. Now we will have as many as five or six this year who will be doing this to try to help the injured worker.

Mr. Haggerty: Hopefully the board will consider a number of these appeals that have been presented to the board and perhaps others that will be coming forward.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We are grateful for any good suggestions that come forward.

Mr. Haggerty: I suggest that you read my letter to the board concerning an appeal. The claim number is C6394609. There is about a three- or four-page summary. After looking into the medical evidence. I have summed it up in the letter, I said: "I have also checked with Canada Manpower in Port Colborne. They have advised that Mr. So-and-so is registered for employment but it is also indicated to me that any person who has a degree of disability has his application put into a special file with little reference made to that particular application."

This is what goes on. I get a little put out or disgusted with some of the decisions or some of the discussions over an appeal that referred them to Manpower for employment opportunities when many of them on the board know full well that these persons have less chance of obtaining full employment or any decent income.

That's the reason why I look at section 42. My interpretation of that is when a person has lost his job through a disability and there is an impairment of earning capacity, then he should be compensated at full benefits until he is either rehabilitated through vocational—

Hon. Mr. Starr: He gets a pension plus the supplemental, which is equivalent to full compensation.

[1:45]

Mr. Haggerty: In many cases even with their pension, and in some cases Canada Pension combined with workmen's compensation, this doesn't reach anywhere near 75 per cent of his earning capacity before the accident. That is where the person is being shortchanged. I know that you are getting perhaps some comments from the other side of the bargaining table, let's say from manufacturing, that they feel they are carrying their load, but in some cases—the cases I presented to the board—I feel that they have been shortchanged.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We even give consideration, in cases in your riding, for example, or in Oshawa where a person has been employed by General Motors or by International Nickel in your area, for say 15 to 20 years, they have developed a seniority there, and the company is still carrying them on in sick benefits, et cetera, or at least are paying their premiums. We have to consider that aspect. We just can't rush in and take this man and say, "You have to take this other job and lose all these other things you have developed over the years."

Mr. Haggerty: But in this particular instance, where this last layoff occurred in the city of Port Colborne at International Nickel Company, they were given one alternative—I think it was by October 28, 1977—"Either you accept what we offer you or you get nothing." Some of them went on that basis, on early retirement over their disability.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We have no jurisdiction over the decisions of the company.

Mr. Haggerty: Now they find out that they are being shortchanged, not only by Inco but even perhaps through the decisions of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Another matter of concern that I want to discuss with you is the matter of the cancer claims in the industry in Ontario, and I think I have a copy here given to me by I think it is Peter Kovacich, who represents local 6200 in compensation claims and in making representation to the board.

I notice in 1973 you had a total of 173 claims allowed for lung cancer, 39 claims for sinus cancer, and nothing here for larynx at all. Has the board given any consideration to a change in its attitude towards persons who have come down with cancer of the larynx?

Hon. Mr. Starr: So far the medical profession has not found that there is any connection between one and the other; that is, the exposure that these people are working under to the cancer of the larynx.

Mr. Laughren: Are you speaking quietly in this particular issue because you are ashamed of your response—because you should be—and I can't hear what you are saying. We have a right to hear the response.

Mr. McClellan: You could send him a note.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You are asking me something that is in the medical field and I readily admit that I am not a medical man, nor am I able to give you the answers that you might like to hear. I stand to be corrected, but it has not been as yet established—

Mr. Haggerty: Why has it not been?

Hon. Mr. Starr: It is being studied now, and we expect to have some reports on this and some decision within a matter of months.

Mr. Laughren: You have made a political issue out of something that is not—

Hon. Mr. Starr: We haven't; you have.

Mr. Laughren: You certainly have. You've ignored the medical evidence.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You have been very cruel to the people who are suffering with this; this has not been accepted as a compensable decision.

Mr. Mackenzie: We have been cruel to them? My God, that's terrible.

Mr. Laughren: That is obscene, you know that.

Hon. Mr. Starr: The only thing that is obscene is you.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Haggerty: The reason I raise this question is that I am sure the chairman is well aware of the problems in the nickel industry in Ontario where a number of persons have come down with larynx cancer—

Mr. Laughren: You have been sucked in by the minister.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Haggerty:—which can be related to their occupation. It's an occupational health hazard. I am sure he read the latest revised amendment to the Bill 70 that relates to occupational health and employee safety. Will there be any changes made, that perhaps will coincide with the intent of that particular piece of legislation, to schedule 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act?

Hon. Mr. Starr: We certainly can't tell you ahead of time, Mr. Haggerty, what might happen in this case, but certainly we are not going to be left behind in recognizing any industrial disease of any kind that is compensable as a result of the exposure of the workman.

Mr. Haggerty: I know this much: There have been a number of old claims allowed as a result of the decision of the Workmen's Compensation Board as it relates to lung cancer and sinus cancer in the case of certain deceased employees of Inco in Port Colborne. I believe some of the awards were given in the past six months. After about seven years of struggle by local 6200, Ray Morrow, myself and Pete Kovacich I guess, with the Ministry of Health at that particular time—I think it was Dr. Mastromatteo in the environmental health section there—we've finally been able to obtain additional awards. I am particularly concerned about the matter of cancer of the larynx. Sinus cancer now has been established as an award or a claim; why the delay in the matter of larynx?

Hon. Mr. Starr: It's medical research. We have to depend on medical research to ascertain whether the exposure of the work and how long an exposure is necessary as a result of this cancer.

Mr. Haggerty: A heavy cigarette smoker inhales smoke through his mouth; he could come down with cancer of the larynx or of parts of the respiratory area, such as the lungs. So why wouldn't you allow a claim for cancer of the larynx in industry?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Just as soon as we have a report from the medical scientists on this matter, we certainly will abide by that recommendation.

Mr. Haggerty: But there are studies and reports now that indicate that this is related—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Not made to us.

Mr. Haggerty: I'm talking about Europe, and particularly of Britain, where some of the information I have read over the years has indicated that, even in the nickel industry, this is attributable to their occupation or work environment. How close is the board to bringing in a decision?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think it's a matter of months now, Mr. Haggerty.

Mr. Haggerty: A matter of months.

Mr. Mackenzie: In what year?

Hon. Mr. Starr: There are 12 months in a year; and if it's a matter of months, it will be just—

Mr. Mackenzie: In what year?

Hon. Mr. Starr: It will be soon enough, without your help.

Mr. Haggerty: But you are working at it? Who is working at it?

Hon. Mr. Starr: There's Dr. Ritchie—and Dr. Miller?

Dr. McCracken: It's Dr. Tony Miller, who is the director of the epidemiological unit of the Ontario Cancer Foundation, who is the person responsible for the case control study that we initiated in February of last year.

Mr. Haggerty: Is there anybody in the health sector of the Ministry of Labour dealing with this same topic? Would you know?

Dr. McCracken: I'm not aware of it.

Mr. Haggerty: Not aware of it, eh? Nobody there at all. I notice in the report too there are 12 cases related to Consumers' Gas. Could anybody give me some information on that particular area? It relates to lung cancer, I guess.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think Dr. McCracken might be able to enlighten you on that one.

Dr. McCracken: Those were 12 old cases that occurred back in the 1940s, involving persons who worked on a gassing process of the Toronto Consumers' Gas when they were supplying gas from coking operations to industrial and residential services in Toronto. These people developed lung cancer and it was recognized that there was a relationship between what they were doing and their cancer, and these cases were allowed some number of years back.

Mr. Haggerty: And then there's one noted case here. I believe it is for lung cancer; it just says "coke oven." What industry does that relate to?

Dr. McCracken: Any lung cancers listed in the report that are not identified as the twelve from Consumers' Gas and are listed as "coke ovens" would be with one of the three current steel producers in the province.

Mr. Mackenzie: One of the old coke ovens that they used to produce gas in Hamilton?

Dr. McCracken: Yes, that's right.

Then there were the claims we evaluated relating to the old Hamco operations in Hamilton where they were coking for gas there; that operation was phased out.

Mr. Haggerty: You have five cases pending now. Have you arrived at a decision?

Dr. McCracken: I can't tell you whether those specific five have been decided upon or not, because in each month's report there's an update of new cases that are pending and previous cases that have been resolved, so it's an ongoing affair. For instance, as of December of 1977, there was one case of lung cancer from coke ovens that was pending at that stage. Prior to that, of course, there were originally 22 and they worked their way down through the group. So 22 were originally pending in the coke oven group.

Mr. Haggerty: How many were awarded disability claims?

Dr. McCracken: The final tally as of the end of December 1977 showed that during the year there had been 11 claims accepted; six claims had been rejected; one pending.

Mr. Mackenzie: Will you allow a supplementary on that?

Mr. Chairman: Go ahead, sir.

Mr. Mackenzie: What was the date that the nine cases of lung cancer at the Consumers' Gas in Toronto were established? You said they were established some time ago.

Dr. McCracken: Yes, we have them listed that they came to our attention in 1946 to 1950.

Mr. Mackenzie: That's when they were established?

Dr. McCracken: To my knowledge, yes.

Mr. Mackenzie: You can see, then, that there's no relationship between those cases and the fight to establish the cases at the Hamco operation in Hamilton?

Dr. McCracken: I don't believe there is any question about right of establishing, because we already had our guidelines in place for allowance of lung cancer for coke ovens. It was just a matter of these people being found and claims being set up by Mr. Kerr's division, and obtaining the medical information that was required.

Mr. Haggerty: When were these claims found then? You said 1946 and 1950. When was the decision brought down that they would be compensated for their disability?

Dr. McCracken: I don't have that information, I'm sorry.

Mr. Haggerty: You said that you found them. Were you out looking around throughout the province.

Dr. McCracken: Presumably, this was when they were brought to the attention of the board, because our data shows that they were listed as occurring between 1946 and 1950.

Mr. Haggerty: So I presume you do have a follow-up, particularly in occupational health where you feel that there is a risk involved? Do you follow up on all the persons employed at International Nickel Company, Falconbridge and Elliot Lake?

Dr. McCracken: Do you mean does the Workmen's Compensation Board do that? We have carried out follow-up operations in several areas. Mr. Kerr and the claims services division have carried out follow-up operations relating to asbestos exposure and to some of the coke ovens related to the Hamco operations.

Mr. Mackenzie: That took quite a bit of pushing though.

[2:00]

Mr. Haggerty: In the area of uranium I guess there are five cases pending. You have allowed or accepted six in 1975. How many new cases are there before the board waiting decision?

Dr. McCracken: As of December 31, 1977, there were 14 cases of lung cancer pending.

Mr. Haggerty: How many awards were granted?

Dr. McCracken: During 1977 there were 14 lung cancer claims allowed for uranium mining. The total that had been allowed right up to the end of December, going back to the beginning of our records, is 40.

Mr. Haggerty: Is that from any particular mine?

Dr. McCracken: No, that includes the old Bancroft operation and Elliot Lake. It also includes the one case from Eldorado Refining.

Mr. Haggerty: You had only one asbestos claim pending in 1975 or 1976?

Dr. McCracken: At year-end 1977 I have listed two cases of lung cancer pending related to asbestos fibre dust exposure.

Mr. Haggerty: What about silicosis? I see nothing in this chart that indicates any decision brought down for awarding claims under the silicosis section.

Dr. McCracken: No, that is not included in that particular report. Those are malignancies.

Mr. Haggerty: Have there been any awards granted to persons who have come down with silicosis?

Dr. McCracken: In 1977? Yes.

Mr. Haggerty: How many?

Dr. McCracken: I haven't got those figures at the microphone. As I recollect there were 17.

Mr. Haggerty: Have you come to any conclusion on the agreement between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario that relates to silicosis, the reciprocal agreement that is supposed to be there?

Mr. Harding: No. We have pursued it with them and as yet they are not in a position to enter into an agreement.

Mr. Haggerty: This has been going on for a number of years now.

Mr. Harding: That is true.

Mr. Haggerty: Where is the difficulty?

Hon. Mr. Starr: It is on their part. We have pursued an agreement with them but they have not taken any action.

Mr. Haggerty: What happens to those employees who are caught between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario in this matter that relates to the mining area?

Mr. Harding: Could I answer that? There are no cases that have been caught like that. We have had two cases in which Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec were all involved. In those cases, for the purposes of the agreement, Quebec remains in status of being outside of Canada, since they haven't signed the agreement. Therefore the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario shared the total cost between them. The workmen were not deprived of their benefits. Full benefits were paid. They were shared by Manitoba and Ontario under the Manitoba-Ontario agreement.

Mr. Haggerty: That is perhaps a recent complaint; I am talking about something else.

Mr. Harding: That was about two years ago.

Mr. Haggerty: I am talking about those persons who have worked in the province of Quebec within the last 15 or 20 years and have come to Ontario.

Mr. Harding: There are no claims, to my knowledge, that have been filed with the Ontario board that have been turned down on that basis.

Mr. Haggerty: You said the province of Quebec was outside of Canada even at that time?

Mr. Harding: No, for the purposes of the agreement, the way the agreements are written with the provinces with which we have entered into agreements, is that the cost of the claim will be shared by those people who have signed the agreement. Any exposure outside the jurisdictions that have signed the agreement is deemed to be outside Canada. For instance, some people got exposure in Belgium, some got exposure in the United States, some got exposure in Great Britain, and we ignore all of that exposure. In terms of the agreement, if any province has not signed the agreement we ignore that exposure as well, and we divide the cost of the claim between the provinces which have signed the agreement.

Mr. Haggerty: Do you have agreements outside of Canada?

Mr. Harding: No, sir.

Mr. Haggerty: But you do recognize the areas of employment before though, do you? Do you take that into consideration?

Mr. Harding: We note that on the record but we don't take it into consideration. We discount that.

Mr. Haggerty: There's no possibility that you could have an agreement with, say some other country to assist—

Mr. Harding: No, sir. Frankly, if the man is a resident of Ontario and has had at least two years exposure in Ontario, we accept the total cost of the claim regardless of where else the exposure might have occurred.

Mr. Bounsall: It isn't impossible to get it with the other countries, you just decided not to though?

Mr. Harding: It isn't possible to get it with the other countries.

Mr. Bounsall: Have you tried it?

Mr. Harding: They don't have the same kind of system and they don't have the same kind of legislation.

Mr. Haggerty: Those are all the questions I have, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Laughren: It's quite a few years now that I've been attending these hearings. I'm always impressed by the knowledge that the MPPs have of the compensation Act and the Workmen's Compensation Board and the problems of injured workers; and that's of course, because they're so intimately involved in their problems, which is a comment itself on how the system is being run.

I was impressed by John Lane's comments this morning on the problem where the worker injures one part of his body and it can affect another, and yet the board doesn't see that link there. Medically it's probably very hard to see it but there's no doubt, I gather, in his mind or in mine—those of us who work with workers in the heavy industrialized areas like mining or lumbering—that this occurs.

I think the one thing that's bothered me a little bit was since we now have constituency offices—and the board may find it strange that I would raise this—MPPs don't spend as much time dealing with individual problems as we used to. I know that last Friday I was in my constituency office in Chelmsford just outside Sudbury and it was a very good experience, because when you get away from dealing with individual cases you escape some of the frustrations, and that's not a good thing for a legislator.

By the end of the day, I was just about climbing the wall on compensation problems. I guess if I was there five days a week I would indeed be climbing the wall, I don't think there's any doubt about that. I don't know how the constituency assistants live with it so consistently, day in and day out. It's an extremely frustrating experience. We have to be very careful that we don't allow ourselves to think that the problem isn't there just because we're not dealing with it as directly.

I'm disappointed in the time allowed for this discussion. It was very difficult scheduling time to get the board before the standing committee this year. I don't think this one day is quite enough, but I guess we'll have to live with it.

My colleague from Windsor-Sandwich talked about not personalizing the debate, and I agree with what he said. I too can remember refusing to comment when Mr. Legge left the board, and refusing to comment when Mr. Starr was appointed chairman, because even though I know it's an important position it's one that doesn't determine everything that goes on at the board, and indeed can't. That's one reason I, as critic of the Workmen's Compensation Board and for occupational health for a number of years with the NDP, never got into calling the chairman of the board names or commenting on his integrity, because I felt that that just clouded the issue, when it's the compensation system that's the problem.

But I'll tell you something, Mr. Starr is making it increasingly difficult to be objective about him in the role of the chairman, for a number of reasons. One is that he has insisted on injecting himself into the political arena, both last spring when we as a party established a task force to go around the province, to talk to injured workers and draw attention to the problem and to satisfy ourselves that there was a common set of problems out there that needed to be resolved and that it wasn't just localized where we had elected members.

It wasn't just some kind of NDP hobby horse that we were riding. I was somewhat offended by the chairman's comments at that time that the NDP was engaged in a political exercise, and he implied a self-serving political exercise. I thought that was unfair for someone whose primary responsibility is to serve injured workers.

I was then further bothered by his continued involvement in the Aimé Bertrand laryngeal cancer case which Mr. Haggerty just mentioned. Third, I was very bothered this morning when the chairman indicated he had not asked for a committee to look into the need for an increase in the level of benefits for injured workers, in spite the fact it's been more than two and a half years—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I didn't say that this morning. I didn't make any mention of that this morning at all.

Mr. Laughren: I am sorry. I thought you did.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You are trying to make up stories.

Mr. Laughren: No, I am not trying to make up stories now. I am trying to be objective about the whole thing, but I am really worried.

Mr. McClellan: Speak up, Mr. Starr. If you have something to say, just speak into the microphone.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I don't need your coaching, Mr. McClellan.

Mr. Laughren: I will tell you something else I am worried about. I started to talk about the Aimé Bertrand case. The issue has become not one of compensation, it has become rather pathetically and tragically a political issue. I think the compensation system and the political system have been debased by what the Minister of Labour and the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board have done. There's no question in my mind but that they have dug in their heels. They are saying that we are not going to allow the NDP and the United Steelworkers of America to turn us around on this particular issue. They are not going to allow Aimé Bertrand to become a living symbol of what the board is doing to people like that. Some time when Aimé Bertrand is not here and not around, laryngeal cancer will be recognized, there's no doubt in my mind whatsoever about that.

I am worried at the chairman's attitude towards members of this committee. This is a legislative committee of the province of Ontario and as such it has a right to be critical and to inquire into the operations and policies of the board. I get the distinct impression that the chairman resents this. He resents coming before this committee. He resents comments that the NDP members of the committee make concerning the board. I think he's not serving the system well and it's his system that he's not serving well. If it was my system, there wouldn't be a compensation board like we have in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I wonder if Mr. Laughren would allow me to say something at this time.

Mr. Laughren: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Starr: He just said a moment ago that I resent coming to this committee.

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Prior to 1974 there was no such opportunity for a committee to sit. It was on my request that an amendment was made to the Act to bring us forward to this committee on the basis of our financial report.

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: There is no indication that I resent coming to this committee, but I do resent the abuse which I have taken.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Laughren: It's interesting that the chairman feels abused by the committee.

Mr. Mackenzie: Seeing it was your word.

Mr. Laughren: I thought Mr. Bounsell's presentation this morning was objective.

Hon. Mr. Starr: It was excellent and you should follow in his footsteps.

Mr. Laughren: I haven't made a presentation yet. Your attitude is snarly, defensive and objectionable.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Offensive, not defensive.

[2:15]

Mr. Laughren: And do you know what? You have become a political pawn of the Minister of Labour. That's a sad commentary to make about the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, but you simply have. You have allowed yourself to get into a position where if the New Democrats recommend a change in the compensation Act or pursue the cause of an injured worker, either with an illness or an injury, your objectivity is no longer there. That's not fair and you are not doing the job that you are supposed to be doing and that bothers us a great deal.

I don't know what to do about it at this point. I have always firmly believed that asking for the chairman's resignation would not solve any problems because we would still be left with the same compensation system that we have now. That was the problem with replacing Bruce Legge, with Michael Starr, but I tell you that with your lack of objectivity, you are simply not serving the cause of injured workers in the province of Ontario. I do not know what else we can do except ask that someone replace you, someone who is not so plugged-in to partisan politics in the province of Ontario, someone who judges the cause of injured workers on their merit and extends some benefit of doubt to injured workers without always putting it on a partisan-politics scale to see where the balance is. That's what you do.

Mr. Lane: That's not fair.

Mr. Laughren: Well I tell you something, John, I wouldn't say it if the evidence wasn't there.

Mr. Lane: That's not a fair statement. You should retract that statement.

Mr. Laughren: I will not retract the statement because Mr. Starr has created this atmosphere himself. We did not create this atmosphere. We have a right to raise the problems of injured workers and when he responds the way he does, he leaves us no alternative but to draw those conclusions.

Look, John, we don't have the problem with the Unemployment Insurance Commission that we do with the Workmen's Compensation Board. There is no agency in the province of Ontario, or indeed there is no federal agency, that gives us the heartache of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Now why is that? Well the answer is obvious.

Mr. Lane: Are you asking me to respond to the question?

Mr. Laughren: Sure, you go ahead and respond.

Mr. Lane: Well, I don't pretend to be any authority on unemployment insurance—

Mr. Laughren: No.

Mr. Lane: —but I do know that I have as many compensation claims as maybe any member in the room, because I represent a riding that has that kind of industry, and I do know that I get a fair and objective type of a hearing when I come before the board.

Mr. Laughren: Well that's the whole point.

Mr. Lane: I don't think that I get treatment any different from what you people get.

Mr. Laughren: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lane: I know your colleague from Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) boasts on the amount he settles and settles satisfactorily; and I think rightly so. I know he works hard at it. We all work hard at it. But I think it is unfair to make the statement that you made regarding Mr. Starr.

Mr. Laughren: I have never before suggested that Mr. Starr should be replaced as chairman, but it really has reached a point where I question his objectivity.

Well I would like to move on—now that we have set the tone—to talk about—

Mr. Warner: Stop being subtle.

Mr. Laughren: —the task force report that the NDP prepared as a result of our hearings across Ontario last spring. We spent a lot of time on that, put a lot of work into it. There were officials of the Workmen's Compensation Board at all of the hearings, I believe, and I hope they learned something from it.

The purpose of our task force was to allow us to make representation to the board and to the Ministry of Labour and to recommend changes. And we said in our report that we presented it in good faith in the hope that the board would be able to make some positive changes.

I suppose that once again, because it was a document presented by the New Democrats, they will dig their heels in and resist it even more strongly than they might otherwise do; and that bothers us as well because it was, indeed, done in good faith.

There were two major themes that we detected as we went across Ontario. One was the need to decentralize the board, and the chairman's comments this morning in his opening remarks were rather strange on the decentralization question. He indicated no commitment, I felt that they were rather too defensive about the whole idea of decentralization.

What bothers me about it is when an injured worker in Sudbury or in Thunder Bay or in Windsor has a problem, he phones the local office. The local office processes the information, gets the information from Toronto. Somebody sitting in Toronto can make a decision without feeling the frustration that's there in the community.

I think Sudbury is a good example. The Toronto office of the Workmen's Compensation Board didn't feel the pressures when the injured workers occupied that building a couple of weeks in Sudbury. I'm sure you heard about it. Can you imagine the frustration that leads workers to get out on a cold morning to demonstrate for a number of hours before the board offices and then go in and refuse to leave? That's not done lightly.

You are removed from that sense of frustration and anger and I would suggest that that is one of the reasons you refuse to decentralize. It's bureaucratically comfortable and convenient for you to make your decisions at Bloor Street rather than out there in the community where the problems are. You really should be decentralizing more than you have. In my opinion it would provide greater protection to workers.

That was one of the key recommendations of our task force. As a matter of fact, it was the number one recommendation. We said: "The Workmen's Compensation Board should be decentralized so that the first level adjudication occurs in the area offices and cheques can be issued without going through the head office in Toronto. Computer hookups can provide for the fast transfer of information into the head office." In other words, reverse the process that is there now. If the head office in Toronto needs information let them get it from the area offices, not the way it is now. It's silly.

"Secondly, a system should be set up which reviews the status of each claim in process on a regular basis so that delays in obtaining necessary information can be avoided and claims can be processed quickly."

I was at my constituency office a couple of weeks ago and the phone rings and it is a woman from the Workmen's Compensation Board in Sudbury and she says, "I am phoning about two claims." She gave me the names and the claims numbers and I said, "Wait a minute now, that second one—what's the problem there?" This man just happens to be a personal friend of mine. That is not why I got up tight about it, but it was why I knew when it was first brought to the attention of the board, and it was around Christmas time, I said "Wait a minute, what's the problem with Mr. Pitten?" "It's a case of we haven't got the medical reports yet." By the way, I don't intend to go into a whole bunch of individual cases, but I said, "What do you mean you haven't got the medical reports?" "Oh, we haven't got the reports from the doctor yet."

This was two months later and the Workmen's Compensation Board has the nerve to phone me and tell me that they haven't got the medical report yet. It's not the injured worker's fault that he hasn't got that medical report. The woman at the Workmen's Compensation Board said, "Well, it's the doctor, don't blame me." I got very excited and I ended up apologizing to the woman because I got so angry, but the point was that the workers are being put in a situation where it is up to them to do all the chasing. That's crazy.

If you had this ongoing process of review that would not be allowed to happen. Once that claim is put in there is an automatic—I don't know what you would call it but I am sure there is a term for it—where it would automatically be brought to the attention of somebody every week or whatever. In this case it certainly wasn't happening.

"Third, no benefits or pensions should be reduced without at least two weeks notice in writing to the compensation recipient, and the reasons for the reduction or termination must be fully explained." There is a gentleman in the room here who promised that that would happen. It hasn't. It does happen sometimes; I'm not saying it never happens, but a lot of our phone calls are still to say, "I don't know what's happening to my claim," or saying it is reduced without sufficient notice.

Of the administration problems, when the task force went around and visited these communities we got a very strong message from the trade unions that they were spending an inordinate amount of time on compensation problems. I know as an elected member I am supposed to handle all problems that come to my constituency office, but I can tell you I would be doing a lot better job politically on other political issues if we weren't spending most of our time—and I am not exaggerating when I say most—on compensation problems. The unions feel the same thing. They are doing the job of the Compensation Board. In one case, in local 6500 in Sudbury, for example, the compensation and welfare officer handles 80 cases a week. That's 4,000 cases a year. That's crazy that the union has to do that. That is simply not fair; it is not fair financially, 4,000 claims every year. In the Mine Mill union in Sudbury, one person is spending 50 per cent of his time and other unions have one person spending maybe 65 per cent of his time and so forth. So there is a lot of time being spent, and that's the responsibility of the board, not the trade union movement. I know they have to represent the workers, but not to that extent with compensation problems.

That tied in with the whole decentralization thing. We think that if you had proper decentralization you would not have the same degree of administrative problems. The decisions would be made out there in the community rather than here in Toronto. We feel pretty certain about that.

The other area is vocational rehabilitation. We received a really strong message on this, particularly from northwestern Ontario. Vocational rehabilitation has been beefed up in Sudbury in recent years—quite a bit—and there are a lot more rehab offices there now than there were before. But overall, there is still an enormous gap in what is required and what is there.

It is very difficult for an injured miner who can't go back to that job, to find alternative employment. It's going to get worse in Sudbury, I can tell you that, with the layoffs. It is going to be a very serious problem. Unless you are aggressive about it and prepared to beef up the program, there is going to be increased bitterness in the Sudbury area. A lot of the miners and people in the forestry industry are people who don't have a lot of education, so their employment alternatives are restricted. And that makes it increasingly difficult.

So we recommended, in the whole area of vocational rehabilitation—as a matter of fact that was one of the main areas in which we made recommendations—that the Workmen's Compensation Board must allocate more of its financial and human resources towards improving its vocational rehabilitation services. Further, we stressed that vocational rehabilitation must be related to what the injured worker needs to establish an alternative vocational career; it must no longer be related to degree of disability. In other words, we had complaints that if the degree of disability was low, that affected the commitment to rehabilitation that was offered by the board. For example, they would only put an injured worker on a one-year program if he had a small disability; we had evidence of that as we went around.

"Further, that every injured worker must be informed of his right to vocational rehabilitation when it becomes apparent that a degree of permanent disability has resulted from an industrial accident or disease."

In northwestern Ontario, in particular, there was an incredible information gap. They didn't even realize that rehabilitation of injured workers is a right, not a privilege. There's a big difference between saying, "Well, if you want it pursue it" and "That's your right, here it is."

"A committee of the Workmen's Compensation Board, trade unions, employers and injured workers organizations should establish a committee to investigate the entire problem of back injuries. Obviously medical assistance and advice will be required in the deliberations of such a committee, although the major problem is more vocational in nature than medical. For this reason, vocational rehabilitation experts should be sought out and encouraged to recommend how workers with back injuries can get back into the work force."

That, I think, is one of the key recommendations. I know you had a committee operating, out of Downsview Rehabilitation Centre I believe, to deal with back problems. I, for one, don't minimize the difficulty of dealing with back injuries. I know it is extremely difficult, but something needs to be done, particularly in the heavy industry areas.

Workers now, when they can't measure the disability, or when the disability measurement is low, just simply can't get back into the work force. I have a classic example I am working with now, and I just despair. It ends up being a psychiatric assessment very often; and in this particular case it certainly is. People are scratching their heads, but a man doesn't go from working for 15 years, a good employee—aggressive, independently-employed for a while, who then worked for Sudbury Hydro and so forth—go from there to being unable to work at all. He can't measure the back injury at all; he is in danger of losing his house because of lack of income. I don't question for a moment that it's not what we used to call "functional overlay"—I think you have a different euphemism for it now—but it's there and it's real. You have still got a lot of work to do in that whole area.

"Further, injured workers who are able to look for light work must not have their pension reduced when high levels of local unemployment preclude their finding a job." And don't think they're not worried about that in Sudbury now. When a worker is told he can go back to work on light duty and the company says, "Sorry, we have no light duty, you can go home." There he is, at 50 per cent disability. I know you have that special—I forget what you call it—special supplement that allows him to stay on full benefits for a while, but there is a time limit on that, I believe.

[2:30]

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, there is no time limit.

Mr. Laughren: I'm glad to hear that, because some workers are being told that they can only stay on that for six months.

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, there is no time limit spelled out at all.

Mr. Laughren: No?

Mr. Bounsall: Except that they do operate on a time limit in actual practice out there in the field.

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: If the person withdraws himself from the labour force and says, "Oh, no, I am not able to do anything," then, of course, he disqualifies himself under the Act.

Mr. Laughren: That's an interesting comment though. You know what's happening now?

Mr. Bounsall: I'm sure he doesn't.

Mr. Laughren: If the vocational rehabilitation officer is talking to a fellow and the fellow says, "I'm really having trouble making ends meet, so I have applied for Canada Pension disability," the vocational rehabilitation officer says, "Ah, ha!; and he grasps hold of that. He says—and I have evidence of this—"In that case rehabilitation will serve you no purpose, because you'll be totally disabled under the Canada Pension."

There was a high level meeting—if that's the right term—in Toronto among your Workmen's Compensation Board officials to discuss this very problem. I raised it in Sudbury last week—

Mr. Lewis: A low level meeting of high ranking people.

Mr. Laughren: Yes, it's a low level meeting of high ranking people. What they're doing is saying to the injured workers, "If you apply for Canada Pension total disability, you will preclude any further assistance in vocational rehabilitation." That's really unfair.

Do you know the argument that the Compensation Board official in Sudbury raised with me? He said, "Wouldn't you agree that you have to be totally disabled to get Canada Pension?" "Yes," I said. He said, "Then all we're doing is accepting that." I said to that erstwhile gentleman, "Will you then accept other information from Canada Pension? For example, if a man is on 50 per cent disability from the board—he has a work-related injury classified at 50 per cent—if the Canada Pension classified him as totally disabled, will you buff it up to full disability?" "Oh, well no, not automatically like that. We have to do the assessment." You can't have it both ways.

Mr. McClellan: I sat in your office and we talked about that.

Mr. Laughren: And that's fundamentally wrong. I don't see the relationship between Canada Pension and WCB anyway, but you can't use them when it suits your purposes and not use them when it doesn't. That's simply unethical.

Anyway, a committee should be set up to investigate ways and means to require employers to hire injured workers. As a matter of fact, we could start with the Compensation Board. "The recent recommendation by the Human Rights Commission to prohibit discrimination against the physically handicapped is certainly a positive step but a more forceful requirement to hire disabled workers is necessary."

What we're really saying there is be more aggressive in looking after injured workers. Take a particular interest in them. The task force had the case of somebody who—I think it was in Windsor, wasn't it. Ted; where the person wanted a job? No, it was in Oshawa; sorry. A person was bilingual and wanted a job with the board and was refused. There was no real reason for the refusal. He was an injured worker, and there should be special consideration given to those.

The other area is medical rehabilitation. We made some recommendations there to decentralize that operation too. For example, "Medical rehabilitation centres should be established in several locations other than Toronto and the board should consider such centres in Thunder Bay, Sudbury, Windsor and Ottawa." There is no better example, and you've really thrown a complete wet blanket over the whole question of the Burwash centre in Sudbury. I think you're wrong. I think that was a serious mistake on your part. It would have been not only appropriate for all of northern Ontario, but it would have been an indication you believed in the whole concept of decentralization.

Some people on the board tried to imply that we were saying that you duplicate everything that's at Downsview. We know there is specialized equipment and expertise there. We're not suggesting you duplicate everything, but we're suggesting there is sufficient requirement for injured workers in the north that you should have a rehabilitation centre at Burwash. The gymnasium was there, facilities were there for accommodation—still are there, as a matter of fact, and the government has done nothing with it.

Another thing it would allow would be local expertise, for example, in hearing problems. A very serious unit could be developed in the Burwash centre to look after hearing problems in the Sudbury area because of the enormity of the problem there. I like to think we could build something that was known in North America as the area for looking after hearing disability problems. I am sure the same could be done in Windsor on problems for assembly-line workers and in northwestern Ontario on dust effects of grain elevators and in lumbering perhaps as well projects could be undertaken.

Another thing is the level of benefits. That has been raised by my colleague from Windsor-Sandwich, so I won't go into great detail on it, except to say—and this is why I go back to my statement that the chairman has become a political pawn—that I don't know how a chairman of a Compensation Board in Ontario can agree to continue as chairman when the Minister of Labour says for two and a half years, and pushing three now, no increase for injured workers.

I would like you to tell me how much the cost of living has increased in that time and what has happened to the industrial wage composite since July 1, 1975, to now? Can you tell me that?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think it has increased by about 17 per cent.

Mr. Laughren: Which?

Hon. Mr. Starr: The cost of living.

Mr. Laughren: And the wage composite?

Hon. Mr. Starr: About 20 per cent.

Hon. B. Stephenson: About 20 per cent for the industrial wage.

Mr. Laughren: You are low. I suspect you will react in a typical way and say I am being political and so on, but I am really serious. I don't know how you can continue as chairman. So help me, you should have said by now to the Minister of Labour: "Get somebody else to do your hack political work on the level of benefits for injured workers. I won't do it anymore. I won't be party to it." It debases you, Mr. Starr—it really does—as chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board to tolerate that for two and a half and pushing three years. Honestly I don't know how you do it.

You came into this job with a lot of goodwill on the part of a lot of people. I think you would agree to that. It has eroded because you have not taken highly principled, tough stands in defence of injured workers against the Ministers of Labour. I think that is the problem. For the life of me I don't know how you can continue to sit there in that position and do that to injured workers. The level of pensions for widows is $286 a month. You used the word obscene a while ago.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I didn't; you did.

Mr. Laughren: You said I was obscene.

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, you said it is obscene and I said the only thing that is obscene is probably you.

Mr. Laughren: That is pretty close to saying I am obscene.

Hon. Mr. Starr: But you said it first.

Mr. Laughren: I said the decision not to recognize laryngeal cancer was an obscene decision. It really is; grotesque and obscene,

I said. And you said: "The only thing here that is obscene is you."

Mr. Bounsaill: I might tend to agree with you on some parts on that statement.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, just by way of quick addendum to the position Mr. Laughren has been taking, I agree, as the chairman knows and the Minister of Labour knows, about the position of the board on laryngeal cancer. I have in front of me yet another ruling of the board, flowing this time from Johns-Mansville in Scarborough—a laryngeal cancer case—in which the board has made statements that are neither fair nor true, which bothers me.

But, leaving that aside for a moment, Mr. Starr, all of our political confrontations apart, are you not supremely uncomfortable as the chairman of a board which has allowed for no increase for injured workers since July, 1975, when even the Anti-Inflation Board during that period has permitted 18 per cent, where the cost of living increase has risen 20 per cent, where the industrial composite wage in Ontario, averaged on a weekly basis, is up over 22 per cent?

Do you not find your position untenable, sir? I mean, you are not simply a lackey to government, yours is a position of honour and trust. You are there to serve the injured workers of Ontario. How is it possible to reconcile that capacity with the clear, discriminatory, prejudicial truth, that all over the province, because of the policies of the government, injured workers are receiving less than any comparable group in society?

You should resign, Mr. Starr. You should resign in protest against a policy that you are forced to implement. Where lies self-respect? I ask you. How long can you, as chairman of the board, tolerate a position where you see the people to whom you give benefits, discriminated against by a policy which you must surely find intolerable? You can't approve of that. You're not there simply to continue the discrimination against workers. Doesn't it bother you?

Hon. Mr. Starr: My self-respect was established a long time ago, Mr. Lewis, and neither you nor anybody else can undermine it now.

Mr. Lewis: Let me ask you to re-examine it—

Hon. Mr. Starr: So whatever words or chaff you throw around—

Mr. Lewis: Now just a second—

Hon. Mr. Starr: —does not in any way affect my feeling for you.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, well, I thank you very much.

Hon. Mr. Starr: If you had been reading the newspapers, Mr. Lewis, you would have seen that I have expressed, on a number of occasions, my sympathy for the purpose of the cost of living to the injured workers; but I am not the legislator.

Mr. Lewis: No, you're not. You're not the legislator. I understand that.

Hon. Mr. Starr: The Act is there before us, and we will administer it the way it reads.

Mr. Lewis: Well, let me tell you that you are administering legislation which is prejudicial to your own injured workers, whom you allegedly look after. I'm sure your self-respect is intact. But don't you have the occasional sleepless night? Doesn't it bother you on occasion?

Hon. Mr. Starr: My interest in injured workers, Mr. Lewis, is far greater than yours is or ever was.

Mr. Lewis: I have no doubt—

Hon. Mr. Starr: And it's not alleged, by any means; it's a true fact.

Mr. Lewis: Look, Mr. Starr, I'm not going to—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I'm not here to be abused by you, Mr. Lewis, or anybody else.

Mr. Lewis: You're not being abused! I'm asking you—

Mr. Mackenzie: You're chairman of the damned board.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You're using a great amount of oratory, which means nothing, to try to pull a person down. And you haven't got the background for it, I can tell you that right now.

Mr. Lewis: I want to tell you something—I refuse to be unduly provoked by you—I want you to know that in the community at large the performance of the board is not one which is lavishly respected, despite the fact that you're refining your public relations and communications operation in order to do a better job of persuading the public.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I find it entirely different from what you say.

Mr. Lewis: I know that the Act and the board have an alleged public prominence, but in terms of the recipients and in terms of the way those of us in the Legislature who are dealing with them view it, we are not overawed, Mr. Starr. Whatever you do as chairman of the board is your business, but let me tell you something: If I was chairman of a board—God forbid that that should happen, that I should have to report through a Tory government—but if I was chairman of a board—

Hon. Mr. Starr: God forbid that it should ever happen.

Mr. Lewis: It will never happen, and you'll be happy and I'll be happy. But if I was chairman of a board, and I had to administer policies where for two and a half years and more the injured workers I was dealing with had not even received a cost-of-living allowance, I would quit.

I would quit, because it is intolerable for the chairman of a board to persist in being chairman in the face of that situation. If you can't see it that way, then it just shows how qualitatively wide is our difference of view towards injured workers. It is utterly amazing that you can sleep at night with it all, without standing on a barricade somewhere and saying—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I can sleep much better than you can.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, I have been sleeping so well in the last few weeks and months you cannot imagine.

Hon. Mr. Starr: And so have I.

Mr. Lewis: Sloth is my middle name, except when it comes—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I hope you keep sleeping well, because I don't think you ever will—

Mr. Lewis: We have a kind of personal tension between us, some might say.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Obviously. You created it.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, I understand. It always takes one person to create a problem; never two. I was taught that many years ago. When you came into this job, you had our lavish praise—

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, I didn't.

Mr. Lewis: Oh yes, you did.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Oh no, I didn't. Not yours. [2:45]

Mr. Lewis: You had our good wishes. I sat in this legislative forum—you check Hansard; I'll get it for you—and I said I hoped the days of Legge were over and that with Michael Starr, with all of his background, things would change, and look how quickly they went downhill.

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, you didn't. I was there. You said, Mr. Lewis, to refresh your memory and to put the record straight, I was sitting in the legislative floor at the time when you said: "I don't know Mr. Starr. My father knows him. My father says he's a good man. I'll take my father's word for it."

Mr. Lewis: That's right. Exactly.

Hon. Mr. Starr: "But one little mistake like this and we'll come over on you like a ton of bricks."

Mr. Lewis: This is exactly what happened.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's about all the leeway you allowed me, Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Lewis: We don't allow chairmen mistakes with workmen's compensation, Michael Starr. That's not permissible.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I don't make mistakes purposely.

Mr. Lewis: Well, I'm sure not.

Mr. Lane: Let's not get into a personal hassle.

Mr. Lewis: It isn't a personal hassle. I was hoping that the chairman would take the need for an increase in the cost of living allowance more seriously than he's taken it.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I do.

Mr. Lewis: We don't hear your speeches.

Hon. Mr. Starr: All you have been doing is hollering.

Mr. Warner: What is it you're doing? What is it that you're doing? Not a thing.

Mr. Lewis: What's that? "That stupid fellow," you said?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I was talking about something else.

Mr. Lewis: You were muttering to yourself about a member of the Legislature. You call him a stupid fellow, muttering that. David Warner, Scarborough-Ellesmere? You should only devote times to working people that David Warner devotes. You sit there and mutter "stupid fellow" under your breath. What kind of a chairman are you? Are you a Pierre Trudeau, uttering epithets quietly?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I have done more for the working people of this country than you ever will do.

Mr. Lewis: Oh come on, Michael Starr, it is a farce. It is a farce.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I've done more for the working people of this country than you ever will.

Mr. Lewis: This sweet young innocent.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You stopped working for the working people—

Mr. Lewis: Imagine saying that about a member of the Legislature whose name you didn't know 30 seconds ago.

Mr. Lane: Mr. Chairman, I move that we adjourn this debate.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Do you think it's appropriate that the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, who didn't even recognize the member, when the member's name is pointed out to him by the Minister of Labour says "Oh, that stupid fellow"? I mean do you think that speaks to an intelligent chairman of the Compensation Board? Come on, Mr. Chairman. Come on. What's wrong with you, Michael Starr?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I was right here, Mr. Chairman, and I did not hear the words.

Mr. Lewis: My ears are better than yours.

Hon. B. Stephenson: They may be.

Mr. Lewis: You'll notice that Mr. Starr didn't deny it when I drew it to his attention.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I didn't have a chance; you were continually talking.

Mr. Lewis: Oh come off it. You view this world, Mr. Starr, in glasses that have a squinted tint.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You know, you haven't done anything yet for the working people of this country, let alone Ontario.

Mr. Lewis: I understand not a thing, but I'm trying, I'm trying. Anyway, the Minister of Labour is not well. I saw that when I walked in. Sorry, Floyd Laughren had the floor. That was just a minor diversion.

Mr. Laughren: We were talking about the level of widows' pensions—$286 a month. That level is particularly bad because of the emotional problem associated with—I think Dr. Bounsall talked about this—the problem when suddenly there's a death in the family and an incredible reduction in income and it's compounding the problem that makes it so serious. It's just as serious as the level of benefits. That's not something that would bankrupt the board. You could do that quite nicely.

Mr. Bounsall: You don't have very many widows or widowers receiving benefits. The numbers are small. It wouldn't bankrupt you to pay them.

Mr. Laughren: I'd like to give you the recommendations of our task force report on the level of benefits, because I think it's a very rational, very objective set of recommendations. "The Workmen's Compensation Act should be amended immediately to provide for an increase to reflect the cost of living increase since July 1, 1975, and a provision must be inserted allowing for automatic semi-annual increases indexed to the cost of living or the average industrial wage increases in the future."

The reason that that second part of indexing is so terribly important is that it takes it out of the political arena, and we've seen the necessity of doing that in the last two and a half years. It's crazy that the Minister of Labour sits there in judgement on what that level of income should be for injured workers. She should have no say whatsoever. Once a fair level has been established, it should be indexed, and the only time she should enter is when the indexing has fallen behind the cost of living. This is crazy, the way it is now. It makes no sense whatsoever. So we feel very strongly about that.

A comprehensive study should be initiated immediately to review the basis for setting all WCB pensions. This review would focus on the following aspects of pension payments and recommend amendments to the Workmen's Compensation Act. I won't read all the specific, individual recommendations that that study could do, but once you had that study established, there are a number of things that you should look at. For example, how you arrive at a fair level of pensions, how you relate it to disability and to widows and so forth; and what about the continuing contributions to Canada Pension—that kind of thing needs to be looked at.

The next area that we looked at—and which the chairman of the board found strange—had to do with accident prevention. We said: "The board must no longer view its role as passive administrator of claims. It must take an active role in the forefront of occupational accident and illness prevention." I remember the chairman was interviewed and he said we obviously didn't know what we were talking about because the board played a very active role in prevention. We've never felt that way. We still feel that the board needs to be integrated more closely with accident prevention, and indeed, with the Ministry of Labour's health and safety department.

Finally, the last recommendation to the board—the last recommendation, but probably the one that says more than all the others combined; it really is where we have our trouble with you—is a very short recommendation: The board must operate under its motto, "Justice Humanely and Speedily Rendered." Period. End of quote. End of recommendation. End of the task force report.

That's really the crux of the whole matter. We think you've allowed yourself and the board to operate in other than the best interests of the injured workers of Ontario. That's unfortunate. It really is. You've lost a lot of good faith that you had. The Minister of Labour, of course, must bear a major responsibility. I sometimes think we heap too much abuse on the chairman, but the reason we do is that you have allowed yourself to get sucked into the political vortex. You've allowed that to happen to yourself and that's really sad, because you could have retained your independence from the Ministry of Labour. You could have and you should have; but you have not done it. Your public statements are most clear on that.

What I would really like to do is make a deal with you—that you come to Nickel Belt and enter the political fray and we may even change jobs. If you were to win, I would seriously consider taking over the board and doing what will inevitably happen, and that's abolish it.

Mr. Lewis: But you should run as a Tory because it would make you feel so much better.

Mr. Laughren: Oh, yes.

Mr. Lewis: That's what's happened to the board.

Mr. Mackenzie: I think he did last election.

Mr. Lewis: You've become a political instrument.

Mr. Laughren: It would get away from the innuendo that you're a political pawn. Then we'd know it for sure. What I would like to do is be chairman of this compensation board; I really would. Over the years I have worked very hard at establishing some very warm relationships with the senior people on the board. Just look at them. There's a veritable glow when I speak about the compensation board. I'd like to do it in order to abolish the board and to establish the kind of system that I know the chairman believes in as well. The chairman said himself, not too long ago, "We need in the province of Ontario a comprehensive social insurance system which means the board would no longer exist." Am I right?

Hon. Mr. Starr: We said that in the task force.

Mr. Laughren: Absolutely.

Hon. Mr. Starr: It wasn't anything new, you know.

Mr. Laughren: No, of course not. No, nothing is new.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We said in 1973.

Mr. Laughren: It's already there in other parts of the world. They've recommended it in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Let's all work towards it.

Mr. Laughren: Work towards it? If I was there, we would get there faster. I assure you.

Mr. Warner: Let a stupid fellow like me run it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: All the employers in the province would be bankrupt as well.

Mr. Laughren: That really sums up your philosophy. That's the same reason the workers don't get an increase—because of your belief that that's true.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I don't. I am concerned if I may say so, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Acting Chairman: Please do.

Hon. B. Stephenson: —about the economic viability of industry in this province and the capability of industry to provide job opportunities. I hope we will never in any of our deliberations ignore the necessity for ensuring the economic viability which provides jobs.

Mr. Bounsall: That's why you haven't raised the rates.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am not sure that New Zealand is doing it as a matter of fact. I am interested to read the various reports that come out of New Zealand.

Interjections.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Have they decided yet who is going to pay that first period of time? I think there is still a major battle about the first two weeks or the first month. I really am very much concerned that we do whatever is necessary as responsibly as we possibly can without impairing the livelihood of those individuals who are compensated or those individuals who are still working.

Mr. Mackenzie: We are talking about the viability of those injured workers too, though, seriously.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am talking about the viability of those injured workers.

Mr. Mackenzie: But the emphasis seems to be on the viability of industry.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, the emphasis is not in either direction or the other. It is a balanced emphasis.

Mr. Laughren: I notice that your first interjection has been towards the problems of employers and their kind of viability not on the problems of injured workers coping with the increased cost of living.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, that's only because you choose to put that interpretation on it.

Mr. di Santo: You have been saying that all along since June 18, 1976.

Mr. Laughren: I shouldn't have raised it in perhaps that way. I am very serious about that kind of compensation system for the province of Ontario. I think you will always have an adversary system. You will always have bitterness under the present system. It can't work any other way. It simply can't. The onus is on the worker to establish, plainly and simply, that his problems are related to an injury on the job. The benefit of the doubt simply doesn't go to the worker.

Further, under a comprehensive system, you would still have someone deciding whether or not an injury was related to the job, but in the meantime the workers' benefits are paid out of either an auto insurance fund, a sickness and accident fund or the workers' compensation fund, one of those three. The worker isn't the one who then is caught in the squeeze of determining and providing irrefutable evidence that it occurred on the job. That's what's wrong with the present system. It's by definition adversarial. You can't change that. It doesn't matter how good-willed Mr. Starr is, he can't change that. That's an adversarial system. It's impossible to change it.

Only by this other kind of system that we are talking about can you do away with that. It makes good sense. The employers would still be assessed their fair share, as would the automobile drivers, as would people who pay into the section called sickness and accident. There's nothing complicated or difficult about that. I am afraid you are locked into something that has become obsolete and you are reluctant to change it. The idea of that kind of change frightens you.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am not locked into anything. Why on earth do you think we commissioned the study of the situation of the Workmen's Compensation Board, its relationship to other kinds of insurance programs, the potential for change within that system? I think this has to be done before any decisions are made.

Mr. Laughren: I tell you that we are suspicious of your committee and your studies.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am aware of that. I am aware of the fact that you have a pathological suspicion of any human being.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Order, please.

Interjections.

Mr. di Santo: It's your performance. We see your past performance.

Mr. Lewis: It is pathological.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes, it is pathological.

Mr. Lewis: When I see a Tory sitting as chairman of the board and acting as an extension of the cabinet, I get pathological about it. It's a neurosis. I really get concerned.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It's a psychosis.

Mr. Lewis: No, don't tell me about psychosis or I'll take out your chart of primary childhood behaviour disorders.

Interjections.

Mr. Lewis: It does make me pathological when I see a chairman becoming an adjunct of a political party. That's not what it was supposed to be.

Mr. Warner: An agent of management.

Mr. Lewis: That's not an independent board. We have got to have an independent Workmen's Compensation Board and the chairman has become a provincial Tory. You promised me you would only be a federal Tory. Then Joe Clark became leader and you became a provincial Tory.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I ran provincially in 1951. I can't shed it off.

An hon. member: Don't forget 1977.

Mr. Lewis: That's right, but you know that's also wrong.

[3:00]

Hon. Mr. Starr: There's nothing wrong with it.

Mr. Lewis: You can't be a card-carrying large-T Tory acting as an extension of the cabinet and be an independent arbiter of workmen's compensation. It is not possible. A small-t Tory perhaps.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I suppose if the NDP came into government they would appoint a Tory as a chairman of the board?

Mr. Lewis: You would do much better with us than with them. We would make you a claims adjuster. And I'll tell you something: There would be a three-month probation to make sure you were able to handle that.

Hon. Mr. Starr: All the NDP fellows would be on six months probation.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, a year.

Mr. Lewis: Or a year.

Mr. Laughren: I have lost my identity.

Mr. Lewis: I want an apology to David Warner before this is over, in ashes and sackcloth.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I'll apologize to you, David.

Mr. Lewis: He's the loveliest, sweetest fellow in this House.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you know what he made me mad about? He said, "You never do anything," and yet he had two cases on which he phoned me and I corrected them for him right away. Yet he sits there and he doesn't tell the truth.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The member for Scarborough-Ellesmere is a disgrace and should resign.

Mr. Warner: As a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, to put the record straight and in context, my remark that the chairman of the WCB does nothing was entirely in keeping with the discussion which was taking place about raising the workers' level of compensation.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You didn't elaborate.

Mr. Warner: And I said that you do nothing on that—

Hon. Mr. Starr: You said, "you do nothing."

Mr. Warner: —for almost three years. You do nothing about increasing the level of compensation for injured workers. That was what the remark was about, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's what you intended to say.

Mr. Warner: That is exactly what I did say, and I certainly accept the apology from the chairman.

Hon. Mr. Starr: All right, and you can phone me again if you have a tough case. I'll look after it for you.

Mr. Lewis: Let me tell you, he's angelic. You should only get others as decent.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Just like Stephen does.

Mr. Lewis: That's right. I save the bon mots for the bonne personne.

Mr. Laughren: I am trying to—

Mr. Haggerty: You were at widows' pension at $265 or $275 a month.

Hon. Mr. Starr: $286.

Hon. B. Stephenson: $286.

Mr. Haggerty: The minister just increased it.

Mr. Laughren: I appreciate the assistance of my colleagues here, having been diverted by one of them. One of the things at the board that bothered me a great deal, and I don't want to talk much longer, but one of the problems had to do with one of your doctors, Dr. Stewart, who is known to most of us. There is a program at the board called Code 4, which has to do with—for lack of a better term; I know it's not a medically accepted term—presilicotics who work in dust conditions at Elliot Lake and so forth. I was going through a case file at the board and I came across a memo from Dr. Stewart and this is what the memo says:

"I think we should realize that there are probably dozens and dozens of Code 4s scattered across the province in the surface and mining industry whose existences are not imperilled by continuation in their respective work place because they are Code

4. If there was any reason why this would be so, common to them all, it would probably be because they are no longer in significant exposure or the exposure is low enough to create an acceptable risk which overrides the disadvantages of moving or changing jobs.

"I presume that we will never encourage these individuals to take part in the program and hopefully we will make it difficult for them to do so. If, on the other hand, anyone or even all of these individuals present themselves to us with varying incapacities, let's say heart attacks, strokes, back problems, orthopedic disabilities, et cetera, would we then feel compelled to offer them the program? I can hardly conceive of us doing so under these circumstances.

"The point is that it will be up to us to decide ultimately what is what is not hazardous exposure and what is and what is not a bona fide claim. We cannot tailor this kind of threats from management union or politicians. All in all the program is easy to administer in Elliot Lake but presents us with horrendous problems elsewhere if we do not maintain a credible approach to it. I remind you that we are now in fact facing such a situation at Canadian Johns-Manville, where we will have to decide what is and what is not hazardous exposure, and it is already apparent that unless we are firm about this, our problems will be big ones.

"Recommendations: I suggest that a meeting be struck in the near future with the appropriate individuals to discuss this matter. Meanwhile, I can say nothing more about the Charbonneau case than what I have already said. With this kind of disability at his age, his life expectancy is much reduced and his chances"—well, I would prefer to leave out the next sentence in case it is distributed widely. "The rehab department should keep this in mind." I can certainly show you the note if you want to see it.

That is the kind of attitude that bothers us a great deal. You established a program specifically designed to help people who are in a hazardous condition. Then you don't make an announcement, you don't put it into—what do you call it, your corporate book?—the book with all the rules that are not in regulations or in legislation. You have a corporate book up there—and it has never been delivered to me, by the way. The point is that you don't make an honest public statement so that all injured workers are aware of the difficulties they will have if they apply for this program. You set up internally the kind of obstacles that will make it impossible for them to become enrolled in it.

That's not fair. It's not fair to us as legislators who get involved in trying to help these people. It's not fair to the injured workers who think they have got hope in this program and then you pull the plug out. It's already pulled beforehand.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Which program are you talking about?

Mr. Laughren: Code 4.

Hon. Mr. Starr: What program, though?

Mr. Laughren: The program to get—

Hon. Mr. Starr: The Elliot Lake program?

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I didn't know there was any problem there at all. I thought it was a program working well.

Mr. Laughren: What do you think of that kind of memo?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Everybody who was connected with it or could qualify knew all about the program. This is news to me. I have had no complaints about the program whatsoever.

Mr. Laughren: There's a letter here somewhere from—well, it's this kind of problem: What would you do, Mr. Starr, if the board doesn't agree with the physician, who says a miner should leave underground because of the evidence of dust effects? I spent a lot of time on one like this myself. If his personal physician says, "You shouldn't continue to work in dust effects," and the board says, "That's tough. We don't think that you're in jeopardy," you put the guy on the horns of a dilemma.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I don't think it would be that simple a decision—not at all.

Mr. Laughren: It's happening; and the question is—

Hon. Mr. Starr: If it's happening, why don't you bring it to our attention?

Mr. Laughren: I have; I have. We appealed it—

Hon. Mr. Starr: To whom?

Mr. Laughren: To the board—through the formal appeal procedure. There is correspondence here between you—

Hon. Mr. Starr: And it was a case where the physician said he should get out and we said he wasn't supposed to?

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: And it's an appeal board decision?

Mr. Laughren: Yes. It's a year old now. And I've got one here from a letter that Mr. Wildman wrote to you, dated March 10, 1978; which is just this week, so maybe you haven't seen it yet.

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, I haven't.

Mr. Laughren: I understand that; it's very recent. But it's the same kind of problem.

Hon. Mr. Starr: About this same person, is it?

Mr. Laughren: No, it's not the same person; it's just a similar kind of problem.

I'm trying to say to you that, when there's a conflict between what the board says and what the worker's physician says, the worker doesn't know what to do; he's not supposed to work underground, yet the board won't recognize the problem.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I'll certainly look into that.

Mr. Laughren: It's a policy problem at the board. That memo from Dr. Stewart is an indication—that memo that was in the file—is an indication that there are obstacles being deliberately set up within the board. Honestly, it says—

Hon. Mr. Starr: All right; I'll look into this. I don't believe any obstacles are being set up purposely—or they shouldn't be.

Mr. Laughren: The name is Charbonneau, if you want to pursue it. I could easily give you the claim number.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's all right.

Mr. Laughren: That's one that I've dealt with personally. The one that Mr. Wildman's dealing with has to do with Serrano, and they're running into problems. We don't understand why we're running into problems, the worker doesn't understand why he's running into problems and then you come across an internal memo like this and suddenly you know damn well why he's running into problems.

Mr. Lewis: It's the policy.

Mr. Laughren: Because it's been set up deliberately.

Hon. Mr. Starr: What kind of memo is that?

Mr. Laughren: This is a memo that was in Mr. Charbonneau's file. Okay? It was a memo that the board had put in his file up there, and I copied it down verbatim because I thought it was a very bad thing for the board to be doing. I read you everything except that one line for personal reasons.

Although I wouldn't agree with your policy, you would be more honest if you made that kind of statement publicly than hid it in the file. That puts the blocks to an individual worker.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's not a board policy.

Mr. Laughren: In effect it's a board policy.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I think it's questions that are being raised by Dr. Stewart which obviously are going to have to be looked at.

Mr. Laughren: All I'm trying to say is if the people in the board, if they see that letter, that memo from Dr. Stewart, they're not going to Mr. Starr and say, "Mr. Starr is this—" They'll take that as their guidance and their direction in the file. Surely they can't go to you every time.

Hon. Mr. Starr: They can.

Mr. Laughren: Anyway, I'll stop there.

Mr. Mackenzie: I don't intend to be very long, because a number of the things that I would like to have got into really have been covered and there's not a heck of a lot of point in going over them. I suppose to some extent the couple of points I do want to make are covering some of the same material. I was interested in my colleague Floyd Laughren's comments that you can get away from the everyday problems if you're not into your constituency on a fairly regular basis. John may have the heaviest caseload, or one of the heaviest on WCB, I don't know, but there's a hell of a lot of them that come into my office as well that we're dealing with.

I had a call just yesterday afternoon from a chap who wanted to know what was going on with the chances of an increase in his pension. He's at the maximum. It's a pension established back in 1952. He's drawing $400 a month. We had a chance to get into a bit of a chat and I told him I couldn't tell him when there might be an increase in his pension. The chap happens to be paralysed from the shoulders down. I had gone to bat for him a year ago in a long fight—which we didn't win—to get a hospital mattress on his particular bed.

A couple of interesting things came out of it, including one of his comments. He is very cynical, and when you talk about what people think about the board and about the activities or the possibilities, let me tell you the atmosphere is not as good as you may think, Mr. Starr, out there. He said, "Take a look at the letter I got from Mr. Starr back on February 25, 1977. Isn't it at least an indication that we might get an increase in my pension?"

I looked through the letter, which deals with a number of things, including the fact that his maximum pension is $400. The second to the last paragraph says, "At the present time the joint consultative committee to the board is studying the possibility of adjusting present pensions as they relate to the overall cost of the workmen's compensation system.

I understand a report will be prepared at a future date. In the meantime, however, no increase can be made in Mr. May's present pension." He at least took that, as most people I think would, as some hope. Mind you, that's back on February 25, 1977. Just look at the cost of living increases since then.

He called me, incidentally, with one small satisfaction, and that was that his wife's allowance—some time ago she had to stop working and is looking after him—was going up from $210 to $225. That at least was the first good news in some time in this particular case.

[3:15]

Hon. Mr. Starr: That could be done by a board policy.

Mr. Mackenzie: Why it's taken this long I'll never know. In any event, I'm really thinking of his basic pension, because I happen to know his wife and I know that she's feeling the strain of what's happening in that house. I'm wondering, what happens, for example, if something happens to her? He's having trouble hanging on to the house as it is now. I'm wondering if $400 a month, which is what we're putting in here, is going to come anywhere near covering this chap, who obviously then, because there is no other family there, is going to have to go into a nursing home of some kind.

I don't know how you maintain a house if you're paralysed from the shoulders down as a result of an accident. I wonder why we have such a hassle, as we did in this particular case, over getting him, for example, because every doggone cent is important in this particular case, a particular mattress for his bed.

I'm going to read a paragraph in it and part of your reply to him on this particular issue, Mr. Starr. I was not writing to you at this time. I was writing to Ernie Philpiew, one of the counselling specialists of the board, and I said:

"I have been contacted concerning the above-noted claimant relative to his pension allowance and the attendance allowance. He also has a problem with some equipment he needs. First, the equipment he needs: It is my understanding that Mr. May suffers from spasms which make him thrash about violently on his bed. I believe that someone from the board proposed that he get a hospital bed with metal sides that could be raised and lowered and this would prevent him from falling out of bed and injuring himself further." There had been a number of cases of this happening.

"Apparently this is not practical for Mr. May because he cannot manipulate the sides of the bed once he's in it and, in essence, is trapped in the bed." Incidentally, I have both his and his wife's permission to use the name.

"He has been using his own bed, which is reasonably close to the floor, but the spasms have caused considerable wear and tear to his mattress. He now needs a new one of good quality. It would be appreciated if you could look into this matter with a view to providing him with the mattress that he requires." Then I went on to deal with the request for an increase in pensions at that time.

In your reply back, Mrs. June Lytten, who is in charge of prosthetic and paraplegic services, assured me that "a field counsellor will visit Mr. May at his home and look into the present needs for attendance and the mattress situation. Ordinarily, we do not provide new mattresses for injured employees who are not confined to a hospital bed. However, the whole situation will be explored and I'm sure everything will be done for your constituent that is necessary and comes within his entitlement under the Medical Aid Provisions Act."

She went on then to talk about the allowance and the comments you made about the joint consultative committee looking at it, which certainly gave him at least the hope that maybe somewhere down the road he was going to see an increase.

That was on February 25, 1977. I sent him a letter—a little tardy myself, I guess—on March 9, sending him a copy of your letter and telling him that I expected he'd hear soon. On April 21, because he hadn't written back to me, I sent him another letter stating that I hadn't heard anything further from the board as to whether or not it had acted and would he inform me as to where the situation stood. He wrote back to me on May 1 as follows:

"In reply to your letter of April 21 regarding the Workmen's Compensation Board, they did send a man to see me. It was about two months ago in response to the home allowance, the new mattress, et cetera, but I have not heard a word back from them since. Thank you for your interest. Yours sincerely."

I followed that up on May 5 with another letter concerning the fact that we hadn't heard back, and with a copy of his letter enclosed. On May 19 I contacted the board again, because there was still no word on this particular matter. Then, on May 20, I got a letter from the board simply stating that the attendance payment is $210, medical reports had been requested from the attending physician and there were comments about the checks that had been done on visits to the hospital.

Then it said: "Your request for provision of a standard double bed mattress has been referred to the senior medical consultant and it has been determined that this type of mattress is considered to be a standard household item and under the medical aid regulations there is no allowance for this type of provision. A standard hospital bed mattress is provided only in cases where a hospital bed has been recommended and provided by the board and it is understood that you do not wish provision of this type of a bed."

I really think if anything was cheesy it was that particular action, given the circumstances this person was in and that kind of response.

I was interested, however, one week later, in getting the following letter, also from the board, and if you wonder why I sometimes wonder about the efficiency of your operation: "Dear Mr. Mackenzie, re this individual, the attached is for your information and records. In reference to our recent letter, we regret that we were corresponding in reference to two different injured employees at the same time and the letter which you received was in error in reference to the difficulty in obtaining a doctor's report." I don't know what the heck that's got to do with it but I thought maybe in the second one I was finally going to get some action or they were going to take a look at your particular situation.

This gentleman called me yesterday and I had quite a talk with him and his wife about it. No action. He did say that he hasn't got it, but he understands he is getting an increase in the $255 allowance his wife will get to look after him. But certainly, better than a year later, still no change in that $400 pension. They are still trying to maintain that house and the two of them there on that kind of money, and if you take a look at the taxes and some of the other things together, I ask you how he can do it.

He referred to your letter specifically. "Didn't that mean anything, that letter from Mr. Starr? Weren't we going to see some action?" That's only February 25, 1977, Mr. Starr, so if you wonder why I was agitated about what you are doing or not doing about those pensions too, I think that is just one of many cases we could use that sort of underlines the problem some of these people have who are on a pension set at an income level a long time ago.

The other thing is the little aggravations too. I should, but I won't, read into the record some of the notes, including a couple my assistant made, to some of the comments in your report but especially in dealing with the 80 per cent claims that are adjudicated and paid all within eight weeks. I don't doubt that a good number of them are. Probably it is only that we see or hear of the ones that aren't, but I would like to read a letter to you just to try to point out to you that while you think that we are harassing you—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Excuse me, Mr. Mackenzie. In view of the fact that you are mentioning these things, that case that you talked about, the mattress, et cetera, when was the original injury? What year was it?

Mr. Mackenzie: In 1952. I would think a person like that has suffered enough these years with that kind of situation. The family is now gone, which is one of the reasons why there is no additional income and there is a real problem whether they will even hang on to the house.

I would like to read another short note to you, because I think it underlines why we have problems out there with people. The point I was going to make, Mr. Starr, is you may think we are railing away at you, but in most cases our assistants and our people, and the job we try to do in terms of the many—and I am talking not about a few but about the hundreds of cases a year that I get as a member—we try to lay it on the line with them and we try to separate the wheat from the chaff and we try not to go for what we may suspect is a phoney claim and, quite frankly, we are a little rougher than you might think in many cases with the claimants, and that's always easy as a member.

That's why this kind of letter really underlines the frustrations out in the community. I received this letter March 8 and I want to read it to you. It is in response to a letter I just sent them. I won't go through all the letters back and forth but there is quite a little file in this particular case as well.

It's a lady writing back to me and she writes: "To Bob Mackenzie: Dear Sir, your letter of March 3 was received today and contents noted. I am left wondering if you really know the true story of the struggle to get this claim through. Perhaps you will not be interested, but after six months, I, as the wife of a sick man, would be glad to get the frustration of this struggle off my mind. I will try to be brief. On the day my husband"—changing it slightly because her English is probably a little worse still than mine in this letter, but I am giving the actual words—"on the day my husband came off work we had a small amount of money in the bank, enough to see us through till the WCB came up with his claim. This was September.

"October saw us, after three interviews with the welfare visitor, granted welfare. Many phone calls later, long distance both from our phone, which we paid for, and from Toronto WCB, from which nothing emerged, we contacted your office in November, which friends assured us would get us help. Again, many phone calls later, nothing emerged. At one call, your clerk was clearly on the side of the WCB." I want to let you know that that's not factual, and if you will read the letters you will see it, but this is the frustration of this person showing, and she has put in a quote: "Well, it's not their fault if your doctor doesn't complete the form properly."

Let me tell you, we try to go through the procedures and try to see that we are getting the right information passed on. "The first welfare cheque was lost in the mail. My husband, a sick man, had to go down to welfare office for a paper and take it down to the court to give an oath to the JP to say he did not receive same, so back to welfare to receive cheque. True to life, we then tried the sick man's legal aid, which friends said would be sure to help us. Nothing emerged from this. We have one child, 13 years old, by the way. Christmas—we had real frustrations, problems and fears; really, forget it. Then we got a $20 bonus from welfare, $7 from the Salvation Army and a small package—peas, cake and fruit and a bag of potatoes which contained five potatoes—which we did appreciate; something did finally emerge for our family.

"Okay. January 18 I blew my temper, phoned WCB in Toronto and asked for general manager. We have sent in doctors' notes, answered questions, phone calls, given explanations, gone to frustration and frustration and back again. Also my husband could not have his operation until the WCB gave permission, and permission could not be given because claim had not been accepted." We are now at January 18, and we started this in September.

"I was passed through a few people but no manager. Finally, I spoke to Mrs. Snell, coordinator. I told her if I did not get a cheque in the Hamilton office that same day, I was going to contact the newspapers. I asked for manager again. She says: 'You are getting close.' I made the remark that perhaps I should speak to God instead. She thought this was funny. I told her I wanted some money and was fed up with the treatment. We were now receiving $350 per month welfare for the family. No wonder the welfare rolls are up. What choice do we have? It is these people and their kind who are just making it to be like this. She agreed to phone me back, and I said, 'That is the usual answer and you never phone back.' However, I said I would give her until 4 p.m. and then I would contact the Hamilton Spectator.

"About 3:30 she phoned me. What a change in attitude. I could have the money—any amount up to what was due. A decision had been made. (Previously she had said in the phone call that maybe a decision is taking a long time because it is going to be unfavourable.) So the claim had been allowed and, if I like, the whole amount due—$1,500—would be at the Hamilton office in the morning. I accepted, and my husband picked it up finally at 9 a.m. in the morning.

"Then, a few days later, the letter from Mr. Brown: 'Notice,' it says 'this will now be dealt with in the usual manner.' He was quite right. We were relieved. The tension was gone. We could pay our bills. We could eat. My son got his winter coat, finally. We cancelled welfare. My husband had his operation January 27. Four weeks later—no cheques. Two doctors' notes sent in. My husband phoned February 14, 15 and again on the 20th. Each time the clerk had no record of any further payment being due; then she said the cheque is in the mail. Same run-around. Their attitude to me was unbelievable: If the computer says it is, it is.

"Finally, the cheque was delivered February 21, by hand, by a neighbour. It had gone to the wrong address; so I can't blame them for that. February 24, we actually received a single cheque up to date. We had caught up—but it only took us six months.

"I am now looking for a job. If he takes sick again, I can say 'nuts' to the WCB. I hope you read this. I hope you understand this and the strain we have been through.

If you are not sick when you start dealing with these people, you certainly are sick when you finish.

"My summing up here is that every person involved in this is to blame from the top man to the last woman. All along the way it has been pass-the-buck. No wonder the economy is like it is. Time is wasted, money is wasted and someone is not doing a proper job. I could not count the phone calls involved and the number of different people we dealt with."

She signed it "Sincerely," and at the bottom she said: "For your reading, a little quote of my feelings about the board: 'Your file is out; the clerk is out to lunch; we will call you back; I didn't handle your claim; the computer says; explain your sickness; it's the post office; it's the doctor; it's being processed.'"

In effect, she has taken us on in that too. Not that we hadn't tried to help. As I say, there is a long list of the letters that have gone back and forth; some copies are here in this case. I don't know what in blazes is wrong that to this day—because this was sent to me dated March 8—we still are going through this kind of procedure at the board. But, in my opinion, something is wrong, Mr. Starr, and it doesn't speak very well to the management of the board.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. Mackenzie, it sounds terrible when you read this one-sided story. But it isn't fair when you read that part of the situation without having the file here and telling you exactly what happened. She does admit at one point where the cheque went to the wrong address.

Mr. Mackenzie: On February 21; the thing started in September. That's still some six months later.

Hon. Mr. Starr: All we are hearing now is her side of the story, Mr. Mackenzie. My experience is that there are always two sides. [3:30]

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Starr, I want to tell you, I brought that letter down not only because I had just received it, but because my frustration is also showing. I am in my constituency office almost every Wednesday night and every Saturday morning, and I usually can't get out, as I'm scheduled, at 1—it's usually 2:30 or 3 o'clock—and a hell of a lot of the cases are WCB cases. We're really having a problem with these doggone cases, still.

Hon. Mr. Starr: But, Mr. Mackenzie, we paid out $392 million to injured workers in the province of Ontario. To tell me that all of these—

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Starr, one of the problems is that all of your reports deal in those kinds of figures, and nothing seems to be getting face-to-face with the people problems that are involved. There is something wrong somewhere.

It doesn't satisfy me just to have you quote what we're paying out, because even if you were right about 80 per cent being paid within eight weeks—and you may be right, although I find it hard to believe; but suppose you were—that other 20 per cent that are having some real problems, where they are established, is a hell of a lot of people in this province.

Hon. Mr. Starr: What I'm really trying to say is that in those complicated cases that you have the problems with—and I had those same problems when I was a member of Parliament; they brought them to me, even though I was a federal member. But I looked after them because there were always two sides to the story. There was some complication of some kind that did not enable us to pay immediately and be one of that 80 per cent and maybe 85 per cent of those paid promptly. That's the problem.

Mr. Mackenzie: Somewhere along the way, I want to make one thing fairly clear. I think there's a problem—and I'm sorry; once again, I'm not trying to be vindictive—I think there's a problem somewhere at the top in this board, because I have to tell you, and I say it seriously, that in my office we do get a hell of a lot of co-operation from most of the lower-level people in the board. While there are a lot of frustrating cases here, we seem to have worked out a fairly good relationship and we seem to be able to solve a fair number of the problems. But there's something wrong when there is this a continuing problem with people and their deals. There's certainly something wrong with the size of the pensions we've established, which also creates an awful lot of the problems.

I had another chap in—I just want to raise this as an issue with you. It might be something you're considering. I know the problem of money is raised perennially; and I guess I understand that. I had a chap in the other day who didn't want me to do anything but did want to voice some of his frustrations with the board. He's operating on a pension of $198. He has a small private pension and now part of his CPP as well. He said to me: "You know, I was just sitting down and calculating what I lost as a result of my injury. In effect, I lost $40 a month off my CPP when I wasn't working and paying, and I lost $86 a month off my company plan that I would have had if it wasn't for the period of time that I was involved and injured. Why could there not be some provision that funds are found or allocated or that arrangements are made that we can maintain both the CPP payments and the private pension payments when we are injured?"

If a person is going to be injured and he loses through that, it seems to me there is some real merit in taking a look at how we allow him, or even assist him—which ever combination of methods we have to do—to continue those payments so he doesn't end up being doubly handicapped down the road when he retires and is out X dollars a month because of an injury which we're supposed to be taking care of. We may be taking care of part of that immediately. We're sure as hell not taking care of what it may do to him in terms of his future earnings, when he's reached retirement age down the road. That's something that I'd like you to take a pretty good look at.

I want to go back to that case for a moment. In the quick checking we've already done today in the case of the letter I just read out, I did run into one of the problems—in this case it is a matter of communication, and part of it is your board people—in trying to find out what in blazes was holding this all up. Somebody was trying to chase down whether or not there had been any change in his job or his work, as it was a foot injury that was involved in the case of the chap I'm talking about. He's a security guard.

They kept asking him if there was any change. Now, whether they suspected there was a change they kept asking his wife, in many cases—I don't know. But he said, "No, it's the same job." The excuse I got, which I think was fairly lame—or one of the excuses further down the road—was that there had actually been a change in his job. The change in his job, in effect, was that he was still a security guard but they had put him on a route in the plant that covered about an extra half a mile; so there was a little more walking and it was a foot deal.

That didn't register with him at all. He was still a security guard. He was still on the rounds. The fact that had changed the particular route, and he had about a half a mile more walking a day, hadn't even entered into his mind. But that's one of the excuses that we got from the board. I find that pretty damn weak, let me tell you, for the amount of time that was spent on that case.

In the report that you've given, there are just a couple of comments that I wanted to make. First, I still think your rehabilitation counsellors complement is inadequate and I am hoping you are doing something about that. I find the comment on the 80 per cent interesting. We are certainly not running into many of them in my office. On the decentralized adjudication, another study, I can't understand if what I am reading in your report here is that you want to commission another independent analysis—

Hon. Mr. Starr: We haven't had one yet.

Mr. Mackenzie: We talk about the need for money. This is taking more money out of operations and I really wonder if we don't know that this is a problem and we don't need another study on it.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We haven't had a study on it yet.

Mr. Mackenzie: The strengthening of your communications. Quite frankly, in spite of the minister reading, in response to one of the other questions, some of the instructions in one of the little booklets and so on, I am not sure that you really need that much re-organization of your public affairs division unless it is specifically designed to tell workers what the board is all about, because quite frankly the workers still don't know the workings of the board and what and who to ask for, in spite of what you have done. That is what I hope we are going to do and not some kind of a PR job for the board which, quite frankly—and there I suppose my paranoia shows—I'm afraid of.

Mr. Haggerty: I want to deal with a matter concerning the report and it deals with the notes and financial statement for the year ended December 31, 1976.

Hon. Mr. Starr: What page is it?

Mr. Haggerty: Page 5. It's from the annual report 1976. Paragraph 4. Investments. It says, "During the year the board determined its desirability to continue to restructure its investment portfolio, in order to increase the effective yield on its investments, by selling certain investments and using the funds to purchase investments with higher effective yield. A loss of $4,942,000 was recorded on the sale of the investments. There were no losses on Schedule 2 investments. The benefits on this restructuring will be spread over the life of the purchased investments in the form of higher investment income."

The question is, you've lost roughly $5 million—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Five hundred million dollars unfunded.

Mr. Haggerty: Five hundred million dollars, is it?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, it's a loss on investments.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I'm sorry.

Mr. Haggerty: I hope I am correct when I read this. The question is, you have sold the investments, whatever they might be, debentures or something which were yielding a small interest rate, and you've gone out and purchased something with a higher yield. How many years will it take to pick up that $5 million loss?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: It varies with each investment. The purpose of this investment program is to take the investments that have low interest yields and extend the term and get them into a longer-term security which will increase the board's investment earnings in the long run in total. In most cases the term of this particular investment was probably two or three years and the recovery will be over quite a longer number of years. But in every case I emphasize there is absolutely no loss to the fund and to the board over the long haul.

Mr. Haggerty: There isn't? You are going to pick up that $5 million then, are you?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: And more.

Mr. Haggerty: What were the bonds, or whatever you were selling, yielding at that particular time? Three or four per cent?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: Three and four per cent. We have the investment fund manager here. He could speak to this point if you wish.

Mr. Haggerty: I'm concerned about this. It's just like putting pension funds away and I think we should be looking for the highest return on it.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. Cook, will you come up here?

Mr. Cook: Basically when we sell a bond that has a low coupon, we try to—we do, not try to, recover any loss. If we're selling a bond maturing in 1983, any loss from the sale will be recovered by that time from higher-coupon bonds being purchased.

Mr. Haggerty: When you're purchasing these bonds, what area do you look to buy? In Hydro?

Mr. Cook: Basically, we try to reinvest. If we sell a bond, say an Ontario Hydro bond, we will probably in most cases buy another bond of equal quality, which could either be a government of Canada bond or Ontario bond, and in some cases we'll probably buy a high corporate bond like an Imperial Oil bond or a Bell Canada bond or things like that, one of good quality.

Mr. Haggerty: You do feel that you will derive sufficient return on the money then?

Mr. Cook: Oh, yes, there's no doubt about that, because the income in the fund for the last few years has gone up each year substantially and it's all worked into the actual cash return we receive from the investments each year.

Mr. Haggerty: What do you do with the money that comes from the investment? The interest that you accumulate? Does this go into any particular fund within the Workmen's Compensation Board?

Mr. Cook: All investment income is geared into a separate account in the Workmen's Compensation Board and we have it broken down by income from bonds, mortgages and short-term investments. We know specifically where the income is from each form of investment we carry.

Mr. Haggerty: What would you say the return was now if you're buying in the market today? What return are you getting on your money?

Mr. Cook: Government of Canada bonds maturing in 2001 came out at par the other day and they were 9½ per cent.

Mr. Lupusella: Before the gentleman leaves, can I, with the permission of the hon. member, ask just a simple question which is related to the questions which you have already raised about the investment income which is coming from the Hydro bonds? The Workmen's Compensation Board has a number of dollars invested in Hydro bonds and two years ago it seems it was around $500 million. Do you have an up-to-date report on how much money is invested in 1978 in Hydro bonds and how much investment income those bonds earn?

Mr. Cook: Yes. If you would excuse me for just a moment, I have my papers at the back.

Mr. Haggerty: That's a good question.

Mr. Cook: This is as of December 31, 1977. If you wish it as of last week I can give it to you also, but I assume that December 31 would be adequate. Ontario Hydro bonds as at the end of December 1977 totalled at par value $315 million. They are yielding to the fund an average of 7.82 per cent.

Mr. Lupusella: You're talking about the interest which is coming back to the Workmen's Compensation Board. What's the total budget invested, the total budget, the total investment of the Workmen's Compensation Board?

Mr. Cook: You mean the total portfolio, sir?

Mr. Lupusella: Right.

Mr. Haggerty: And return on the money, the interest.

[3:45]

Mr. Lupusella: The figure you gave us, $350 million—

Mr. Cook: Fifteen; $315 million.

Mr. Lupusella: Is that the interest which returns to the funds of the Workmen's Compensation Board or is it the total amount of money invested?

Mr. Cook: As of the end of December the book cost of all investments in the portfolio, including short term, was $1,014 billion. The yield on that total portfolio—and that includes short term investments—is 8.57 per cent. What we do at the board is we have a large portion of the fund in short-term investment because rule one at the board is that funds have to be available for the injured workers on a daily basis.

Mr. Lupusella: Right.

Mr. Cook: So we basically look at our portfolio totalling the long-term investments, excluding the short term, and that total book value is $795 million, and that yield is 8.85 per cent as of the end of last year. The reason it's a little lower in the total portfolio, as you know, short-term investments are yielding roughly at this time around 7.5 per cent.

Mr. McClellan: What's that in dollars?

Mr. Haggerty: What's the total interest?

Mr. Cook: Basically last year the total investment income was $72.3 million.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Cook, if I may, the figure which I got from the Minister of Labour some time in 1976 or 1977, of the total figure of $500 million invested in Hydro bonds, it seems through this explanation it includes the total investment and also the interest involved on the total figure of $500 million. Is that correct?

Hon. B. Stephenson: You're talking about two different things. You're talking about the value of the total portfolio.

Mr. Lupusella: Yes.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We're talking about the interest income on that total portfolio, or the value of the long-term investment portfolio and the total interest from that, and then the total interest from the short-term investment portfolio.

Mr. Lupusella: That's correct. There are two issues involved. I'm particularly concerned about the issue which relates to the investment of the Workmen's Compensation Board in Hydro bonds.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Which is $315 million.

Mr. Lupusella: What's the interest involved each year on this amount of money? That's my particular question.

Mr. Cook: Okay, right.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You want to know the amount of money?

Mr. Lupusella: Right.

Mr. Cook: What I do is take $315 million and multiply by 7.82 over 100. My mathematics isn't too good today, but it's about $23 million or $24 million.

Mr. Lupusella: Every year?

Mr. Cook: That's the earning rate at this point in time. We could wind up at the end of the year with more Hydro bonds or less Hydro bonds. If you want, I'll give you a comparison of a couple of years ago.

At the end of 1975, we had in the portfolio $340 million in Ontario Hydro bonds, so as you can see there has been a reduction of about $25 million in Ontario Hydro bonds in the last two years. To be quite honest about it, the majority of the lower coupon bonds were Ontario Hydro bonds. Two years ago, the portfolio was yielding 7.37 on Ontario Hydro bonds and this past year yielding 7.82. So there has been a substantial improvement in the portfolio in respect to Hydro bonds in the last two years.

Mr. Lupusella: I see. Do you have budgetary estimates in relation to the year to come, 1978? Do you think the return on that investment will increase or decrease? Do you have any estimate for 1978?

Mr. Cook: Of the portfolio?

Mr. Lupusella: The Hydro bonds.

Mr. Cook: No, I have no specific estimate on what we will hold in Hydro bonds at the end of this year. The reason for that is twofold: We will be selling discount bonds this year, but at the moment the yield on Ontario Hydro bonds is very narrow in comparison to that of government of Canada bonds; basically, they are about 25 basis points apart, which is fairly narrow. What will happen is that as the yield on Ontario Hydro bonds is fairly close to Canada bonds, we will probably wind up buying more government of Canada bonds this year than Ontario Hydro bonds—unless we get a bigger yield on Ontario Hydro bonds.

Mr. Lupusella: What about the estimate of the total portfolio in relation to the year 1978? Do you have any estimate figures about the budgetary assets?

Mr. Cook: Yes. In the forecasts we have made to date for 1978, unless there are some legislative changes in the benefits to the workers, we expect that the portfolio probably could grow up to a maximum of $1.3 billion. But that's just a good estimate on our part.

Mr. di Santo: Can I ask a supplementary, Mr. Chairman? Is it true, Mr. Cook, that in 1975 and in 1976 some of your investments were liquidated at a loss respectively of $4.5 million in 1975 and $5 million in 1976? If that is true, can you tell us why it happened?

Mr. Cook: The reason for that, I believe, is that they set up a program basically to restructure the portfolio in higher-income securities in the hope that the cash flow would increase. You might be interested to know what the income from the portfolio was in the last three years which will help back up why we're taking losses. In 1975 the portfolio earned $49 million in investment income, $63 million in 1976, $73 million in 1977, and this year we expect it will be close to $90 million in investment income. Those are two factors. We hope that by selling out the lower-coupon bonds—and we have proven this—that we will get more income into the fund; and that's the name of the game as far as the investment department is concerned.

Mr. Lupusella: Considering these budgetary estimates are for 1978, it seems that the increases are going to take place around December 1978. Is this interpretation right about increases in pensions for injured workers, or are you expecting that those increases will take place before December 1978?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes.

Mr. Laughren: The third anniversary of the last increase.

Mr. Lupusella: So what is your answer?

Mr. Cook: Yes.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said yes.

Mr. Lupusella: Okay.

Mr. Haggerty: The return on this money in 1978—$90 million—looks very promising. Is this put into any special fund? Is it set aside for any special fund, say for increasing pensions for workers on permanent partial disability pensions or anything like that?

Mr. Cook: I can't answer that, but I know it is kept separate and that goes in—maybe Mr. Starr or Mr. MacDonald could answer that.

Mr. Haggerty: What I am trying to get at is, when a decision is made and an assessment is made for a disability award—for example, supposing a person is injured and there is a permanent disability award there that sets back off into a fund, say, of $15,000—is there a direct charge to the industry for that personal injury to that person and is this the money that's accumulated that you are setting aside?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: A large part of the funds that are in this investment fund are for the pension fund, for disability pensions and for dependency pensions, and in each case there is a capitalized sum based on the age of the individual at the time of the award and on the size of the award which determines the lump sum of money that is charged to the individual employer's classification and to his actual individual account.

Mr. Haggerty: You see, apparently you are receiving a pretty good return on the investment—almost nine per cent, or 8.5 per cent, and maybe higher than that in some cases. What I am trying to find out is how you arrive at a permanent partial disability pension when you say an award is given at 10 per cent and that 10 per cent may mean an award of $60 or $100 a month, while in the background, if a person wants a commutation, there's about $15,000 sitting there. Actually what you are paying that person, when you apply an award to a person who's injured, works out to about maybe six per cent on that $15,000 you may have set aside on this particular claim. Is that not true?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: The interest rate which is involved in this calculation varies from time to time and is a function of the investment earnings at that time, and it has been going up in recent years. It is something less than the current investment yield, because the actuaries recommend a rate about one or two per cent below the current investment yield. The fund has to be revalued on a quinquennial—five-year—basis, and at that time it may be necessary to have additional money put into the account.

Mr. Haggerty: I don't know. I can only assume the way the board arrives at a decision on a degree of disability is based upon, say, an award of $15,000 or something like that, and then you break it down and say every year that person will get a permanent partial disability award. He can be totally disabled, but you are only giving him just about the interest of what he would get on that lump sum that's set aside in this particular claim, say $1,200 or $1,300 a year. All you are giving him is about six and a half per cent return for that lump sum that you have set aside there. There's no doubt that it's charged to the industry; there's a special assessment charge there for him—

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: Could I have our actuary, who is here, explain it to you? I think he could give you a better answer than I would. I don't agree with your assessment.

Mr. Haggerty: I am trying to find out how you arrive at a decision there. I have appealed cases, and I notice that in a number of cases the awards will be increased by about three per cent. Going back to the original injury, you say, "The money was worth about five per cent at that time and we will give you eight per cent"—

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: That really has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Haggerty: But I think that's the game that you are working there.

Mr. Neal: The first decision is made by the claims adjudication area, where the percentage disability is determined. Where the actuary comes in is to say, having awarded an amount of money of X dollars per month for life—with contingencies, if it's a widow, for remarriage—the actuary comes along and says, "The amount of money to be set aside today should be X," where that amount includes the actuary's anticipation of future investment income.

There is no relationship whatsoever between the worker's entitlement to benefit and the board's ability to earn income on its investments. There is no relationship whatsoever.

[4:00]

It is perhaps relevant to say that the board's liabilities are determined with a full recognition of the future investment income, and without future investment income, our liabilities, instead of being $1.4 billion, would be well over $3 billion. In other words, we need that investment income in order to meet our future obligations.

Mr. Haggerty: I'm not convinced on that. I'm going by what's before me here. For example—and I have a number of cases here—one says: "The full cash value of the commutation of your pension is $14,144." If you can go back and look at the assessment that has been awarded to the claimant, it comes out to about 10 per cent. If you look at it, it works out to about six or seven per cent of that total. So that's the game you're playing with these persons.

Mr. Neal: Okay. You're discussing the question of the amount of money that the board will offer to an injured worker in the event that he requires cash today to meet a specific situation—and normally we're dealing with a rehabilitation issue, which of course Dr. McCracken will be—

Mr. McClellan: Commutation.

Mr. Neal: But the commutation of the pension is determined at the present time upon the board's own mortality experience of its workers and an interest rate of seven per cent is used in the present tables. The reason one uses a lower rate of interest is because, in part, one is having to disinvest at a time when yields may be high and, therefore, one takes a capital loss such as the $4 million or $5 million that you're seeing disclosed.

If one has to disinvest when one didn't expect to, one may have to take a loss; therefore, it is obviously prudent that you should not use the current yield, which we all hope is at a historical high and that inflation will be lower in the future; and, as inflation goes down, obviously our yields will go down. To compare the yield on the capitalized value with today's assets on their own is not a fair or reasonable comparison. You have to look into the future. We're not on a single-shot concept.

Mr. Haggerty: I'm not totally convinced about that, but you're the expert in the field. All I'm saying is that, from what I can assume from the awards that have been given to a number of claimants, this is the way you've chosen to award a claim.

Mr. Neal: He isn't forced to take his lump sum.

Mr. Haggerty: No, he isn't forced to take his lump sum; that's one of the problems. He has difficulty in getting a lump sum. That's what I'm saying. If he had the lump sum, perhaps he could get a return of 10 to 11 per cent on his money.

Mr. Neal: Depending upon his tax situation.

Mr. Haggerty: Well, I imagine he could.

Mr. McClellan: Could I clarify something? I'm not sure I understand it. On a commutation, is the amount that is given back to a pensioner on a full commutation equal to what you call the present value of future payments on that pension?

Mr. Neal: On that individual pension.

Mr. McClellan: It is equal?

Mr. Neal: It is equal on the basis of a seven per cent per annum long-term average investment return, yes.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, again I would ask the indulgence of the Liberal member since we are getting more deeply involved in the questioning of financial liability of the Workmen's Compensation Board. It appears to me—and perhaps in the course of my presentation I will dig out more information about that; you might correct me if I'm wrong—that the Workmen's Compensation Board cannot meet its financial liability. In my opinion, it seems there is some kind of relationship between the board's financial liability and the way in which the Workmen's Compensation Board assesses the percentage of injured workers' pensions. By taking into consideration that the board draws a certain amount of money from each employer, in the province of Ontario, you are looking at this amount of money for future investment, and the return from that investment, to meet the financial liability of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Is that a correct interpretation? And that is why pensions in the province of Ontario are too low when the board assesses the percentage of personal disabilities. Can I have an answer to that? Is it just an interpretation that I can easily see some kind of relationship?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Are you suggesting that the awards which are made are based—

Mr. Lupusella: Right. That's what is happening.

Hon. B. Stephenson:—on the future financial liability of the Workmen's Compensation Board and not upon the medical situation of each individual?

Mr. Lupusella: Right: That is my allegation.

Mr. Neal: I guess the only thing I can say to that is that I cannot see how that could possibly be true, as Mr. Kerr and myself have never had any discussion on that sort of subject; and as his division makes all the decisions on entitlement, if he were to make his entitlements on that basis, he would have to communicate with me.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, policies are policies; you don't have to communicate.

Hon. B. Stephenson: There is no such policy.

Mr. Neal: There are no such policies that I am aware of.

Mr. Lupusella: That is my own interpretation about the whole affair.

Mr. Hamilton: Just a minute. We might as well make this clear: There is no relationship.

Mr. Neal: I certainly assume there is no relationship.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, Mr. Chairman, to conclude these short remarks, I would say we can be clear that there is some kind of a relationship between pensions of injured workers and the financial liability of the Workmen's Compensation Board in the province of Ontario. There is no doubt about it. This kind of relationship is clear in the sense that the Workmen's Compensation Board cannot increase pensions of injured workers at the time when the board has to meet its financial liability each year. Is that not correct?

Mr. Neal: The board does not—

Mr. Lupusella: Will you please answer "yes" or "no" to my question?

Mr. Neal: I cannot answer "yes" or "no," because I would have to define your question in order to give an answer. I am not fully sure I understand it.

Mr. Lupusella: It seems that my question was really clear. Of course you have to carry on the study; otherwise, from where do you get the money to increase injured workers' pensions? The whole operation of the Workmen's Compensation Board is going to be in jeopardy.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is my understanding that the changes which have been made in the level of pension funds provided by the Workmen's Compensation Board have been done in the past entirely autonomously, without any relationship to an examination of the financial or actuarial situation of the board. I have to tell you that I felt it was time we knew precisely what that financial and actuarial situation was, and that was why a portion of the study was commissioned.

It was because of the necessity to look at the questions which were raised by Mr. Haggerty, and supported by this committee last year, about the relationship of the workmen's compensation benefits to other benefits and to other insurance programs, that it was decided that the study should be broadened to encompass that as well.

But, traditionally, there has never been any relationship at all between modifications of the levels of benefits under workmen's compensation in the province of Ontario and whatever the investment income or anything else was.

Mr. di Santo: You are contradicting yourself right now.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am not. I am saying that, traditionally, that has never been done. What I said was that I felt there should be some knowledge of the actuarial situation of the board—

Mr. Lupusella: They know every year. There is no problem in that. They make provisions from one year to the next.

Mr. Chairman, the last remark I would like to make is that if such a relationship does not exist, why is the Minister of Labour not tying the pensions for injured workers in the province of Ontario to the cost of living?

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is exactly one of the things which is being examined to see—

Mr. McClellan: It took three years to examine.

Mr. Lupusella: Three years, and pensions haven't been raised yet.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Order, please. Mr. Haggerty has the floor.

Mr. Haggerty: I was seeking more information, but to sum it up I can say that based upon the information I have before me the interest that is applied to a permanent partial disability pension is 7.5 per cent and no doubt through the Workmen's Compensation Board you are getting close to nine per cent; or perhaps you can get more than that on the market today if you look.

Hon. B. Stephenson: This year and last year and the year before it was closer to five per cent.

Mr. Haggerty: Well, there's a two per cent difference anyway and I thought that not enough of a return on that was given to the injured workers.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't know whether that is actuarially sound, though.

Mr. Haggerty: What I'm saying is that it is an area that should be open for further discussion by members of the Legislature and the minister and the Workmen's Compensation Board and hopefully this report will shed some more light on it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I think it will. That was one of the purposes of the report.

Mr. di Santo: I think that in examining the report of the Workmen's Compensation Board we have, as far as I am concerned, four major problem areas we are dealing with. One of them is the level of benefits and pensions. I think that everybody realizes that it is unfair and unjustifiable that after almost three years the government is unable to raise the rate of the pension for the injured workers.

If what the minister said two minutes ago is true—that there is no relationship between the financial situation of the Workmen's Compensation Board and the medical assessment of the injured workers—then I would assume that the study she has ordered has only one purpose and that is to postpone the increase of the benefits to the injured workers. I want to tell you, Madam Minister, that two years ago on June 18, 1976, in answer to a question in the House, you said that the reason why you couldn't raise the benefits was because you hadn't received recommendations from the board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That was true.

Mr. di Santo: Okay. Have you received recommendations from the board? Because the chairman of the board said before, in defending himself, rather poorly—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I wasn't defending myself.

Mr. di Santo: Yes, you were defending yourself, rather poorly also. He said he had publicly recommended—and it was in the press—that the level of the benefits be raised.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Publicly recommended?

Mr. di Santo: Yes. It was in the newspaper.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I said I was in sympathy.

Hon. B. Stephenson: He is not alone.

Mr. di Santo: He is not alone. That tells us what kind of a chairman we have at the Workmen's Compensation Board. If you said in June 1976 that you were waiting for recommendations from the board, would you tell us why it is that the board didn't give you the recommendations that supposedly you had asked for, and if not, why didn't you press the board to present your recommendations?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The board was at that time examining the results of the change in benefits which had been established in 1975, and because they were relatively major—

Hon. Mr. Starr: It was 1974 and 1975. They were very major ones.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It was 1974 and 1975, and they were major changes in those levels of benefits. The actuary of the board felt that they needed time to assess the levels of benefits at that time and I am sure that when they felt that there would need to be a change they would inform me. As a matter of fact, the joint consultative committee which was appointed in 1976 has had all of these questions referred to it and it made a series of recommendations to me in the late fall of 1977 which I have looked at and which I am hoping to bring in with some modifications as soon as we have the Wyatt study completed as well.

[4:15]

Mr. di Santo: In other words, the joint consultative committee was unable to make recommendations to you.

Hon. B. Stephenson: They made them to the board and the board has referred them to me.

Mr. di Santo: What were the recommendations made by the joint committee?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't have them with me, as a matter of fact. There are some recommendations regarding the level of benefits.

Mr. di Santo: You thought that you couldn't take any action.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I did not say that I thought I could not take any action.

Mr. di Santo: Well you didn't take any action.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said that I shall take action on those as soon as I have the report of the Wyatt study as well.

Mr. di Santo: Well, okay.

Mr. Mackenzie: Those recommendations, Madam Minister; can they be filed with us or given to us?

Hon. B. Stephenson: If they are board recommendations given to me, they can be. I can't remember whether I have that, I don't know what I've got, as a matter of fact, but I've seen a copy.

Mr. McClellan: Are you saying yes or no?

Mr. Mackenzie: Could we ask for the recommendations that they have made?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Eventually, yes, I'm sure they can be made available.

Mr. Mackenzie: Eventually?

Mr. di Santo: We are looking forward to seeing those recommendations.

Hon. B. Stephenson: They will be a part of the background information available, as you know, when any recommendation is made to the Legislature. So you most certainly will see them.

Mr. Mackenzie: Some time before December 1978?

Mr. di Santo: That was in June 1976 and in three months it will be June 1978. The injured workers have been waiting two years. In the meantime, we understand, the board has been able to lose almost $10 million by liquidating their investments; but the minister cannot find money to increase the benefits of the injured workers.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's not true and there isn't any relationship between those two statements either.

Hon. Mr. Starr: There isn't a loss, either.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, and, as a matter of fact, there's probably an increase this year rather than a loss.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Cook said 10 minutes ago that in 1975 and in 1976 the board lost respectively $4.5 million and $5 million by liquidating—

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't pretend to understand high finance, Mr. di Santo.

Mr. di Santo: Well, neither do I.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is my understanding that these were investments which were sold because they were low-yield investments, and they were sold at a book loss of something over $4 million. And since they have been sold, the yield from the new investments has been such as to overcome that book loss. Is that not correct, Mr. Cook? Yes, that is correct.

Mr. di Santo: Well, in other words, they were poor investments that resulted in a loss for the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: They weren't poor investments at all. They were low-yield investments. You were complaining about the fact that the computations were based on a seven per cent interest rate. I would remind you that two or three years ago a five per cent interest rate was a very high interest rate for some kinds of investments. You know you have to be aware of what is going on.

Mr. di Santo: They were invested at six per cent—mortgages at six per cent. Okay. This is not a major point.

Mr. McClellan: May I ask just one question to put this discussion in context for me? Can I know what the status of the unfunded liability is as of 4:15 today?

Hon. B. Stephenson: As of 4:15 today? No, I can't tell you.

Mr. McClellan: Seriously, can somebody on your staff advise me on what the unfunded liability will be at December 1978?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: The final liability as of the end of last year has not finally been determined because our outside actuary, the Provincial Auditor and others have not reported yet.

Mr. McClellan: Yo don't even know what it is for December 1977?

Mr. A. G. McDonald: Yes, we quoted it.

Mr. McClellan: Sorry, I misunderstood what you just said.

Mr. A. G. McDonald: I should have said December 31, 1977, rather than 1978. That particular liability has not yet been determined because those agencies have yet to report to us.

Mr. McClellan: Can you not give us a projection, a ball park figure, even if it's out as much as $100 million?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: We don't expect a great deal of change on what we reported a year ago.

Mr. McClellan: From $900 million.

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: Pardon?

Mr. McClellan: From $500 million, I'm sorry.

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: We expect a slight reduction in that liability, but nothing substantial.

Mr. Hamilton: I think it is safe to say that we are committed to the long-range program of a reduction of that liability and we would be hopeful that at the end of this year, it would be indicated in that program. That's the target that we are aiming for, to liquidate that liability.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Chairman, the point I want to make is that the government has been unable to raise the pension benefits while, as has been pointed out, the cost of living and the wage composite index have gone up 20 per cent since 1975. I think the government has no moral justification for that, even though now they can give as an excuse the actuarial study ordered by the minister.

That's intolerable because the injured workers are the only group in our society which has no organization. They have no ability to exert pressure on the Workmen's Compensation Board or the government or the Legislature, even though the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, in one of his political outbursts, called them professional protesters. I think that adds to what the member for Scarborough West said before about the impartiality of the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

The second aspect of the Workmen's Compensation Board that I'd like to criticize is the rehabilitation department. No matter what you say or what figures you mention, we are talking about human beings who happen to have had an accident and whenever they need rehabilitation, don't get that from the Workmen's Compensation Board. Actually, the rehabilitation department of the Workmen's Compensation Board lately has become a policing court in order to ensure that the workers don't get the supplement which was approved by this Legislature in July 1975.

As has been pointed out before, the major effort of the counsellors today is to make sure that the injured workers—partially disabled—get out and get signatures from companies who are unwilling—and you know they are unwilling—to hire injured workers. This is not only because of the unemployment situation today, but because there is no law in this province that compels the companies or any other employer to hire injured workers.

As a matter of fact, I challenge the board to give us the figures on how many people who are in that situation are getting employment. I have dozens and dozens of workers who are knocking on doors, and in many cases, they don't even get the signatures because the companies refuse to play that game. It is a farce and it's disgraceful for the board and it's humiliating for the workers who are subjected to that daily practice.

The amendment that was passed in 1975 doesn't say that workers have to go out in the snow knocking at doors when they know already, and when the Workmen's Compensation Board knows, that there are no jobs available, in order to prove that they are co-operating with the board's rehabilitation department. You, as the minister, have the moral responsibility to stop that practice, because it's inhuman and it's stupid.

Mr. McClellan: It's just harassment—malicious harassment of workers.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is not harassment. It is an attempt to assist the workers to find alternative employment.

Mr. Lupusella: If I may, Madam Minister—

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, you may not right at the moment. It's Mr. di Santo speaking. He's been interrupted enough already.

Mr. Lupusella: He leaves me the floor, Madam Minister.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Mr. di Santo.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Chairman, I want to denounce this practice of the Workmen's Compensation Board. I hope that the minister has the sensitivity at this point to instruct the board to stop this practice. Today the rehabilitation department directs that unless the workers produce two signatures a day they won't get the supplement.

Hon. Mr. Starr: They have to prove, as I mentioned earlier—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Do they have to get two signatures every day?

Hon. Mr. Starr: We ask them to go around and see more than just two employers, but they have to be actively engaged in looking for work—

Mr. di Santo: Madam Minister—

Hon. Mr. Starr: —to qualify for the supplementary, of course.

Mr. di Santo: I know that you are reluctant to believe what I was saying, but now that the chairman has confirmed what I said, I hope that you will take action immediately. Because otherwise we will keep fighting on this. The rehabilitation department doesn't mean that we must have people employed at the Workmen's Compensation Board policing workers to see that they go out getting signatures from companies. The companies will not hire them because there is no work available for injured workers, as there is not for workers who are young and healthy.

I hope that you take action on that because that's really disgusting and it's humiliating.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I didn't realize that looking for work was a humiliating process. It wasn't in my day.

Mr. Lupusella: Especially when there are one million people unemployed around the country. It seems to me—

Mr. McClellan: Without any chance of getting a job?

Mr. Acting Chairman: Mr. di Santo has the floor, please.

Mr. McClellan: When there is no chance of getting a job at all?

Mr. di Santo: Probably the office of the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board is on the 20th floor—

Hon. Mr. Starr: We're placing injured workers now with employers.

Mr. Cook: You're harassing a lot of them too.

Hon. Mr. Starr: The employers so that they would hire these people. Yes, we do harass them.

Mr. Lupusella: I hope the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Cooke: Your rehab offices—

Mr. McClellan: There should be a placement process—location of jobs and placement—not sending people out with little pieces of paper to fill them up for months and months and months. It's stupid.

Mr. di Santo: If that means rehabilitation, I leave it to the average intelligence of a normal person.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You can only help those who try to help themselves.

Mr. di Santo: Then Stephen was right when he said that you should resign.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Stephen is never right.

Mr. di Santo: Because you don't understand—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Stephen is only right in your mind and his mind.

Mr. di Santo: People in those conditions cannot help themselves, because today in Ontario we have 326,00 workers unemployed—

Hon. Mr. Starr: We have proof that many—

Mr. di Santo: —and employers are not going to give work to injured workers.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We have proof that many injured workers are getting jobs.

Mr. di Santo: I challenge you to prove how many workers have been employed through that process. I challenge you, yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We can give you the charts. Of course we have. Yes, we have.

Mr. McClellan: Where is it?

Hon. Mr. Starr: They're working.

Mr. McClellan: Where are the figures?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Right there.

Mr. di Santo: I thought, Mr. Chairman, that there was—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you want the figures?

Mr. di Santo: Now that I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, can I continue?

Hon. Mr. Starr: He doesn't want the figures. Go ahead.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Your colleague would like to have a—

Mr. Cooke: The only reason I'm here is to make one point. I wanted to ask about this job search because I have had constituents in my riding who say that it's just been completely sickening the way the rehabilitation officers have gone after them.

I know two 62-year-old people on workmen's compensation who are being forced to look for three jobs a day. They're 62 years old and they're in back braces and they're being forced to look for jobs—three a day, 15 a week. We have a city where there is 11.5 per cent unemployment. I'd just like to ask you whether you think that is proper or whether you think that's harassment, I'd put it as harassment.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you think that just because there are a million people unemployed now in Canada that a person should not go out looking for work?

Mr. Cooke: I'd like to ask you what the role of the rehabilitation officer is?

Hon. Mr. Starr: The role of the rehabilitation officer—

Mr. di Santo: He doesn't understand this.

Hon. Mr. Starr: —is to try to help an injured workman get back into the labour force, perform the type of job that he's able to perform—

Mr. Cooke: How are they—

Hon. Mr. Starr: —and it should not be stopped. It should be a continuous process until some job is found for him.

Mr. Cooke: How do they help the worker? What methods are they supposed to use—

Mr. di Santo: By policing them.

Mr. Cooke: —in order to help the worker get back into the work force?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Job training with the rehabilitation?

Mr. Cooke: No, I didn't ask that. I said what methods are the rehabilitation officers supposed to use to get the worker back into the—

Hon. Mr. Starr: He goes around knocking on doors of employers and telling them and asking them and cajoling them or doing anything to see if he can get a job for them. That's the way it should be done.

Mr. Cooke: But that's not what I asked you. What is the role of the rehabilitation worker? Not the worker. You keep telling—

Hon. Mr. Starr: To assist the claimant.

Mr. Cooke: How are they supposed to assist them? That's what I'm asking. [4:30]

Hon. Mr. Starr: They go around knocking on doors of employees trying to get them jobs in addition to the workers themselves.

Mr. Cooke: The rehab workers do that?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Yes, sure.

Mr. Cooke: They certainly don't do that in Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Starr: They don't?

Mr. Cooke: No, they don't. I've talked to rehab officers. I wrote a letter to the rehab supervisor in London and had him come down to Windsor, because I had such a complaint about one of the rehab workers who talked down to the individual who was receiving the workmen's compensation benefit as if he was a piece of dirt. He talked that way to me about the worker on the phone. I complained about that individual. I had the supervisor come down from London and of course it was a complete defence of the rehab worker. I have asked for a job description of what a rehab worker does.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You're talking about one person, you're not talking in general about the whole policy. Isn't that what you are talking about?

Mr. Cooke: I'm talking about the Windsor office.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You're talking about an incident in one situation.

Mr. Cooke: No, I'm not.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Yes, you are.

Mr. Cooke: If you will be quiet and let me talk about the rest of it—

Hon. Mr. Starr: All right. If you want to bring it to someone's attention to see it does not happen again, then you should tell us.

Mr. Cooke: I have. I wrote a letter, and it is still happening. They are harassing these workers. I call them senior citizens because they are 62 and 63 years old. They are out of work and they've both back injuries. The only suggestion the rehab worker is able to come up with is that they should get a security guard job. There are only a certain number of security guard places in Windsor where you can go and look for employment. You can't make three applications a day. I tried to explain that to the rehab workers. They said once they finish those, then they go back to the same employer again. They are cut off their supplement. They are down to $100 or $120 a month which they are expected to live on. I think it is completely ridiculous to expect—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Maybe we should re-amend the Act to what it was prior to 1974.

Mr. McClellan: Never mind the threats, Mr. Starr.

Mr. Cooke: We are talking about progress.

Hon. Mr. Starr: There are no threats. I am just trying to tell you right now that this is a very fair and generous amendment that was passed in 1974—the best ever. No other province has it. If the person is actively engaged in looking for work with the help of a rehab officer, he is entitled under section 41 to full compensation or under section 42(5), if he has a pension, it is supplemented.

Mr. McClellan: We're telling you it is not working.

Hon. Mr. Starr: All we're asking for is that he try to look for work. That is not asking too much.

Mr. Cooke: I'm suggesting to you that for some individuals, especially in a city like Windsor where there is 11.5 per cent unemployment, it is unrealistic, and you should be looking at it. You can't force someone to find work.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Are you suggesting they should stay home?

Mr. Cooke: You're damn right I am.

Mr. di Santo: On a point of order—

Mr. Cooke: I'm suggesting they shouldn't have to go to look for three jobs a day.

Hon. Mr. Starr: They did.

Mr. Cooke: Let me explain what I said. Control yourself, please.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I am in complete control.

Mr. Cooke: You don't act like it.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You're saying you didn't say what you said.

Mr. Cooke: Let me explain. You didn't let me elaborate. I am saying they should not have to look for three jobs a day; it's unrealistic.

Hon. Mr. Starr: How many? What's realistic then?

Mr. Cooke: I don't think that continuously looking for work in a city where there is 11.5 per cent unemployment is realistic at all.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Nobody in Windsor should be looking for a job?

Mr. Cooke: Not 62- and 63-year-old men who have back injuries. They should be given benefits—

Hon. Mr. Starr: In other words, they sit at home?

Mr. Cooke: You tell me what the hell your rehab officers do because I can tell you what they do. They're useless.

Mr. di Santo: That's the typical Tory mentality. They should not be sitting at home; they should be actively helped and they are not. I would like to have the figures of how many people have been placed through the rehabilitation department, as was promised.

Dr. McCracken: The 1977 figures show the total is 23,072. Of that group, 4,800 returned to employment as a result of vocational rehabilitation activity; 117 cases retired from the labour force; and 17,827 were referred for further resolution. This means training programs; upgrade in training, on-job training, courses in the various schools, and learning new trades. There were 328 of the 23,072 who were considered as not rehabilitable. These included people who were completely disabled from a physical standpoint; people who, because of their geographical location or because of personal insufficiency, it was realized they could never return to the work force.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Chairman, can I ask a question? Of the people who in 1976 were referred for further resolution, how many of them were employed subsequently?

Dr. McCracken: I believe that from 1976 to 1977, there was a carryover at that time of approximately 6,000 plus cases. In other words, at the end of 1976, there were that number of cases that were still active; namely they were on upgrading programs, they were receiving vocational rehabilitation counselling, they were engaged in all the other types of vocational rehabilitation activity. Incidentally, if the meeting would like, since the question was raised as to what vocational rehabilitation counsellors do—

Mr. McClellan: Well, let's stick with this figure for a second. Out of the 23,072, only 6,000 are carryovers from 1976?

Dr. McCracken: No, those were 1977 figures, but the question that was asked was how many cases were carried over into 1977 from previous years. It was a figure of slightly over 6,000. Each year, as you can appreciate, at the beginning of the year—

Mr. McClellan: Out of your caseload in 1977 of 23,072—

Dr. McCracken: Then you add on the other 6,000, so the caseload is over 32,000, yes.

Mr. McClellan: Okay. There is a little bit of loss here, a little bit of slippage you might say; about half.

Dr. McCracken: At any given time, if you have 30,000 cases and they are divided equally among every month of the year, at any given time you are carrying a caseload of around about 6,000 to 7,000.

Mr. McClellan: Could you give us the complete figures from 1975 until the end of 1978, maybe table them so that we can have a chance to study them?

Dr. McCracken: Of course, we don't have 1978 figures.

Mr. McClellan: I am sorry. I meant to the end of 1977.

Dr. McCracken: To the end of 1977? I don't have them here.

Mr. McClellan: Right, that's what I said. If you could table them, then we could do an assessment.

Mr. di Santo: Would you have by any chance the carryover from 1977?

Dr. McCracken: Again I don't have that figure; but it has been running fairly consistently between 5,800 to about 6,600.

Mr. di Santo: Okay, since we don't have the figures, I cannot make the argument, but I will when the figures will be made available to us, because it seems to me that a very high percentage of the people who should be rehabilitated are not, in effect.

Going back to the remark made by the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, which I find really insulting, that the workers should be at home, I would like to bring to the attention of the minister that there are other ways and means of helping injured workers to get back to the job. I presented a private member's bill last year for compulsory rehiring of injured workers, those partially disabled. If she or the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board had the time and the patience to look at an Act passed in 1944 in England, which is called the Disabled Persons Employment Act, at that time in England they had already solved the problem of—

Mr. Hamilton: It hasn't worked since the day it was passed. Anybody in England with any knowledge of it will tell you so.

Mr. di Santo: Well, it hasn't worked—

Mr. Hamilton: It's a paper program that has never worked in England. If you ask anybody in the rehabilitation field or the social or economic field, that particular legislation in England has never worked from the day it was passed, unfortunately, I might state.

Mr. di Santo: I have the Act in front of me. I don't have the actual results of this bill, but I can tell you of a different jurisdiction of which I am aware where the program works and works well. I'm speaking of Italy.

Mr. Hamilton: I've discussed it at great length in England. I've discussed it in the international arena at the ILO and I've discussed it with a lot of people that are knowledgeable in the field and they tell me that it has never worked.

Mr. Harding: It's a disincentive, in fact.

Mr. Hamilton: I say to you, unfortunately, because I think it was well-intentioned legislation.

Mr. di Santo: As I said, I cannot speak for the results obtained in England because I don't know, but I can tell you in Italy the results were pretty good. Of course, between our situation and that situation there is a gulf in terms of legislation. Last year the minister created a committee—correct me if I'm wrong—or had a person in charge of looking for opportunities for employment for handicapped people within the Ministry of Labour.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes, it was in my ministry.

Mr. di Santo: I don't know what the results were because when I asked the question in the House, the minister said that there were no results yet. I hope there will be results and that probably we can set a pattern also for the Workmen's Compensation Board.

As for the level of the supplement, the chairman of the board said before that the pension plus the supplement amounts to full compensation. Am I right? I have several cases where the amount of the supplement plus pensions does not amount to total compensation and that applies to people who are close to their retirement age. I think that's a discrimination which goes against them.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Give us the particulars and we'll look into them and report on them.

Mr. di Santo: We go through this game every year. I can give you the particulars and I will. I want to read it into the record. This is claim C10193139. The injured worker is getting $82.50 a month for 24 months, a 10 per cent pension. In addition, he is getting $150.25 a month for 18 months, dating from January 29, 1978. It's very recent. Altogether, it makes a total of $232.75. This person was getting $216, the maximum benefit. The only reason he's getting $150.25 is that he's 63 years old.

I can mention another case if you want. There are several claims. This one is getting a 33 per cent supplement and a 10 per cent pension.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think you're entitled to an explanation. That's why we would want to give you that explanation.

Mr. di Santo: Sure. That amounts to 43 per cent while full benefits amount to 75 per cent. In both cases, we have people who are older people. One is 63 and one is 62 years old.

[4:45]

Hon. Mr. Starr: We will send you an explanation if you give us the claim number.

Mr. di Santo: Yes, it is several claims. I noticed that happened in other cases where people are close to retirement age. I think the supplement is a right to which the injured workers are entitled regardless of age, because if that is the case I think it is a violation of the human rights code. We are discriminating against people because of their age.

I actually had a letter which, very incautiously, the board wrote to an injured worker saying exactly that—"Because you are approaching the retirement age we are," et cetera. I will find the letter and I will send it to the chairman of the board.

The last point I want to make is that whenever the board members come in front of this committee they always make a point of saying that all the cases are solved within a few days.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We don't say all the cases.

Mr. di Santo: No, let me qualify my statement, that the easy cases are solved within a few days and the more complicated cases take a longer time, but I can tell you that I have been confronted with cases that are absolutely unjustifiable, like this one that I want to mention to you. We had a hearing of the board on August 23, 1977, and the decision was made on December 7, 1977, after four months. During this period of time I had to write and ask the board repeatedly to make a decision, in many instances without even having an answer.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you want an explanation on that one too, as to why it took so long?

Mr. di Santo: Yes. There was no medical examination involved. There was nothing involved.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Then you are entitled to an explanation.

Mr. di Santo: Sure. Okay. I am having problems with the board every day because of the time it takes in making decisions, because of the way it answers the injured workers involved, and no matter what you say—and probably you make that statement in good faith, you may think that the board has a good image—I want to tell you that the injured workers are really angry at the board.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Yes, those who haven't received a decision.

Mr. di Santo: Dozens and dozens.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You see, the only individual, Mr. di Santo, who is criticized is a person or organization that makes decisions, because they never make a decision that satisfies everybody. That is why we have an appeal system and now even an Ombudsman is in the picture.

Mr. di Santo: I am not saying that the board is criticized because it is difficult or because it is complex for the board to make decisions. What I am saying is that there are certain complaints that are legitimate and are general, like the increase of the benefits, and you may tell me that that's not the fault of the board. There are decisions that could be made in a brief period of time and are delayed because of the internal bureaucratic problems that you have, because of the computers or because of the filing system that you have. There is a problem with the doctors, and I cannot understand why it is not possible for the board to make public the names of its consultants. Why is it impossible?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. di Santo, you are an intelligent person and I think you can realize why some confusion would be brought about when you receive 200 new claims every hour of the working day, plus the old ones—as was mentioned today, there was a claim here that dated back to 1952; it is still an ongoing claim—in addition to what we have to handle. You know, they are only human beings working there. They are subject to mistakes. They make mistakes.

Mr. Warner: That's not the question.

Mr. di Santo: That's not my question.

Mr. Warner: What's the secrecy?

Mr. di Santo: Because I—

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, no—just a minute now—that was the last of it.

Mr. Warner: Are you going to answer the last part? The last part is important.

Mr. di Santo: I could answer your interjection by saying that it's not the workers' fault if we have more than 400,000 accidents in the province of Ontario every year. It's not their fault if there are so many accidents.

Hon. Mr. Starr: No. Nobody is blaming them. I don't know why you brought it up—

Mr. di Santo: What I want to ask you is why it is that you cannot publish the names of the consultants of the Workmen's Compensation Board?

Hon. B. Stephenson: All you have to do is get the College of Physicians and Surgeons' list of consultants in the province of Ontario, and every single one of them is used, except for some who are specifically not used—

Hon. Mr. Starr: There are no secret—

Mr. di Santo: Not every single one.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Lupusella: It's always the same people.

Mr. di Santo: Always the same people.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, it is not always the same people.

Hon. Mr. Starr: But there is no secret about it.

Mr. di Santo: They are always the same people.

Hon. Mr. Starr: They are all out in the open. They are practising every day, these doctors.

Mr. di Santo: As a matter of fact, I asked to refer one of the injured workers to a specific doctor, and the board chose to send him to another doctor.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That happens.

Mr. di Santo: And that happens very often.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's just a statement. I would like to know more of the facts. How did this happen?

Mr. di Santo: I don't know, but I can tell you what the case was. I can give you the details later on.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think we should look into it and see what the facts are.

Mr. di Santo: Can we have a list of the doctors who usually work for the Workmen's Compensation Board?

Hon. Mr. Starr: They all do.

Hon. B. Stephenson: All the doctors in Ontario work for the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. Mr. Starr: All the doctors in Ontario work for the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Mr. di Santo: In other words, you don't have a number of doctors who specifically work for the Workmen's Compensation Board?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No; except those who are on the staff of the rehabilitation hospital.

Mr. Lupusella: What about when you refer workers to a certain consultant?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No.

Mr. Lupusella: You don't have a certain number of surgeons on which the board relies for their assessment?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think we do have a number as specialists.

Mr. Lupusella: You have those?

Hon. B. Stephenson: But they—

Mr. Lupusella: So why don't you make this list public? That's what I would like to know.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The worker can be referred by his family physician or by the board to any appropriate consultant.

Mr. Lupusella: Maybe when I come into the picture, I am going to elaborate my concerns.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The only list we have, I think—is there a list of those to whom the board does not permit referrals to be sent?

Mr. Lupusella: You have a number of specialists on whose judgement the board relies.

Dr. McCracken: Yes.

Mr. Lupusella: So you have the names of those specialists.

Dr. McCracken: We have numbers; there are too many names.

Mr. Lupusella: Too many names. How many?

Mr. di Santo: Okay. That's the excuse: too many names.

Hon. Mr. Starr: It is not an excuse, Mr. di Santo. There is no secret about them.

Mr. McClellan: What is the other list?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I don't know what you are saying.

Mr. di Santo: I asked particularly for that list. Why is it not possible?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I'll send you a list of all the doctors in Ontario.

Mr. di Santo: No. You don't use all the doctors in Ontario.

Dr. McCracken: In 1977 there were 7,268 doctors who looked after injured workers. Coming down to the specialty group, there were 578 general surgeons all across the province; there were 236 orthopedic surgeons; there were 78 plastic surgeons; there were 57 neurosurgeons. What this indicates is that we use all the physicians who, in our opinion, are qualified to treat our cases—and we are very picky about that.

Mr. di Santo: My point is that, in certain circumstances, not all the people who are qualified in your opinion are used. Can we have the names of the people who in your opinion are qualified? That's my question.

Dr. McCracken: It would be all 7,000 of these doctors.

Mr. di Santo: Not the 7,000; the ones that—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. di Santo, would you not want the injured worker of Ontario to receive the best treatment that can be provided by the best surgeons who can perform that treatment? Isn't that what you want? We want that.

Mr. di Santo: My question is that you have 57 neurosurgeons who you think are qualified.

Hon. Mr. Starr: No, who treated injured workmen in 1977.

Mr. di Santo: No, it is not that.

Mr. Warner: Those aren't the people who are employed by the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Nobody is employed—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Dr. McCracken, when you gave us this list a moment ago—I think there is some misunderstanding; maybe it is on my part—did you give the numbers of different categories of surgeons and physicians et cetera, who have treated injured workers in 1977?

Dr. McCracken: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. di Santo: Fifty-seven neurosurgeons in the whole province of Ontario.

Dr. McCracken: Yes, 57 neurosurgeons were involved in treating injured workers last year.

Mr. di Santo: In the whole province?

Mr. Lupusella: Treating. Now what about referral of injured workers to a certain number of specialists on which the board relies—and I am making particular reference to when an injured worker has an appeal and the appeal system decides to refer the injured worker to a particular specialist. How many specialists do you have?

Dr. McCracken: We don't have a list of specialists, I am sorry. Under a situation like that where the appeal board requests that a referral be made for an opinion in a particular specialty, be it orthopaedic surgery, neurosurgery or whatever, it is our responsibility to select from the most senior people available—and these are the professors of surgery, the assistant associate professors of surgery—wherever they are most readily available. Of course, naturally, we tend to be restricted to the areas that have the universities—Toronto, London, Ottawa, Kingston.

Mr. Warner: The minister said there were no doctors employed by the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You said you wanted to know the names of all the doctors who worked for the board.

Mr. Lupusella: Right.

Hon. B. Stephenson: What I am saying is that all the doctors in Ontario work for the board from time to time. There are doctors on the staff at the rehabilitation centre, and there are doctors on the staff of head office.

Mr. Warner: Now we are getting into it; there is a division.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes.

Mr. Warner: There is a differentiation between those doctors who are directly connected with the Workmen's Compensation Board and those doctors to whom people are referred.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, no.

Mr. Warner: When I have a letter signed by a doctor, medical branch, rehab services division, I assumed that person is employed by the Workmen's Compensation Board and that that doctor will render some judgement upon the person who comes to see him. Contrasted in the same situation will be a report from another doctor not employed by the Workmen's Compensation Board, but in general practice or in specialist practice on his own. And that report may be absolutely contrary to the report brought forward by the doctor who is employed by the Workmen's Compensation Board.

That is what I believe to be the essence of my colleague's remarks. And that is where we want to find out what is going on. Why is it that we end up with such contradictory statements about the individual's state of health?

And make no small amount of it. Some of the letters and comments I have had from doctors who have quite a medical reputation in the community, indicate that there is something wrong with the medical judgements that are being rendered by those doctors who are employed directly by the Workmen's Compensation Board. That is the problem we are trying to get at.

In fact the one case I have here that has haunted me for a couple of years now—and haunts the constituent continuously—hinges around that kind of problem where he is told by the doctor employed by the Compensation Board that he is going to be fit for rehabilitation, for some light work, and his own doctor says that is sheer nonsense. That is what we want to get at and we would like the names of those people who are referred to.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am sorry, that is not the question which Mr. di Santo asked. You can get the names of all the physicians who are employed by the board because they are employed within the rehabilitation hospital or within head office.

Mr. Warner: Okay.

[5:00]

Hon. B. Stephenson: But the request that Mr. di Santo was asking for was, "Give us the list of all the specialists to whom you refer patients in which there is some difficulty or dispute about the claim." There isn't any list, that's the problem.

Mr. Hamilton: I think there's a conflict here. Mr. Warner, you put the thing in perspective when you said the Compensation Board doctors who are hired give an opinion and the local medical doctor in Windsor or North Bay gives a completely contrary opinion. Once this arrives at the appeal board level, that divergence of medical opinion is sent out to someone on the list of specialists who makes a judgement as between the divergent medical opinions from the board and the local doctor. These are the people that Mr. di Santo is talking about.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But there really isn't any list.

Mr. Hamilton: He's talking about the people to whom we send it out from the appeal level to determine which one of the doctors is right. This is the group he's talking about.

Mr. Warner: And you're saying that the list you use is from the Ontario Medical Association—

Hon. B. Stephenson: The College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Mr. Warner: The College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But in most instances, as Dr. McCracken suggested, the consultant will be the most senior available individual within that field—probably within the teaching program of the university because they are recognized as the senior consultants in that area.

Mr. Hamilton: Let me tell you the dilemma I'm in as of right now. I've got absolutely completely divergent opinion from two top cardiologists, one in London, one in Toronto.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Well, that can happen.

Mr. Hamilton: I am now in the throes of trying to find someone senior to those who can give me a medical referee's opinion. It's getting exceedingly difficult to get someone who will give you a medical opinion who can be accepted as a medical referee.

Mr. Warner: There's something in here that talks about benefit of doubt to the worker. That's the source of our other problems. That section isn't lived up to.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Chairman, I'm bringing to your attention another point that I think is quite important for me, for social reasons if nothing else. There is an increasing number—actually a very high number—of injured workers who are being referred by the board to psychiatrists for assessment. I'm not a doctor but I'm really worried about this pattern. I cannot believe that, of all the cases I have, 90 per cent of the injured workers, as soon as they have an accident on the job, also have mental problems, psychiatric or otherwise. I can prove that with all my files. They are referred one after another to psychiatrists.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You mean because of an accident? No way.

Mr. di Santo: I'm saying that I cannot believe that once a worker has an accident he becomes mentally sick or has mental problems or has psychiatric complications. So I cannot understand why the board keeps referring a very high number of injured workers with permanent disability to psychiatrists. I will ask you again whether it is possible to know how many people who are permanently disabled, with partial or total permanent disability, are referred to psychiatrists for assessment. Would it be possible to have that information?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Dr. McCracken might have that.

Dr. McCracken: No.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Can you provide that kind of information for Mr. di Santo?

Dr. McCracken: We don't make that kind of breakdown. We have no use for it. I can provide the number of psychiatric consultations, though.

Mr. di Santo: That would not help in determining how many workers with permanent, partial or total disability have been referred to psychiatrists. The number, from my personal experience, is extremely high and it is disturbing. I think that as legislators we need an explanation why this pattern is existing at the board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: What is the number of psychiatric consultations?

Dr. McCracken: I have to keep remembering that, while we're here for 1976, we keep talking about 1977. In 1977, of all the medical treatment carried out on the injured workers in the province, there were 987 consultations for psychiatry—actually a very low figure. It's not a big item at all on our treatment program, and certainly a very small item on medical costs.

Mr. di Santo: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman? Because I think there is a misunderstanding. Is Dr. McCracken talking about treatment or people who have been referred to psychiatrists for assessment?

Dr. McCracken: Both.

Mr. di Santo: That's the total figure?

Dr. McCracken: This includes both treatment and consultations.

Mr. di Santo: That is the total figure?

Dr. McCracken: That is correct.

Mr. di Santo: Then something must be wrong with my files. But I'll bring it up in the House.

Mr. Mackenzie: Is that individuals, Dr. McCracken, or is there any duplication in that figure?

Dr. McCracken: There is a certain amount of duplication as well, yes.

Mr. di Santo: I have a very high number of people who are referred to psychiatrists.

Mr. Mackenzie: You're saying your figures show less than 900 people who have had psychiatric treatment.

Dr. McCracken: That is correct.

Mr. di Santo: Okay. Thank you very much.

Mr. Lupusella: I would like to restrain my remarks, taking into consideration that I have my constituency office hours tonight. I would like to refer to a few points which have been raised already by my colleagues.

Let me tell the chairman, Michael Starr, that almost every Wednesday in my constituency office most of the people who are coming to see me are coming with problems related to the Workmen's Compensation Board files. It seems that this pattern started a long time ago among the people living in my area. I am deeply involved with those cases and I am going to get, not into specific cases, but into loopholes which are presently existing within the whole operation of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Because we were on the subject of surgeon and specialist, and the referral of injured workers to particular specialists, let me tell the minister that I feel a lot of sympathy about her cold. She made me feel miserable today. I would like to tell her to pay quite close attention to it and not be assessed by any board surgical consultant. The decision of some of those consultants might be that she might be suffering psychosomatic cold symptoms. Instead of saying that it might be a pathological symptom, they might say that it might be psychosomatic cold symptoms.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Oh, it happens all the time. You don't remember the old song from Guys and Dolls?

Mr. Lupusella: I am suggesting that instead of going to the board's surgical consultants you make your own diagnosis.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I sure as heck wouldn't go to a surgical consultant about a cold, I'll tell you that.

Mr. Lupusella: Because then you might suffer from a psychological overlay in relation to those cold symptoms.

The reason I'm making this particular remark—a funny remark which has some concrete contents about a concrete problem which is particularly related to the old issue of board surgical consultants—is that I would like to say to the minister and to the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board how little confidence I have when I see medical assessments on cases of injured workers. Files pass through their hands and the board makes an assessment.

I am particularly concerned about the pre-existing hernia symptoms. I think the policy of the Workmen's Compensation Board is not quite clear. It seems to me, from cases I have had since 1975, that pre-existing hernias are not recognized by the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The board would not be likely to talk about this subject because I have very strong feelings on it.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, I hope they are going to change their policy.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The change in policy, I think, should be to remove it completely from compensable illness.

Mr. Lupusella: I don't think so.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I knew you were going to say that.

Mr. Lupusella: Anyway, to point up the position of the Workmen's Compensation Board, I would like to quote from an adjudicator statement which arrived at my office just a few days ago, and even though the Workmen's Compensation Board might have its own position in relation to this particular issue, I think the way the Workmen's Compensation Board is dealing with this particular issue must be considered—that is until the Minister of Labour abolishes it. I hope she won't because we would raise criticism of that.

I quote from that report:

"The submissions made at the hearing and the medical reports entered into the record were referred to the board's surgical consultant. It is the board doctor's opinion that only if a pre-existing noncompensable hernia condition is caused to strangulate as a direct result of an industrial accident and as a result requires emergency surgery to save the employee's life can the board be justified in accepting repair of a pre-existing hernia as a compensable matter."

That's very disgraceful. Let me tell you in a very blunt and open way that the board's surgical consultants are making those statements in relation to particular, wrong board policies. What about other policies in relation to back injuries, amputations, and percentage of disability? That's why I lost confidence in the board's surgical consultants. They are expressing unfair medical opinions on injured workers based on wrong and prejudiced judgments—I will provide you with an example later on—on which the board and the appeal examiner is supposed to base his decision.

I don't think that the present board policy of relying only on the board's surgical consultant is the right route to follow. It is my strong opinion, and I hope that the Minister of Labour is going to take note of that in the near future. I hope that those doctors are soon going to be abolished and be replaced with an independent panel of doctors on which the board is going to base its decisions; and that they can use their medical expertise without feeling any pressure.

In my opinion, the doctors are directly under such pressures—first of all, because they are working for the board, secondly they are basing their decisions on medical reports coming from other surgeons and specialists, medical reports which are quite negative in relation to the physical conditions of the worker. I hope that this particular situation is going to change.

[5:15]

Hon. B. Stephenson: Who is being negative?

Mr. Lupusella: Let's say that an injured worker got a physical and medical assessment by an outside doctor and a specialist which, in his opinion, was adverse to his real or pathological conditions; and let's say that the medical report itself was not positive in expressing the pathological situation of the injured worker; the board of surgical consultants then takes the opportunity to base its own judgement on those negative medical reports coming from outside. I've been dealing too long with cases of injured workers, and that's what is happening.

I think this situation should change and the board of surgical consultants should be abolished if you really want an independent and a fair medical decision expressed through those medical reports. In this way injured workers will receive an award by the board, which is going to be more fair and more humane and which really reflects the disability of the injured worker. That's the right road which we have to follow if we don't want to maintain the position which the board has been adverse in taking in its own decision in relation to claims related to injured workers. Let's have this independent panel of doctors and specialists to which the injured workers can be referred; they have all the expertise in the medical field. I am sure the situation will then somehow change. I don't think the present system is going to solve the problem.

On the matter of doctors and specialists, I would like to make the complaint that the Workmen's Compensation Board is really becoming, in some way, a political problem. That's why the Workmen's Compensation Board is not willing to make the changes which are required to solve the problems of injured workers in the province of Ontario. There exists an unfairness in medical decisions, especially when a representative of an injured worker is presenting cases before the board or before the appeal examiners. Unfortunately, they are based on the medical opinions of doctors, specialists or orthopaedic surgeons that have been adverse to the physical condition of the injured worker. To be more specific about this particular point, Madam Minister, you are a doctor but you are quite surprised at what I am saying.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't understand what you're saying.

Mr. Lupusella: I'm going to the point now.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Good.

Mr. Lupusella: How can the Workmen's Compensation Board make a fair decision when the board is receiving from certain doctors medical reports which are expressing—and I'm quoting from this letter; I don't want to mention the name of the specialist involved or the name of the worker involved in this particular case. I quote: "How can the board make a fair decision when the board is receiving medical reports based on that judgement?" As I stated, I won't mention the name but I will make particular reference to the names by using Mr. or Mrs. X.

"Mr. X is one of the many problems in this country of ours, because the immigration department allows people in who can't read or write English, so that when they have a relatively trivial disability they cannot be employed because there is no light work available if you don't handle the language. It is terribly frustrating for me . . ." That's a letter which was sent to a Member of Parliament. I would be ashamed if I was in his place. "It is terribly frustrating for me, as it must be for you, to try and place and to satisfy these people." I want to emphasize 'these people'. "I think very often the easiest way to handle it is for them to be transported back to their homeland.

"Mr. X is a very nice guy. I haven't seen him since 1970 and I don't think I can help you very much as to his present disability. I think I should also tell you that in a larger series recently investigated, 85 per cent of people on conservative surgical treatment are re-employable within three years." I notice he said "I haven't seen Mr. X since 1970."

I don't want to disclose the name of this specialist because I have a good relationship with a lot of specialists and a lot of doctors, when I am writing letters on behalf of workers coming to see me. I don't want to denounce the medical association or all the specialists in the province of Ontario. What I would like to tell the minister is that when the Workmen's Compensation Board takes a position and a decision in relation to injured workers, it has to deal with the medical opinions coming from these kinds of doctors and specialists.

I don't think this opinion is a fair one because it is very discriminatory and is racist in the first place. I don't think his opinion should be considered by the Workmen's Compensation Board, either by denying a certain percentage of disability or by denying weekly benefits when the person is on total temporary disability.

That's the kind of problem we are facing. It is not the first one. Because I can't disclose the name, I had an opportunity to show you. A lot of letters are coming into our office on a daily basis. That's how the board is basing its position and decision as well. How can those people involved in those particular problems claim justice when the board is relying on medical opinions expressed by these kinds of doctors and specialists?

Hon. B. Stephenson: You've only mentioned one. I would not think the entire profession was that way.

Mr. Lupusella: No, I made my point very clear that I don't want to accuse the whole medical association. I am using this particular letter as a tool to emphasize the problems that exist within the Workmen's Compensation Board structure. I don't think the present system is the right tool to use in assessing percentage of disability or awards given to injured workers when we have to deal with—maybe I can rephrase my opinion—a certain number of these kinds of people, these kinds of specialists and these kinds of surgeons.

As I stated before, it is not the first report; I have others. If you want to discuss the matter with me personally, I will do it. I think this issue should be pursued in the Legislature as a basic tool to make sure no discrimination takes place in relation to those people having pathological problems about their physical conditions and the way in which the board thinks. Maybe it's a genuine attitude, that they are basing their decisions in relation to those kinds of reports.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Lupusella, the board bases its medical decisions upon the medical reports which are submitted.

Mr. Lupusella: That's what I want to point out, that it is influenced by those medical reports, and I don't think you can accomplish a good deal of justice when that person involved in that particular case may never have received any particular word from the Workmen's Compensation Board in relation to the percentage of disability. Those are the kinds of problems which we are facing in relation to the board's surgical consultant.

The paragraph I quoted from the appeals adjudicator or examiner is also an indication of how the whole procedure is falling apart. In my opinion, it is falling apart, and I think it's up to the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board and it's up to you, because the whole Workmen's Compensation Board falls under your jurisdiction, to find the new ways and the new methods for improving the system. At least, the Act is under your jurisdiction, and the Act also reflects the kind of structure which presently exists at the Workmen's Compensation Board, so you can't really divide the two issues.

Since 1975, the board has appeared before us—and actually I'm getting into the same situation as my colleague from Nickel Belt, I'm getting into some kind of a political frustration of raising particular issues over the years without seeing any particular action or any particular response from the Workmen's Compensation Board. It seems the issues and the criticisms which we raise every year reflect the real problem, because we are very close to people coming with great confidence before us in our constituency offices or by phone, and of course we deal with them in a very direct way and we feel their issues, their problems, and when the board appears before us we also show our sense of frustration when we talk about certain problems existing within the present structure.

We have raised a lot of questions in the Legislature. I'm sure the Minister of Labour knows the problems which injured workers are affected by. Since 1975, we have been mentioning the problem of the increase of pensions related to injured workers.

On December 16, 1975, the first such question related to Workmen's Compensation Board benefits was raised in the Legislature. On June 18, 1976, another question was raised to the minister in relation to an increase in those pensions. On May 18, 1976, another question was raised in the Legislature in relation to Workmen's Compensation Board increases. On October 17, 1977, another question was raised in the Legislature. On February 28, 1978, again another question in relation to this particular issue. February 24, 1978, another question was raised in the Legislature. February 27, 1978, again another question was raised, and on February 24, 1978, another question was raised in the Legislature. As a legislator, I don't see the reason why we have to go through this political harassment—that's what it is—of raising questions on the floor of the Legislature and receiving negative answers on what the Minister of Labour is planning to do in relation to those issues.

[5:30]

Just to refresh your mind, on December 6, 1976, I introduced a private member's bill in the Legislature—and which I point out is still there; I am sure it will never be discussed because there are fundamental and philosophical and political points involved—that all pensions of injured workers should be raised in relation to the cost-of-living increase. It seems that Mr. Starr pointed out to this committee of the Legislature that the cost of living has since risen 14 per cent since the last increase if I am not mistaken.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I mentioned 17 today.

Mr. di Santo: Seventeen. So this is an indication of how strongly we feel—not as individual members but as a party. If you want to terminate this kind of question in the Legislature, you have an opportunity to implement this particular bill in order that the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board and yourself and the future ministers won't receive the same criticism in the years to come and we can end this hard political situation.

I don't think that you are going to increase those pensions before December. I would like to know from you exactly when you are going to increase them. We are going to solve the problem. I don't think that the Legislature should be forced to apply pressure for the years to come when you have a simple remedy—to present legislation in the Legislature to make sure that those pensions are going to be tied to the cost-of-living increase.

Mr. Lane: A point of privilege please. Can we figure out the time-frame that we have here?

I was unaware that this meeting was going to go on to this time of the evening. I have another commitment at this point in time. The third party have had 90 per cent of the time this afternoon—all day long, as a matter of fact. Now is there no end to it or what happens?

Mr. McClellan: What do you mean, is there no end to it?

Mr. Acting Chairman: I thought we'd go to 6, Mr. Lane.

Mr. Lane: Was that a foregone conclusion when we started this morning?

Mr. Warner: As a matter of fact, it was my understanding that it would be flexible and we could in fact be sitting this evening depending upon the wishes of the committee. That's my understanding from the government House leader.

Mr. Acting Chairman: That's entirely up to the committee.

Mr. Warner: It wouldn't seem to me to be unreasonable, since my understanding is we haven't sat one day in the last 12 months to deal with the Workmen's Compensation Board. So surely to sit to 6 and then possibly in the evening is not unreasonable.

Mr. Lane: I don't know when we ever sat on Wednesday night before.

Mr. McClellan: Talk to your House leader.

Mr. Warner: The government House leader indicated it's up to the committee to decide.

Mr. Laughren: That was the agreement among the House leaders certainly—that if they wanted to sit this evening they could. Why not?

Mr. Haggerty: They have every goddamned right according to my House leader; normally the procedure is to give it to us in writing.

Mr. Bounsall: This was the announcement also made by the government House leader in the House when the subject was brought up. The agreement worked out was that instead of three different sessions on three different days would Wednesday all day—morning, afternoon and evening, if necessary—be acceptable. That was the question put to the interested people in the caucuses by their respective House leaders. We agreed to that and that was what was presented by the government House leader.

Mr. Laughren: Most people thought that one day was simply not enough for a full debate with the board. That's why the House leaders had the agreement that we could use the evening as well.

Mr. Haggerty: On my thing it says 6 o'clock.

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, how many speakers are there on your list still?

Mr. Acting Chairman: Mr. Lupusella, Mr. McClellan, Mr. Warner and Ms. Bryden.

Mr. Laughren: Why not ask them how long they'll be, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. McClellan: I have been sitting here since 10 o'clock this morning waiting my turn to speak.

Mr. Bounsall: If I could just say that the Chairman has recognized those persons who wanted to speak.

Mr. Haggerty: There may be others.

Mr. Bounsall: Ray and John, if you wanted to come in, or other members of your caucus were interested, the sittings are here for you to come to.

Mr. Laughren: One compromise might be, if the committee wanted to sit right through rather than breaking at 6 and coming back at 8. I don't know what arrangements these people have made.

Mr. Lane: Mr. Chairman, I have a commitment and I have to go, but I just felt that I wasn't aware that we were going to be sitting here all day and all night.

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to move—and I think it is up to the committee to decide—that we close at 6 and then reassemble at 8 until such time as all those who wish to speak have spoken, unless 10:30 occurs before that.

Mr. Haggerty: I am going to go up and check my agenda before I make any commitment.

Ms. Bryden: I don't object to 7:30, but I would prefer 8.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Let's continue then.

Mr. Warner: Mr. McClellan needs about a half hour, I think, and I need about 10 minutes.

Ms. Bryden: I need about 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. Warner: So we are talking one hour. Unless there are other speakers who are not presently on your list we could probably complete this by 6:30 and then in that way we wouldn't have to come back tonight, and the minister could have some proper rest for her cold.

Ms. Bryden: It depends on how long Mr. Lupusella is going on.

Mr. Warner: What is the recipe—fruit juice, Aspirin and rest?

Mr. Bounsall: Probably the quickest way to wind it up time-wise is just to continue to sit until we conclude. Tony, we know, has to cut it short because he has to leave.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Then we will continue until we have finished. All right?

Mr. Bounsall: A fine decision, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I hope it's not later than 7 o'clock.

Mr. Acting Chairman: I think 7 o'clock should do it. Please continue.

Mr. Lupusella: I would like to make it clear to the minister that old age security pensions, and she is very well aware of this, and pension plans are tied to the consumer price index, and we say as a party, and I strongly believe as an individual, that pensions of injured workers should follow the same scheme. Instead of getting into a political situation in which each party is pushing for those increases, we can end up with the situation by presenting a comprehensive and reasonable bill which is going to end this particular situation.

At the moment, totally and permanently disabled workers are forced into permanent poverty and most totally disabled workers receive the minimum pension of $400 a month, or close to it, providing them with an annual income $2,700 below the poverty level. It is really shameful that the government is not taking any particular action to terminate this particular situation. Again, I hope when the minister is going to present this bill in the Legislature it is going to include this particular clause in order that the same situation which took place since 1975 won't happen again.

I would like to make a few remarks in relation to the NDP task force on the Workmen's Compensation Board and I don't want to get into particular details of it because my colleague from Nickel Belt has been going into it. I want to reserve my criticism, a very respectable criticism, of the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, who especially during the election and before the election was taking an active role in this political arena. I want to suggest, as my colleague from Nickel Belt did, that if he is willing to come down into the political arena, I'm inviting him to come in my riding in Dovercourt.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Don't challenge me. I might do that.

Mr. Lupusella: Why not? You are very welcome.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You wouldn't be able to stop me either.

Mr. Lupusella: That's fine, with pleasure. I would like to face that situation.

Mr. McClellan: You've got to get at least 15 per cent of the vote.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I might run for the NDP.

Mr. Lupusella: What you are going to find in Dovercourt is almost 10 per cent of injured workers who are dealing with the Workmen's Compensation Board on a daily basis because it is a working riding. You are going to find almost 30 per cent of the people unemployed as well. When we raise those kinds of criticism, we really feel that we are putting too much time on it instead of getting deeply involved in the activities of the Legislature. Therefore, I think from now on you should refrain from the kind of criticism which you raised against the NDP that we are trying to use this particular issue as a political posture. That is completely nonsense.

We feel the issue in a very forceful way because we are dealing with injured workers. When I'm spending my time in my constituency office from 6 o'clock to 11 o'clock, most of the complaints are related to Workmen's Compensation Board. When you appear before us I have the right to scream because I feel the issue. When I'm spending time down at the Workmen's Compensation Board, we are not coming for political patronage. We are coming there to present a fair situation about the claim of the injured worker with the complications involved. Once a year we are going to raise those loopholes which are existing within the structure of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

I want to emphasize the point raised by my colleague from Nickel Belt that it is time that the Workmen's Compensation Board should be replaced immediately with a universal insurance scheme. You have been quoted in one newspaper—and I recall it very well—as saying that our social environment now is ready to accept such a scheme. I hope I am quoting you properly. I guess you have also been quoted as saying that it's time that pensions of injured workers should be indexed to the cost of living.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I said I was sympathetic to them.

Mr. Lupusella: Even with the pensions of injured workers, you have been sympathetic to index those pensions to the cost-of-living increase.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I am always sympathetic. That's the way I have been all my life.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why you should be sympathetic to the criticism raised by my former leader, Mr. Lewis. You sympathize with those particular issues but in the meantime with the Minister of Labour you are playing a ping-pong game; that's what you are doing.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is an absolutely unfair, unjust and unworthy statement of an individual member of the Legislature. It's somewhat like your stance about workmen's compensation most of the time. It is purely political.

Mr. Warner: You're just a government apologist.

Mr. Lupusella: Then why don't you increase those pensions immediately? Why have you been waiting since 1975 to increase those pensions? Up to now those pensions are not increased. What kind of explanation do you have for not increasing those pensions? We realize today and we find out today that the Workmen's Compensation Board is supposed to meet its financial liability. That is where the problem lies. That is where the great loophole is existing within the whole operation of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Each time you have to raise pensions, of course, you have to take a look at the financial liability of the Workmen's Compensation Board. For how many years are you going to do that? [5:45]

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am not sure it has ever been that.

Mr. Lupusella: You are going to increase the pension this year, one hopes, and then we are going to start again the criticism for another two, three years. How are you going to solve this problem?

You have been denying also my allegation that even the percentage of pensions assisted by the Workmen's Compensation Board pension department has in some way some kind of relationship with this financial liability need.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is absolutely untrue. It is time that you recognized and realized that it was untrue.

Mr. Lupusella: It is your prerogative to say that.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But it is not your prerogative to make false statements.

Mr. Laughren: It's constructive criticism.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's not constructive criticism—

Mr. Laughren: Yes, it is.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It's an untruth.

Mr. Lupusella: Let me raise another question then: Would you please tell me how much money the board needs to run the whole operation of the Workmen's Compensation Board in relation to the total financial liability to face all regular activities taking place in relation to all departments, in relation to pensions, in relation to everything.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Seven per cent.

Mr. Lupusella: Seven per cent? I am talking about a total amount of money. It seems that in 1976 you had $1.4 billion of financial liability. How much would be the total? Seven per cent of what?

Mr. Harding: Seven cents of the income dollar.

Mr. Lupusella: Resulting in total figures, based on dollars—

Hon. Mr. Starr: You are asking, what is the cost of administration?

Mr. Lupusella: Everything. The total operation.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Is it $600 million?

Mr. Lupusella: It's $600 million a year. In other words, it seems there is a shortfall. I don't have the figures with me. Do you have any shortfall to meet this kind of provision to run, in a fairer way, the total operation of the Workmen's Compensation Board? I'm talking about dollars and cents.

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: I don't think we understand the question.

Mr. Lupusella: The principle that I am trying to raise is that it seems the Workmen's Compensation Board is facing difficulties in raising injured workers' pensions because, by doing that, it has to meet its financial liability of carrying on all the activities of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Is that correct? Or am I wrong?

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: I don't think it is correct.

Mr. Lupusella: Then what is the problem in raising those pensions? Would you please give me an answer to that?

Mr. Laughren: Good question.

Mr. Lupusella: What is the problem there? Tell me.

Mr. McClellan: Why haven't you raised the rates?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Because I wish to do whatever is necessary in the most knowledgeable and responsible way possible, and because I did not know the background information which I feel is essential in order to make the most appropriate changes. I felt that I had to have that information, and that is the information which is forthcoming.

Mr. McClellan: It took you three years to get it.

Mr. Lupusella: Three years to do that?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am sorry; it didn't. It took one year to get it.

Mr. McClellan: You started saying that in 1976. The Hansards are here. The board was studying it in 1975, which is three years ago.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The board was assessing the effect of the changes from 1974 and 1975; it was not making a study of this sort that has been commissioned.

Mr. Laughren: If you implement the recommendations of our task force report, when you come here next year we will heap nothing but praise upon you.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yeah! Floyd, I don't believe you. I really do not believe you.

Mr. Laughren: How can you say that? I have never lied to you before.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No?

Mr. Lupusella: Can I have a statement or some sort of assurance from the minister what she is planning to do in relation to those increases?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, you cannot have a statement at this point. I am not prepared to give you a statement at this point.

Mr. Lupusella: In the Legislature on October 17, 1977, Mr. Lewis raised a particular question with the Minister of Labour, and I am quoting from Hansard dated October 17, 1977: "A question of the Minister of Labour, if I may: Given the counterpoint outside this Legislature during the early proceedings today, can the minister indicate to the House whether she intends shortly to provide an inflationary raise in the level of workmen's compensation pensions?"

And the minister replied: "I am curious as to the definition of an 'inflationary raise.' Does the hon. member mean one that will cause inflation or one that will meet levels?"

And Mr. Lewis again: "By way of supplementary, why doesn't the minister use her imagination and talk about pegging it to the rise in inflation or even to the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines since nothing has been—I will rephrase it quickly, Mr. Speaker, knowing you would wish me to, as a supplementary: Given that the pensions have not been increased since July 1975, I think, is the minister now prepared to meet at least the inflationary rises in the cost of living since that time?"

And the minister: "I am sure there will be recommendations coming forward within the reasonably foreseeable future regarding this specific matter, which has been under intensive study."

Mr. Laughren: A year and a half ago.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, that's October 1977.

Mr. Lupusella: October 1977. But we raised those particular issues back on December 16, 1975.

Then I had, on the same question, a supplementary question: "Given the fact that some time in 1976 I introduced in the Legislature a private member's bill to increase injured workers' pensions based on the cost of living starting in July 1975 . . . what is the minister planning to do?"

And the minister replied to my supplementary question: ". . . we have given attention to it, we are continuing to give attention to it, and it will be resolved."

And Mr. Lewis said: "Very helpful to the people outside"; because there was a demonstration outside the Legislature.

What did you mean with this statement then?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Just precisely what I said.

Mr. Lupusella: So why don't you make a statement—

Hon. B. Stephenson: It will be resolved.

Mr. Lupusella: It will be resolved how? When? Which way? What is it?

Mr. Laughren: Will it be retroactive?

Mr. Lupusella: Are you playing with words—

Hon. B. Stephenson: No.

Mr. Lupusella: —in the Legislature or are you planning to give to the members an indication of what you are planning to do?

Hon. B. Stephenson: If you're asking me for a specific amount and a specific date on which it will be introduced, I cannot give it to you at this time.

Mr. Lupusella: Before you told me that at least you are going to raise pensions before December for sure.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I didn't.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, you did.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Before December 1978, yes.

Mr. Lupusella: Okay, 1978.

Mr. Mackenzie: You said "within a reasonable period of time" six months ago. What does a reasonable period mean?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said within the foreseeable future.

Mr. Lupusella: So it seems that you don't want to commit yourself.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It depends on how long your vision is, I guess.

Mr. Lupusella: It seems that you don't want to commit yourself in relation to the particular issue of indexing the pensions to the cost-of-living increases.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I cannot since there are certain procedures which must be followed in order to do this, and I cannot tell you how long that will take.

Mr. Lupusella: Again, let me remind you now—

Hon. B. Stephenson: It will be before December 1978.

Mr. Lupusella: In relation to this particular issue I am talking about?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes.

Mr. Lupusella: Pensions indexed to the cost of living?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I did not say that they would be indexed to the cost of living. I said there will be a change and I can't tell you what the level will be or what the date will be, I just told you that.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why I'm raising the particular issue. You should give a close look at this particular matter of indexing pensions of injured workers to the increase in the cost of living.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Lupusella, I have said we will be giving a close look at it. I have not said we will be coming in with that specific formula which you suggested because I don't know whether that is so or not at this point, and I will not lie to you, Mr. Lupusella. You shouldn't say that because I do not.

Mr. Lupusella: Of course, you never did. I don't want to make another allegation.

An hon. member: You put words in his mouth.

Mr. Lupusella: Yes. What I'm trying to emphasize today is that members of this Legislature shouldn't be involved in those particular issues that we have to press for a certain number of years to make certain changes, when you have an opportunity in the months to come to solve all the problems which members of this Legislature have been talking about for several years. I hope that you're going to solve this particular issue immediately, because there is a great need among injured workers in the province of Ontario. They would like to see those changes.

I had been talking about the report of the NDP task force. The chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board has been sitting here since this morning. It seems that he has been taking a very defensive role in relation to the whole issue.

Mr. Laughren: He hasn't even made any notes. He probably ignored them. Such arrogance.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Harding has been making notes all the time.

Mr. Lupusella: It seems that next year they're going to appear before us and say: "We didn't make reasonable criticism to solve those problems." We are serious about those problems. We feel those problems. In respect to our NDP task force, I remember that on April 19, 1977, you had a news release in which you acted upon our recommendations. So you can't say that we were playing a political game. It was serious work which we did in the NDP to travel around the province of Ontario. Your position that we were playing politics really didn't make any sense. It will never make sense. In fact, let me quote something upon this report from this news release which was given out by the board on April 19, 1977, for immediate release:

"A major new staff expansion designed to enhance services to Ontario's injured workers was announced today by Michael Starr, chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board. In addition, the board will open four new information service offices in Timmins, Sault Ste. Marie, St. Catharines and Kingston. As part of the expansion, an increase in rehabilitation services staff from 554 to 637 was approved by the corporate board earlier this year and is already under way. Another major element in increasing claims services staff from 592 to 697 was approved by the board today and the hiring will start immediately." I want to go back to this particular point later.

"Demands for the board's services continue to rise," Mr. Starr said, "and additional staff are needed to reduce caseloads to more effective levels. The more successful we can be in restoring injured workers to productive lives the better it is for the workers themselves as well as for the employers and for the provincial economy."

"The new staff expansion program will see 188 new employees hired by the board between January 1 and September 3 this year. At year-end 1976, the board employed a staff of 1,891 and paid the salaries of another 319 persons working with nine Ontario safety associations."

From this news release I would like to find out what the board has been doing to meet this kind of ceiling which you have been claiming.

Hon. Mr. Starr: It has all been met.

Mr. Lupusella: All?

[6:00]

Hon. Mr. Starr: All of the offices have been opened up, including Kingston which was opened last month. In addition to that, the board has approved for this year the hiring of 252 more employees—to give you better service. I hope, sir, you agree with that.

Mr. Lupusella: Oh, yes, of course. I want more of those people working in those departments. In fact, I would like to raise the particular concern that from 1975 to 1976 there was an increase of 9.7 per cent in relation to injuries in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Last year there was an increase? It was a decrease of two per cent over—

Mr. Lupusella: That's fine, but I am talking about the actual percentage between 1975 and 1976, that we had a 9.7 per cent increase in injuries in the province of Ontario. Do you have any estimate for 1977?

Hon. Mr. Starr: There was a two per cent decrease. Do you want an estimate for 1978?

Mr. Lupusella: Yes; none?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you think I am going to throw myself out of a job?

Mr. Lupusella: That's what we are looking for, that in the province of Ontario no injuries should take place. In fact, in relation to this particular issue, I would like to remind—

Hon. B. Stephenson: There's no need to threaten.

Mr. Lupusella: I am sorry, but it was done not in a very malignant way.

I would like to remind the minister that she has an opportunity now, through Bill 70, to make sure that she will give the right to refuse to work to the workers when they are monitoring unsafe conditions on the work place. I am sure you are playing a very important role to make sure that in Bill 70 the right to refuse to work will be given completely to the workers without any particular concern from the workers that if they are going to apply the principle they might be penalized.

If you are really concerned about decreasing the number of injuries, the percentage of injuries taking place around the province of Ontario, the right to refuse to work is a principle which shouldn't be compromised with other clauses that the worker might abuse that right or might be penalized if he wants to see the effectiveness of such principle. I hope that she's going to do that.

I see a close relationship between Bill 70 and injuries, and I am sure if the minister is going to do that, financial benefits will derive from Bill 70 and go back to the industries because they are going to save a lot of money if the percentage of disability is going to decrease. That's why the right to refuse to work in the province of Ontario should be given to the worker without any coercion, without any problem that they might be penalized each time they are going to implement this right.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I would remind the hon. member that that right has been there since December 16, 1976.

Mr. Lupusella: I beg your pardon?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said I would remind you that that right has been in the hands of the workers of this province since December 16, 1976.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, when Bill 70 is going to be debated in the Legislature, as a party we are not quite happy about the way the right to refuse to work has been rephrased in the bill, and we are going to make certain changes in order that workers in the province of Ontario are going to feel confident that when they are going to apply this particular principle they may do so without the fear of being penalized or being disciplined because they didn't use this principle in the right way. In other words, I don't want to go through this news release. The release, issued by the board on April 19, 1977, was to the effect that the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board saw the problems which were raised through the report of the NDP task force. But instead of saying that they were using the issue in political terms—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I beg your pardon—no, no. We hadn't analysed your task force report when they made that decision.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We didn't have the report at all.

Mr. Lupusella: No? Well, I may be wrong.

Hon. B. Stephenson: What was the date of the report?

Mr. Lupusella: April 19, 1977.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No—the date of the task force report; it's on the front.

Mr. Lupusella: April 6, 1977.

Hon. B. Stephenson: On the front page—I think it was September, 1976.

Mr. Lupusella: The release was September 1.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The board's release was April 1977.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We were way ahead of you there.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, you didn't want to give us credit for doing that.

Mr. Laughren: Why are you being so provocative when we've been gentle on you all day?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I've been nice to you. I'm just saying we are ahead of you, that's all.

Mr. McClellan: It couldn't have been the election in May. That couldn't have had anything to do with that, could it?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, the board's release was April 19.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to proceed with my statement. I guess it was during the campaign—

Mr. Laughren: My colleague is quite right, you know. The date of the report is September; we are holding our hearings already, we had made the recommendations in many of the centres of Ontario—

Hon. Mr. Starr: We hadn't even looked at your task force report, nor had we analysed it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Are we going to get through this, or are we going to—

Mr. Laughren: Don't try to mislead the member; he knows more about compensation than you will ever know.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Who is that?

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Lupusella.

Hon. Mr. Starr: The only thing he knows about the Workmen's Compensation Board is that he goes around soliciting for his campaign funds there.

Mr. Warner: Don't malign him.

An hon. member: How did he do?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Nobody gave to him, but he disrupted the whole staff for about a day.

Mr. Laughren: He's just as popular with your staff as he is among injured workers.

Mr. Lupusella: What I am disappointed about is when I hear the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board saying, "As you know, the New Democratic Party has sponsored a series of 10 task force inquiries concerning workmen's compensation in cities throughout the province. They have described these meetings as a political exercise."

Hon. Mr. Starr: It sure was.

Mr. Lupusella: You see? You are the stubborn person.

Hon. Mr. Starr: As chairman I had a right and a responsibility to defend the board against the attacks. The attacks were not justified.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, if I may, then, I would like to make a simple statement: that the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board is a civil servant employee; and as a civil servant employee he is not supposed to get involved in the activities of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I am not a civil servant employee at all. That shows how much you know about the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Hon. B. Stephenson: None of the employees of the Workmen's Compensation Board is in the civil service.

Mr. Lupusella: Why do you carry all the burden of this criticism? It is very understandable—

Hon. B. Stephenson: I'm saying that they are not civil servants.

Mr. Lupusella: We have been trying to do something which was at least productive—of making recommendations through our report. Of course, we won't accept the criticism made by the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board. They have been trying to deal with claims to the best of their ability.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Dr. Bounsall, why would your leader say that it was a political exercise if it were something other than a political exercise? That was the statement that he made.

Mr. Laughren: What's wrong with a political exercise?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Yes, what's wrong with that? I said it was a political exercise—

Mr. Laughren: But why is the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board becoming a politician? Do you know what you should do? You should ask the people who came around and attended the hearings whether they thought it was a constructive force or not, or whether they thought it was a silly game.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you want me to tell you?

Mr. Lupusella: Yes, tell us.

Mr. Laughren: They were there. They listened.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's exactly what they said—it was a silly game.

Mr. Laughren: They said that?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Laughren: Well then they were talking out of both sides of their mouths, because that's not what they told us.

Hon. Mr. Starr: It was set up.

Mr. Laughren: That's very interesting. I'm glad you told me that.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You bet.

Mr. Laughren: My attitude has changed about those people we work with at the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Mr. Lupusella: Right.

Mr. Laughren: I had a great deal of respect—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Your attitude had changed about them because they were there.

Mr. Laughren: Why were they participating in a silly game then? Why would they go there? What were you doing sending them around?

Mr. Acting Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Laughren: It's so ridiculous, it's silly. You don't learn a thing, year after year after year.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Not from you.

Mr. Laughren: You come back with your same silly—

Mr. Acting Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, when we get to the situation that in 1976 the board was—

Mr. Laughren: You're a joke.

Mr. Lupusella: —unable to grant entitlement in approximately six per cent of lost-time claims—they were unable to grant entitlement in approximately nine per cent of lost-time claims—and when this nine per cent of claims resulted in 31,000 claims not being allowed under the Act, and the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board defined those people as professional claimants or as chronic complainers, then it's some kind of accusation which we'll never buy from the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board let me tell you. We won't accept this calling of injured workers chronic complainers just because they are complaining in relation to their files.

Hon. B. Stephenson: He said they were chronic complainers? The nine per cent?

Mr. Lupusella: I'm just quoting from remarks by Michael Starr, the chairman of the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Board at a press conference in Toronto in May, 1977. I didn't invent those words.

Another problem which I would like to raise, and I raised it in 1975, was that I'm really unhappy about the rate of permanent disability awards. It seems that the Workmen's Compensation Board didn't review the rate schedule of permanent disabilities since 1914. I'm making particular reference to amputations.

Amputations are valued by the Workmen's Compensation Board on the lower scale of percentages. I think that the board is supposed to give a close look to the so-called "mid-chart" which establishes the rate of permanent disability, especially when we are dealing with amputations.

About the claims adjudicator, this morning we heard that the Workmen's Compensation Board is quite busy in dealing with the more than 400,000 claims each year. I heard that each claims adjudicator at the Workmen's Compensation Board is supposed to deal with from 150 to 200 claims a day. I would like to have some kind of justification for that. Some people from the board have been calling me. They have this problem. They have to rush decisions and sometimes—that's my own interpretation—when you rush a decision you also deny claims because you don't have a reasonable time.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you mean to say an adjudicator told you that they're denying claims because they're rushed?

Mr. Lupusella: No, what they've been saying was that they have 200 claims to look after every day—

Hon. Mr. Starr: You just said 100 a few minutes ago.

Mr. Lupusella: From 150 to 200 a day.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That number a day they have to look after? So what has happened as a result? What did they tell you that they do? [6:15]

Mr. Lupusella: My personal position is that if a claims adjudicator is involved in this caseload every day, to look after from 150 to 200 claims every day, the decisions which are going to be taken as a result—

Mr. Hamilton: If that were true then you are right, but I question it.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I would ask our director of claims adjudication, Mr. Kerr, to tell us something about this because I don't think it should be left on that basis.

Mr. Lupusella: I don't have the practical evidence to say that is what happened.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Why don't you find out before you—

Mr. Acting Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lupusella: What I am telling you is that I spoke to some claims adjudicator and those were the figures given to me. If you want to confirm or disagree with his statement I am a very flexible member.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I just want you to know the true facts.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, I didn't complete my statement. I was going to ask you if what I was told is true or if it is wrong. You are just rushing—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Is it true or isn't it?

Mr. W. R. Kerr: No, Mr. Lupusella. You will recall that in the chairman's statement he mentioned that in 1977 the board authorized quite an increase in the number of claims adjudicators. Again this year we received from the board permission to increase the number of adjudicators. When we appeared before a similar committee—and I believe you were here a couple of years ago—we did have a situation where we had an excessive number of claims and we were increasing the staff as described to bring it down to reasonable proportions.

The case-load that an adjudicator can handle depends upon a number of things—the complexity of the claim; the simple claims that are handled in the primary claims adjudication area can be handled in a much easier fashion than the more complicated cases. In the area of fatal claims the caseloads can be much higher because although they are very important claims, there isn't quite as much work to do in a fatal case as there is in some of the complicated lost-time claims.

So right now it varies; in the extended disability claims sections it's around 225 and in the primary adjudication section it varies from around 210.

Mr. Lupusella: Every day.

Mr. W. R. Kerr: No, no. This is the total case-load, not per day. This is the total case-load.

If I am a claims adjudicator I have a case-load of 225 claims. I don't see all those claims today. They are spread out over a period of time. And, of course, there are new claims coming in and there are claims that are terminated because the man is back to work or he has been rated for permanent disability.

So it depends entirely upon the complexity of the claims. It also depends upon the degree of experience of the claims adjudicator. In Mr. Starr's statement he also indicated that quite a few of our adjudicators are fairly new because of the recruitment program and they are not as experienced as they will be when they have been with us two or three years.

Mr. Laughren: For six years you have been using that argument.

Mr. W. R. Kerr: No, I haven't. If you recall, Mr. Laughren, in recent meetings we said that we were going to increase our staff and since we have been increasing our staff now we have a situation where our people aren't as experienced as they were. A lot of our experienced claims adjudicators have moved on to the appeal system and to other more senior jobs and in trying to reach our levels of experience we have had to hire people to train.

We are also looking ahead. The board agreed we should hire and train some additional people over and above what we require to do the job to replace people who will be reaching normal retirement age in the next three years or so. So we are trying to meet our commitments and we are trying to make sure we will have experienced claims adjudicators in years to come.

We feel right now that our staff have good morale. There's esprit de corps. They are working hard. The younger people, the newer adjudicators, have good potential. We are quite happy with the type of person being hired today. About 58 per cent of our claims adjudicators are women who have come to us with what we think are pretty good qualifications, but you can't go out and hire a trained adjudicator.

Mr. Laughren: Have they had a raise since July 1975?

Mr. Lupusella: Thank you very much for the explanation given to us. This criticism which I raised was given to me last year around December 1977 by a few claims adjudicators—of course, I won't give you the names—and that is why I raised this particular concern before you today.

Another problem I would like to raise is related to phone calls when workers get in touch with the Workmen's Compensation Board to make inquiry in relation to their claim. I want to tell the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board that last week, along with my assistant, I carried out a survey. What we did was to get in touch with each section of the Workmen's Compensation Board. You have a system where the last digit of the claim number is part of the phone number.

Let me tell you something: For three consecutive days, I and my secretary were calling the board every half hour the first day and then every 15 minutes. In three days we were unable to get through to the department. Do you have problems with Bell Canada? Do you have problems with phones? Can you give me a specific explanation as to why, in the three days when we were trying to get into each department, the phone was always busy?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I mentioned earlier, as an explanation, that we do receive 200 new claims every hour. We do have inquiries about ongoing claims. So we are busy—there's no question about it—and the proof of the fact is that you were unable to get through.

Mr. Lupusella: Therefore, if you are busy, which is very understandable—and we are not saying that you are not busy—don't you see the necessity of treating and curing this particular problem in order that workers around the province of Ontario are able to have an access by using the phone number to get in touch with some representative of each department?

Hon. Mr. Starr: Okay. I will ask Mr. Kerr to go into detail about this.

Mr. Lupusella: You might have all the reasons to say that everything is working. I am just providing you with my experience as a result of this survey.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I can understand that. I have only given you the explanation. But I think you are entitled to a proper explanation as to why you weren't able to get through.

Mr. W. R. Kerr: Yes. Mr. Lupusella, you have identified a problem which we have been wrestling with; and we have taken steps. We have had a lot of complaints in the past about access through the telephones, as you have described. The board approved a recommendation early this year that we should increase the number of telephone inquiry clerks by 12; so instead of 30, we are going to have 42 people working on the telephone inquiry service. That in itself is not enough; so they are adding 10 more local lines coming in to serve that area.

In addition, in the claims adjudication branch, they are just about completing now—it's not quite completed—the installation of 57 new lines going directly into the claims adjudicators. We think that, with the action we've taken here and we are in the process of taking, this should solve our problem. It will be reviewed again on an ongoing basis to make sure we have solved it. If we haven't, we will take another crack at it.

Mr. Lupusella: Thank you very much. I am going to pursue this survey to find out whether this goal is going to be reached.

A few remarks should be made in relation to the counselling specialists, which you have on the 20th floor. I can see the validity and the capacity of those people in handling files on particular complaints coming from the trade union movement and from interested individuals. But would like to see the board moving in some kind of direction whereby you are going to give them decision-making power on the files as well. Otherwise, their work is going to be useless; they are going to increase the bureaucracy and the red tape by pulling out files, making inquiries and all sorts of things that take place when you make an inquiry.

If you are going to co-ordinate—I can see that their presence is vital. But if you don't give them the power to make decisions on that level as well, I think you are going to waste the energy of those people who have been sitting there all day long, receiving inquiries, but for what? To just pull out the file, send it to the claims department or pension department? And they don't have any say on the file either. If they pull out the file, they should also have an opportunity to go through the file and make particular recommendations as well. That's how you are best going to utilize those expert people who are sitting on the 20th floor.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Do you want an explanation on that?

Mr. Lupusella: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. Dave Adamson is here and he's been head of that group for a few months. I wonder if you would come up, David, and explain the function and whether you do have the right of decision.

Mr. Lupusella: Let me tell you that I didn't receive any help from the counselling specialist dealing with my office, so I don't know.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think it might be useful for this committee for Mr. Adamson to define the responsibilities of that group and what they have been doing.

Mr. McClellan: We don't really want to know how the counselling specialist really works.

Mr. Lupusella: Well, in principle, maybe—

Hon. Mr. Starr: All right, you want to know whether they can make decisions? There is the suggestion that they should be given the right of decision. Outline what you do, David.

Mr. Adamson: Well, we have seven counselling specialists in our area here at the moment, and essentially what we are involved in is trying to get back with a quick response to any representative who makes an inquiry to our group. In our area, if we get the inquiry, we will take it to the exact source to solve that problem.

When we are looking at that file, we will go through it very thoroughly to ensure that that particular employee is entitled to full benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act. You may have an inquiry concerning a specific area. It may have to do with his weekly level of benefits. When we are going through the file, if we happen to come across some other area where we can offer assistance or can get back to you, we certainly will. But when it comes to decision-making, we would be taking away the responsibilities assigned to the adjudication branch, to the appeals area, whether it be with the pensions, the adjudication branch—

Hon. Mr. Starr: Rehabilitation.

Mr. Adamson: —or rehabilitation. When our area was set up it was strictly in a counselling function, not in a decision-making position.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why I extended the right principle which exists in there. Maybe I should have rephrased my statement by saying that their input on the decision-making should be taken into consideration when the file goes back or goes down to the claims adjudicator or the claims review branch or the appeal system because when a person is making such inquiry, you deal with a specific issue and at least the person knows what you are talking about. So if he is going to write a memo on the file, for example, and the file goes back to the claims adjudicator or to pension officers, at least the memo should have an input on the decision-making of the file itself. That's what I meant.

Mr. Adamson: Actually, on this, Mr. Lupusella, if we do get an inquiry with respect to—and I am using an example—making a further payment to an injured employee, we can look at that file and if we find that that man is behind in his compensation payment, we do have the authority to authorize a continuing compensation payment but we don't have the authority to make an initial decision with respect to entitlement in that claim. But we can make a continuing payment in that file. If it's a case where a person is desperate for one reason or another, then we actually walk it down to that operating branch to have immediate action taken.

Mr. Lupusella: I hope I made my statement clear, what I meant on the counselling specialist, not just when you deal with the delay in cheques and so on. I am just particularly concerned when you have to deal with, for example, the claims review branch, or before the claim goes before the appeal system. The counselling specialist has an opportunity to talk with the person making an inquiry, and at least the issue is very well defined, in order that the counselling specialist can write a memo on the file in order that it will be part of the decision-making of the file as well.

Mr. Adamson: This is where we can be of great help. The counselling specialists have a wide working experience and exposure and knowledge of the various departments of the board. If you were to make an inquiry to a specific department in the board, and if you had several problems relating to that case, they might not be in a position where they could give you advice or have the ability to redirect the problems to the other departments. When they come to our department, we have staff who have been trained in pensions, rehabilitation and various areas of the board. We can take an overall look at the claim and outline specific suggestions to resolve the problems.

Mr. Lupusella: Again, I hope I made my point by stating that general inquiries are very well handled by those people, but when you deal with specific issues in which you are involving other sections of each department they don't have any say any more. That's why I am trying to emphasize the point that they can write memos to express their opinion as well, because they have the full expertise. They can help even a claims adjudicator before a decision is taken. The more people who are involved, the better it is. I am not criticizing the handling of the general inquiry, the phone call which maybe is related to a request for certain information, or report a delay in the cheque or a discrepancy in the payment. I am going further than that, and I hope you will consider my point.

In relation to widows' pensions, Mr. Chairman, and in particular Madam Minister, I hope that when a bill is introduced in the Legislature more attention will be given to these widows who have been living on only $286 a month. I hope you are going to be really generous, because, first of all, they lost their husbands, and I don't think that $286 a month reflects the loss of their husbands.

I hope you will consider this particular clause very intently and give it more consideration, because more widows have been coming to my office complaining about receiving only $286 a month. I hope you will look after that.

I am sure the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board and the minister are aware of particular correspondence which has taken place between my office, the minister's office, and the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board. For the last two years I have been trying to deal with specific claims, and I have to show you the kind of frustration I went through in relation to specific cases which were related to recurrent disabilities—disabilities which occurred maybe three or four years ago and then there was a deterioration of physical condition four years later—by presenting the case and by going through the appeal procedure, which sometimes has been denied, and by presenting new medical reports, in which the orthopaedic surgeon visited the same person four years ago when the case was called and the same surgeon saw the same person four years after he performed the surgery which was related to that particular accident.

With the medical reports from that specialist emphasizing that there was a relationship between the first accident and the recurrence which took place four years later, with the Workmen's Compensation Board considering even the correspondence which took place between the minister, the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board and my office, there was no opportunity for us to reopen the claim and make another appeal. Why?

I am just wondering, how can you reopen a case when a person by having new medical reports and new medical statements about that first accident—even though the claim was closed in those days—and then four years later when his physical condition had really deteriorated and surgery was performed, and even my informing the minister and the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board, they didn't give me an opportunity to defend the injured worker before the appeals procedure.

I would like to have a clear explanation as to why those particular incidents have been taking place. I really feel sorry about those people. If you want medical evidence coming from certain specialists performing surgery and when you are not sure about the relationship between the accident which took place maybe four years ago and the recurrence which took place four years later with medical reports, why is the board referring those people to other consultants when the same surgeon was involved on the case? Can I have some explanation for that? I am completely frustrated because you have the cases. I wrote to you several times and to the minister as well.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I am sure if we knew we were going to deal with specific cases, Mr. Lupusella, we would have had an explanation. If you want to give us more information, we will write to you with the explanation.

Mr. Lupusella: The explanation was provided to me by the decision of the appeal board that the new medical reports had been seen in the light of the appeal board decision which took place four years before.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But if there was new evidence—

Mr. Lupusella: So why don't you give the benefit to this man to be defended again before the appeal board to make a dispute?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Would you kindly give me the name and the number of the individual involved and I will look into it?

Mr. Lupusella: If you take a look in your office, you have all the correspondence about those particular people. You have been advised as well. Yes, you have it. I don't have to give you the claim number.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Is the claim number a secret or something?

Mr. Lupusella: No, I don't have it here.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Why don't you let us have it on the phone or by letter and we look into it and give you an answer?

Mr. McClellan: Why do we have to use the estimates to get these things done?

Mr. Lupusella: You have been answering my letter.

Mr. McClellan: We shouldn't have to do that.

Hon. Mr. Starr: But you are not the only person who is corresponding with me.

Mr. McClellan: We shouldn't have to use the estimates debates to get these kind of things cleaned up.

Hon. Mr. Starr: As a matter of fact, I get very few letters from you, Mr. Lupusella.

Hon. B. Stephenson: This is not the estimates debates. It's the debate on the annual report. Let's be factual.

Mr. Lupusella: Is that so? Then what I am going to do is collect all the correspondence and I will send you photocopies of that correspondence. It seems your assistant is not giving you an opportunity to take a look at the correspondence.

Hon. Mr. Starr: You have no reason to criticize my assistant or anybody else on the staff.

Mr. Lupusella: If you are not aware—

Hon. Mr. Starr: I know the number of letters. I see them all. They all come through and I know that you haven't got too many.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Starr, if you don't recall the correspondence which I have had—

Hon. Mr. Starr: What date?

Mr. Lupusella: —with you personally, at least a c.c. copy was sent to you and to the minister as well, and you replied to my letters as well. So if you are not aware of those cases maybe something is wrong with in the process. What else can I say? Am I supposed to bring down files and claim numbers to deal with those Workmen's Compensation Board problems? If you want me to do that then I can do it. We can go through them as well.

"An injury sustained in 1973; a lump sum payment of 10 per cent for a two-year period commencing January 1976 awarded. Medical report from Dr. X, psychiatrist, dated February 4, 1976, stated that the psychiatric disability was estimated at about 20 per cent. The request submitted to appeal system to increase Mr. X's pension from 10 to 20 per cent.

"Appeal denied by appeal board on June 27, 1977. The file is now with the Ombudsman."

"Date of injury, May 29, 1959." I have been dealing with this claim just recently. "Mr. X," the name of the injured worker, "suffered head injuries with a fracture of the left tibia and fibula laceration. In 1974, Mr. X started having problems with his left ear. He suffered deafness in the left ear and attributed this to his head injury of 1959 which was quite serious.

"Medical opinion on file clearly stated that Mr. X should be given the benefit of the doubt, although there were differing medical arguments. The appeal was denied at the appeal board level. Benefit of doubt was not given. The file is now with the Ombudsman."

Another claim number: "The request for entitlement for pre-existing hernia condition," which I just mentioned. "The appeal was denied."

"Injury sustained on February 16, 1977. Decision on whether or not to allow the claim was not made until June 1977. From February 16, 1977, the decision on whether or not to allow the claim was not made available until June 19, 1977. The decision was granted in June to allow the claim. Claimant was paid six weeks' benefits, received a letter from claims review branch on August 18, 1977, advising her that they were reversing the decision which they had taken five months to arrive at. There was great pressure put on the board from the company not to allow the claim. The decision was appealed and it was denied at the appeals adjudicator level. The appeal board hearing is scheduled for March 17, 1978."

Another claim: "Initial injury sustained in 1963. Examined in June 1977 by Dr. X for remaining psychological disability. Dr. X estimated a 15 to 20 per cent psychiatric disability as a consequence of his compensable accident. It took appeal section over three months to decide that they would grant Mr. X a provisional pension of 20 per cent for psychological compensation from March 1975 to March 1978." I want to emphasize that this specialist has been emphasizing in his report that there was a permanent psychological disability involved. Instead, the board decided to follow the route of two years from March 1975 to March 1978. Mr. X is considering taking his case to the Ombudsman as he feels his pension should be retroactive to 1963."

Hon. B. Stephenson: Why?

[6:45]

Mr. Lupusella: "Injury sustained in August 1972. In January 1974—"

The reason I'm reading those particular cases and not giving out the claims is not because I'm concerned about the claim. I am particularly concerned about the principles involved in those situations. I was emphasizing this particular problem last year. We are here to criticize the attitude and the procedures of the Workmen's Compensation Board by taking into consideration the present system in which the board is basing its own decision on medical reports. The board does not take into great consideration the family doctor's decision and the specialist's assessment which is sometimes favourable to the injured worker.

In relation to another injury, sustained in August 1972: In January 1974 the board made a provisional award, estimated at 15 per cent, for marked dysfunctional reaction directly resulting from the industrial accident. A letter was submitted in the appeal procedure, on July 6, 1977, attaching medical information from Dr. X, a psychiatrist, showing that the claimant, Mr. X, was totally disabled from a psychological standpoint. The decision, received September 27, 1977—almost three months later—was that the board would not upgrade the 15 per cent pension. The file is now with the Ombudsman.

In another case, the appeal board hearing was held December 17, 1976, and a decision rendered September 27, 1977—nine months later. In the intervening time, and many phone calls later, we were told that for about three months somebody, somehow, forgot about this file. When the file was finally reactivated from its dormant state, the decision was further postponed because arrangements had to be made for Mr. X, the claimant, to be admitted to the rehabilitation hospital for assessment. After all this time, the claim was denied.

That's the kind of problem we are facing in trying to help these people. Something is wrong with the process. I have 10 more cases of people involved in those problems, which I don't want to go through now because of lack of time, also—well, I had better leave it that way, because I am late in going to my constituency office.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to thank you for giving me this chance to talk about my feelings as they relate to the Workmen's Compensation Board. I hope the minister and the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board will give serious consideration to those loopholes which exist in the structure of the Workmen's Compensation Board. I would like to remind the chairman that we are not using these problems as a political exercise; we are really concerned about how these problems affect injured workers. That's why we talk very strongly when we deal with those cases.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Chairman, I can just tell how eager everybody is about the continuation of this debate.

Mr. Haggerty: You've got 12 minutes to wind it up.

Mr. McClellan: I will try to be very brief, quite seriously. I realize the minister is not feeling well; if it is any consolation, neither am I.

Mr. Lupusella: It is a psychosomatic problem.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, it is an occupational disease. I'll touch very briefly on issues that I had intended to speak at length on.

Regarding the raised rate, it is incomprehensible that you could fight inflation on the backs of injured workers. That's the only way I can interpret that twofold excuse for not raising the rates since 1975. One is that you're afraid of the inflationary effect of a pension increase which would have to raise the assessment again; and you are concerned about your unfunded liability of $400 million.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The question—

Mr. McClellan: Let me finish before you—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Could I just interrupt because you're misinterpreting something completely.

Mr. McClellan: Go ahead.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I asked the question specifically of your leader because he used the expression "an inflationary increase," and an inflationary increase, I'm sure, was not what he meant.

Mr. McClellan: Let's not play word games. You know what he meant and you know what I meant. An increase—

Hon. B. Stephenson: I was not playing word games here.

Mr. McClellan: Let me say it, just so that there is no confusion;—an increase which would make up for the cost of living loss that pensioners have suffered because of inflation since 1975. We're not talking about an enrichment. We're talking about a catch-up, as a bare minimum. I can only interpret the fact that there has been a delay for these three years, and injured workers are the only group in our society that has not had its income adjusted, the only group.

We've had our salaries increased. Civil servants have had their salaries increased. I suspect the Compensation Board employees have had their salaries adjusted for cost of living. Family benefits recipients have had their allowances increased—not adequately, not to the rate of the cost of living increase, but there was at least an increase; but not injured workers. And the reason was the mess that the board has got itself into with respect to the unfunded liability that we talked about last December. In December 1976, I had an opportunity to get into some discussion with some of the actuarial staff about that problem. On page 23 of the annual report you indicate, as I interpret the section, that a rate increase sufficient to make up for the ravages of inflation, together with the inflationary effects on investments, would increase the unfunded liability to $900 million.

You're in that mess because—that's what it says on page 24.

Mr. Neal: "By" $900 million—not "to" $900 million.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, I'm sorry: "by." It's even more ghastly, isn't it?

That's the difficulty you're in and it has to be faced. But it can't be faced at the expense of injured workers. You just can't do it. It's not just. It's not fair, and I hope the increase is going to be retroactive, because people have been suffering very badly.

A guy on my constituency case-load who was injured in the early sixties was working at the minimum wage, so his pension is peanuts, and he works at the March of Dimes 40 hours a week. Do you know what he makes together with his pension and his supplement? Two dollars and 10 cents an hour.

Mr. Mackenzie: That sounds like one of mine.

Mr. McClellan: That is absolutely despicable. This is an injured worker who's working full-time and is getting his maximum entitlement under his pension and under the supplement program. That's the most that he can make. That's nuts—and you can't dispute that.

I could give you chapter and verse about 60 to 70 guys who are on my constituency case-load, who are in really desperate circumstances because of the failure to adjust the rates upward. There's no point belabouring it. It's just a disgrace.

I had wanted to talk about the inadequacy of the way of computing pensions, the use of the "meat" chart. What good is it to a woman whose skills are manual and who doesn't have an educational background that makes it possible to benefit a lot from vocational upgrading? She works, for example, in the meat industry or the vegetable industry, and she has lost a finger and she can't do the work she used to do any more. What good is it to her to give her a lump sum payment of $1,300? Or a two per cent award or a three per cent award because that is what the "meat" chart says she is entitled to. But that doesn't reflect her loss of income, and you know that. You have known that for years. I don't have to give you a long lecture on that.

The question is simply: "When are you going to come up with an equitable way of computing pensions that takes into account not just the physical disability, but the loss of income potential?"

We had some discussion about what in my community is—next to the rate increase—the perennial problem: the question of jobs for partially disabled workers. My constituents work in construction; and it takes its toll. So there are literally thousands of people in my riding who can't work in heavy jobs. They need light duty jobs; and these kinds of jobs simply aren't available.

Odoardo di Santo started to talk about the British program and before he had even got the phrase out of his mouth—I don't think he had even completed his first sentence—Mr.

Hamilton said, "The British system is no good. It has never worked. It's lousy. It's no good." Bang, bang! Mr. di Santo wisely decided that it wasn't particularly worth beating his head against your particular fortress, against your fortress mentality. And I'm not going to either.

But before you cast aspersions on programs in other jurisdictions, I point out your own annual report; on pages 16 and 17—where it describes the activities of the vocational rehabilitation branch—you say at the beginning of this section: "In helping the injured worker to return to gainful employment, the vocational rehabilitation counsellor co-operates closely with employers," et cetera. "Returning to employment is the function defined." Right? Well, I ask you!

Then I turn to page 17 and you have your statistical tables. Why don't you tell us how many people were placed in jobs if that is the function? That statistic isn't even there. You've got every goddamned thing that your staff are doing on this page except the production, except how many workers were actually placed in jobs. That is the bottom line of the operation, surely. Did you actually place people in jobs, and how many and who and what kinds of workers?

We were given some figures by Dr. McCracken earlier this afternoon; I think he indicated, if I'm not mistaken, that you placed 4,800 workers in 1976. I think that was the figure he gave us. Am I correct? That you had placed 4,800 of your vocational rehab folks in 1976?

At any rate, what I'd like to ask you to do—and I don't think it's unreasonable—is to give us a complete statistical picture of the vocational rehab operation: whom you are serving, what kind of service you're giving, who they are in terms of their disabilities and what happens to them.

They seem to be disappearing, you know. If you look at your statistics closely, rounding off in 1975, you have 20,000 new referrals; and you are carrying over an additional 5,000 of these cases from 1974 for a total case-load of 25,000. But in 1976—rounding off—you get another 25,000 new referrals. These are brand new cases but you are only carrying over 6,000 cases from 1975. What happened to the 1975 case-load? You are placing something in the order of 5,000 people a year. What happens to the other 20,000?

We would really like to know what you are doing in the vocational rehabilitation service. I may be misinterpreting the statistics, but that is all I have to go from. You don't even tell us in the annual report how many people you put out to work, how many people you were able to place. As David Cooke says, what good does it do to harry injured workers the way you do by forcing 62- and 63-year-old injured workers to occupy themselves by running around in a futile search for employment from employers who have no light-duty jobs? Each of us has constituents who are put in that absurd and humiliating position. You will have to excuse us for being a little exercised and for being a little impatient with the kind of dismissal that we got from the chairman of the board.

It has nothing to do with willingness to work, it has to do with the competence of your vocational rehabilitation program and their ability (a) to locate jobs for injured workers, and (b) to place injured workers in those jobs. I don't think you can demonstrate statistically that you are able to do that.

It may well be that the British system is not as successful as Mr. Hamilton would like, or as you would like, or as perhaps I would like. I suspect it is a little bit more successful than the system we have, I really do. Let's not debate it, because I would like to finish and then maybe you could respond.

Mr. Hamilton: But we are only talking, in the British system, about the percentage of disabled workers that it is mandatory the employer takes back into industry. That's all we're talking about.

Mr. McClellan: They came to the conclusion in Britain a number of years ago that a voluntary system was not effective. I understand all the arguments against affirmative action, and for a long time I accepted them, but I have changed my mind.

Mr. Mackenzie: As I have. As I made clear in the estimates, we are either going to set some quotas and some allowances or we're not going to put these people to work, and we had better start accepting it.

Mr. McClellan: That is right. I don't think the voluntary system works. For all of the drawbacks of affirmative action, which I understand and which you understand, which we all understand—anybody who has done any work in the area knows about them—the reality is that the present system doesn't work.

Mr. Hamilton: Ross, I only make this suggestion: As legislators, if you are going to do it, and you are going to say that they take back a percentage of the people back into their own particular industry, that you attach sufficient policing to it to see that it happens.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. Mackenzie: Ross is right. Most of us started out the same way as you, against this. But what is happening is reality, and the case load, and the actual problems of the people are forcing us into it.

Mr. Hamilton: No, don't misunderstand me, I'm not against it. I have never said that I was against it. All I said this afternoon was that they put it into legislation in Britain, and from the day they put it in it hasn't worked. I'm not against it, and don't misinterpret what I said.

Mr. McClellan: It really needs to be explored.

Mr. Hamilton: If you want to make it three, five, or 10 per cent you must police it to see that they go back.

Mr. McClellan: All right. Look, this is what happened the last time it came up. Odoardo was, in effect, cut off before he even began to discuss the issue. You said, "It's no good," and that was the end of it. Of course, there are problems, but we're telling you my colleagues and I have come to the same conclusion, that affirmative action is the only way; those of us who represent ridings where this is an enormous problem—and I am one of those, so is Mr. Mackenzie and so is Mr. Laughren—we are just desperate about it. The minister is so interested in studies that you would think she was minister of research rather than Minister of Labour, but I think it would be really useful to try to develop an affirmative action program.

We would do it on the British model, with whatever enforcement requirements are necessary. If you want to do it on a pilot project basis, since that seems to be your predilection as a government, at least do something about it, but let's not pretend that 4,800 job placements a year are beginning to address the problem.

It's not just workmen's compensation—42 per cent of the recipients of family benefits are dependent by virtue of disability; and virtually none of those, I gather from Bill Smith in family benefits, is on workmen's compensation.

These annual report debates, to be factual, are increasingly frustrating. The Workmen's Compensation Board is a fortress. You seem to feel that any kind of change from your practices is somehow going to bring upon the apocalypse. You have dug your heels in on every single issue and you won't move from any of it. You are so defensive about all of this stuff that there is just a complete feeling of futility about addressing these issues, which are major issues of social development policy; they are not questions of anything else, I don't think.

We have a chairman who has decided that he wants to come out again as a Tory. He issues—I guess Tony Lupusella took the May 4 election pamphlet with him—

Mr. Laughren: So proud of it, too.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, he likes that.

I don't care if you do that, you make a fool of yourself in my community when you do that. The Tory candidate printed your election material—the May 4 press conference. She printed all of that stuff in her election leaflets—the stuff about the professional complainers, remember that? The stuff about the injured worker who drove a Cadillac? She was stupid enough to put that in an election leaflet and I'm awfully glad she did. I hope you'll hold another press conference prior to the next election. Maybe your expanded public relations department will try to muzzle you if they have any sense, but I hope you keep that up because you reduced the Conservative vote in Bellwoods riding to 23 per cent.

Mr. Laughren: Almost single-handedly.

Mr. McClellan: Single-handedly. The Tory candidate was nutty enough to run a single-issue campaign on the wonders of the Compensation Board quoting Chairman Starr.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Starr: That's exactly what happened up north.

Interjections.

Mr. McClellan: If I can just finish off with this sentence. I wish the chairman well in his new political career.

Mr. Acting Chairman: That concludes the debate on the annual report.

An hon. member: Holy mackerel!

Mr. Laughren: We agreed to sit through until—

Mr. Acting Chairman: No, we didn't.

Mr. Laughren: We agreed to sit through until the members had finished, don't give us that.

Mr. Acting Chairman: No, we didn't.

Mr. Laughren: That is not true. We agreed to sit through until we had completed it. There was no motion that said we adjourn at 7 o'clock. You know that, don't play that game.

Mr. Acting Chairman: There was no motion but there was a discussion and—

Ms. Bryden: There was a motion that all the members on the list would be heard, that was the agreement.

Mr. Acting Chairman: I'm sorry, that wasn't—

Interjections.

Mr. Haggerty: The member who spoke previously spoke for two and a half hours; he repeated and repeated.

Mr. Laughren: Put your motion before the committee.

Ms. Bryden: I will move, Mr. Chairman, that this committee sit until all the members have been heard.

Mr. Acting Chairman: We don't have a quorum now. I don't want to—you know, it's not normal.

Interjections.

Mr. Warner: I'll bring it up in the House tomorrow, I tell you that right now. Because I've sat here all day and I wanted somewhere between two and five minutes. I'll save it for the House leader tomorrow, if you would rather.

Ms. Bryden: It will show on Hansard that the previous chairman agreed that we would sit until all the speakers on the present list had been heard.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have to go. I have to speak at 7:15.

Mr. Acting Chairman: The discussion that took place in the committee dealt with the agreement by the members to sit during the dinner hour. There was discussion among members of the committee as to whether or not we should continue through the dinner hour. There were discussions with the minister. It was estimated in fact that we might be through at about 6:30 and if not, then at least by 7.

Mr. Laughren: We thought we would be.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Right. And it was on that basis that we agreed to sit through the dinner hour.

Interjections.

Mr. Laughren: There was no agreement of a time of adjournment. If we have sat longer than we thought we would, it's only because of the provocativeness of the chairman of the Compensation Board.

Mr. Mackenzie: And the committee only decides, as I understand it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Lupusella spent two hours.

Mr. Lupusella: So what?

Ms. Bryden: There are only two speakers left.

Hon. B. Stephenson: All I'm saying is—

Mr. Acting Chairman: How long are you going to be?

Ms. Bryden: Ten minutes, at the most.

Mr. Laughren: Why don't we complete for today?

Ms. Bryden: I could cut mine down to five minutes, but there are only two speakers left. It seems to me very discourteous not to hear them when we've been here since 10 in the morning.

Mr. Warner: Set a time limit.

Mr. Acting Chairman: The minister has to speak at 7:15.

Mr. Mackenzie: We can continue as we started, unfortunate as that is, with the rest of the people here.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Can we agree then that it will take approximately 15 to 20 more minutes? Is that okay, Mr. Warner?

Mr. Warner: I know the minister will read Hansard tomorrow. She always does.

Mr. Acting Chairman: We have 15 to 20 minutes.

Ms. Bryden: I think I'm first. What have you got?

Mr. Acting Chairman: I have Mr. Warner on but I believe, Ms. Bryden, you were substituting for Mr. Cooke who was on before Mr. Warner?

Ms. Bryden: I don't know. I understand Mr. Bounsall put me after Mr. McClellan.

Mr. Acting Chairman: Please continue.

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Starr, I wanted to get back to first principles and talk about what workmen's compensation really means or what I think the board should consider that workmen's compensation means. In my opinion, it should put people back in the position they were in before the injury or as close as possible to that. I'm sure the board would probably agree that that is the objective.

To do that you must provide at least four things. You must cover medical and other out-of-pocket expenses. You must cover loss of earning opportunity. You must cover pain and suffering, or you should cover pain and suffering. I don't know that it is really covered right now. You should cover rehabilitation, which means restoration as close as possible to the pre-injury position.

I meet a lot of workmen's compensation cases in my constituency work. There are a lot of construction workers and a lot of maintenance workers in the riding. From them I find that what compensation appears to mean. What it should not mean to them is a level of earnings below what they would have made if they had stayed on the job and if they had not been injured. They did not ask to be injured, but for the ones I've seen it has in many cases meant a lower level of earnings.

There are other things it should not mean. It should not mean a standard of living based on 1975 levels, as happens to those on pensions. It should not mean loss of contribution periods for unemployment insurance and Canada Pension Plan. It should not mean transfer to the army of unemployed. It should not mean fulfilling the same sort of useless routines for a job search which the Unemployment Insurance Commission is requiring and which the Compensation Board appears also to be requiring, when there are no jobs available for the kind of work the person is qualified for and which is both time consuming and money-wasting in that they have to put out car fare and so on. I think that people should search for jobs when the jobs are there, but to require them to go out day after day spending money that they don't have on a useless search is very demoralising.

I think some of these things can be changed by the board. Some of them can only be changed by legislation. I'm sorry that the minister is not here to be aware of the things that can be changed by legislation and which must be changed, if we are going to provide real compensation which will place the person back, as close as possible, to the position he had before he was injured.

[7:15]

The other things I find from the people that have come into my office, Mr. Starr, are things that I think the board can change. One of them is attitude. Many of the people who come to me—and I will admit they are the ones who feel they have problems; they are not the satisfied claimants—many of those people feel that the attitude of the board is too much of an adversary one; that it is assumed most workers are claiming more than they are entitled to or the workers are likely malingerers trying to get compensation rather than go back to work.

I think the onus should be the other way. It should be up to the board to prove that a person is a malingerer or that he is not entitled to what he is asking. The attitude should not be that he probably is trying to take the board for a ride. I think they sense that attitude. It may be very subtle. It may be just in the questions that are asked.

The other thing I hear complaints about are the letters they receive or the statements that come with any payments they receive. Whenever there is a change in payments, the cheque comes with a stub that just says, "Compensation" and such and such a date. It doesn't explain why there has been a change, why the amount has been reduced. In some cases there is no letter with it explaining that. It doesn't even always tell them exactly what period the payment covers; or if it does, they can't understand exactly what the form says. Sometimes when they receive a partial award, the letter sending the award doesn't explain to them that this is only partial, that the case will still be considered further. They think it's a final award.

It seems to me that those sorts of lack-of-communication problems could be cured by more information to the client whenever there is a change in any of his benefits. I don't think you have to send a letter every month, however.

They also complain about the difficulty of getting through on the phone to ask questions about these payments. Sometimes the person who speaks their language also is not available, but I suppose there is a limit to how many languages you can have available every minute of the day. I understand that. But the phones seem to be a problem. Some of them say they take two days to get through or to get any sort of an answer as to why their payment has been held up. Then they come to us.

We have had, I think, fairly good co-operation in getting some of these things straightened out or speeded up, and I appreciate what the board does when a member does phone to try to straighten things out. But the phones wouldn't be as jammed if there weren't as many misunderstandings and lack-of-communication problems for the ordinary person.

The second greatest problem is that of getting back to work. I agree heartily with the statement of my colleague who spoke just prior to me, that we must provide some sort of means of ensuring that light work is available. This is what most of the people with back injuries are required to look for, and it just isn't available in any great quantity out there in the employment market.

I do think there is a legislative requirement that an employer must take a worker back unless he can prove that it is impossible for him to manage that work, in which case the board should assume responsibility for finding that worker light work. They may have to do it by working with the provincial and municipal governments to find light work among their ranks for some of the people whom industry cannot place. First of all, however, we should put quotas on industry, particularly for plants of a certain size, so that they have to find light work for people who have been injured and then have been declared fit to go back to work.

That is the greatest weakness in the Act at the moment, because what we are really doing is compensating people for their injury in the medical sense and then sending them into the ranks of the unemployed. That is not something they asked for. They did not ask to be injured, and they are certainly not back in the position they were in before the injury.

There is just one other thing I wanted to raise, and that is to ask what attention you are paying to the many new chemical and industrial hazards that are occurring as a result of the toxic substances and so on being used now. We are just discovering that some of these substances may have an effect on health 10 and 20 years later.

I would like to know what the board is doing to monitor those particular substances and to keep in touch with employers as to the handling of those substances to prevent contamination and to prevent future illness; and particularly on the cases of PCB's in the transformers, such as the ones in that fire on Adelaide Street East. Have you had any applications yet from that particular incident for compensation? Even if you haven't, are you watching all the reports that are coming from the medical examinations of these people, and are you perhaps considering what sort of safety programs you can start sending out to industries for the handling of these very dangerous materials?

Hon. Mr. Starr: May I just answer the last question first, Ms. Bryden, and say that the board does not involve itself in the actual safety, excepting that we have nine safety associations and we fund them to the extent of about $12.5 million a year. Their job, in the various industries that they represent and have the membership in, is to educate in the safety practices of that particular industry both the employees and the employers.

As far as what we are doing about the new chemical compounds that are being developed every year—and believe me, there are something like 250,000 new chemicals being developed every year—it is something that is of concern to us. Dr. McCracken can probably elucidate on it more than I can, but he has already been in touch with the medical profession in our province to alert us if, upon examination of any individual who may be exposed to certain types of chemicals that we are not aware of, to make notes of these things and advise us of them so that we know what is going on and what is the possibility of that. As far as the PCBs—

Ms. Bryden: PCBs from the Adelaide Street fire.

Hon. Mr. Starr: To my knowledge we haven't any applications for compensation from any of those people who were involved in this.

Ms. Bryden: I appreciate that you do your safety work through the safety associations, but perhaps you should be not only alerting them to the need for much more control over these hazardous substances and the handling of them but also perhaps giving additional funding to the ones that have more of the chemical problems.

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think also the new branch in the Ministry of Labour concerned with safety and health in industry will have more jurisdiction than probably anyone else, because I think the whole safety aspect has been put under one umbrella in that particular branch.

Mr. Mackenzie: Is that a factual figure, Mr. Chairman, or is that a little high, 250,000 new chemicals a year?

Hon. Mr. Starr: I think that is right. There is a development of about 250,000 new chemicals a year.

I think, Ms. Bryden, that this new branch of the Ministry of Labour will have more of that responsibility. They are working on this now, as far as I know. They are going into the plants wherever there is any complaint about any health hazard whatsoever, and they are investigating.

Dr. McCracken: It has been estimated that there are probably around a quarter of a million new modifications to large family groups of chemicals. Most of these are organic compounds versus inorganic, and by very subtle changes they can change the characteristics. So if you count every change that is made in the laboratory and in the research areas in industry this is the estimate they come up with, but they drop into main family groups. What we do, and have been doing for some considerable period of time before the new division was created in the Ministry of Labour, is when we have cases reported to us—this is usually when we would get the first idea that something might be going on—if it appears to our industrial consultant that something new was happening in a new location then she would immediately pass this information along to the appropriate people in the Ministry of Health, occupational health and protection division, Ministry of Labour, and alert them about this. They could then make arrangements to check that plant, check that chemical, and run it down.

These communications are an ongoing situation for the people who have this responsibility. In turn they feed the information back to our industrial disease consultant as to the outcome of their measurements and whether in fact a hazard does exist and if so what steps have been taken. This alerts us so that when we have more claims come in, we immediately know what we're dealing with. By that time the appropriate steps, hopefully, have been taken.

So far as PCBs are concerned, and the more toxic ones—the PBBs—we have had none reported to us last year and we have had none reported from the particular fire that you made mention to. We have had, over the past number of years, approximately five or six cases of PCB toxic reactions—fumes related to spills and fires. These have been transient in nature—usually watering eyes, some redness of the eyes, some bronchitis, and they have cleared up and there have been no ill effects. I believe only one of that group lost any time from work, as a matter of fact. But we have these on record, yes.

Mr. Mackenzie: Have there been any claims from the Ferranti-Packard plant in St. Catharines? Any checks at all?

Dr. McCracken: I'm afraid I can't tell you that. But if that is one of the areas where the PCBs have been utilized—in transformer manufacturing, I guess, and it is—I am sure if there has been any hazard there, that it has been looked at. But I can't tell you whether we have received any claims from the plant, no.

Mr. A. G. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, that question was asked of the board about a week ago. We checked and there have been no claims reported from that area.

Dr. McCracken: The one other thing that might be of interest—and I don't want to waste any more time—but we do have access now to a terminal here in Toronto that is tied in with a computer in Ottawa and a computer in Bethesda, Maryland. We can put a search on this terminal. There are a number of searches—there are the tox line, med line, chem line and cancer line. This records all the recorded new chemicals coming on line and it records all the toxic chemicals coming on line and it records all the medical complications that have been identified in medical studies throughout the North American continent, as well as the world. So that is one way to keep on top of it.

Mr. Mackenzie: One final supplementary on that: I'm not really sure what it is worth, but when you talk about 250,000 new chemicals, and I understand a lot of those may be very minor variations or within the family, is there any number that are reasonably distinctly different or new? Is there any way we can measure that?

Dr. McCracken: No, I understand that is very difficult to do. Although, mind you, when there is a major breakthrough in organic chemistry then it is usually identified in their journals. This is where you can get on top of this with the annual reports that are put out, plus the new access we have to tox line, which is the data fed of all new and old chemicals that have toxic manifestations related to them—as well as the chem line, which shows all the new major changes.

Mr. Warner: I shall be brief. Despite whatever personal animosity the chairman may have towards me, I would like you to understand a couple of things: First, unlike the other ministry, department, board, commission that exists in the province, I must now, by reason of my experience, tell constituents when they come into my office and they have an injury and they've been to the Compensation Board, "Yes, I will help you, but we will have to fight the Compensation Board."

I'll tell them, "I don't know whether we will be successful or not but we've had a lot of experience at it—about half of our case-load deals with the Compensation Board. But we will help you fight them. It will be a fight, it will be tough and it will be long and it will be hard and they won't give in easily." That is the atmosphere. No other board or commission in this entire government sets out that atmosphere.

I'm asking you if you would personally look at this particular case, because I am sick and tired of this man being persecuted—and that's all it is. The case goes back several years. It continues up until March 9 of this year, just a couple of days ago when he got a letter—and I couldn't believe the letter, I just could not believe the letter. When you look through the file you will see why.

I have a letter from your own Workmen's Compensation Board back in November that in effect says: "We have found that you were not informed that you were fit for light work and that you were not interviewed by the rehab department. A member of the provincial government"—it doesn't say who—"asked us to review the case and we have; and yes, you were right and we were wrong." That was in November. Then in March the man is back into the situation that he has been in over the last three years. It is absurd to the nth degree.

It reached such a highlight that at one point I had to call your office and tell them: "Yes, we won the case but for some reason you cut the man off entirely. If the man doesn't get his money, I'll occupy the office of Mr. Starr until he gets his money." That's how desperate I had to be.

For some reason, the man is being persecuted and I don't understand why. To add to it all the person who comes to his house for the one and only rehab visit wants to know how much money his wife makes.

Of what earthly business is it of anyone to ask how much money the injured worker's wife is making? It's got nothing to do with his injury or his level of compensation. To add it all up, when you look through the file, I think you will come to the conclusion that the benefit of doubt as spelled out in the Workmen's Compensation Act is not being adhered to. That, unfortunately, is often the problem with most of the cases that I go through in my office. The benefit of doubt isn't being adhered to and isn't being lived up to.

In the case of the file—and I should give you the number, C7516958—there is a history of the man being lied to, of being misled, of not having the things done which were promised to be done; of his having his funds cut off from time to time and the reports of eminent doctors being just discarded, except when we go to the appeal; and, once again having been cut off by way of this letter within three working days from the date of the letter, if you can imagine. That's incredible. The usurers out in the underworld finance probably give greater notice than three days after the date of the letter.

I just don't understand why the man is being persecuted. I'm incensed by it, I really am.

Hon. Mr. Starr: We will look into it.

Mr. Warner: Mr. Starr, the last thing I ask you to do is that when you read the file carefully will you please take into account the principle of doubt in many of the things that have been raised this afternoon by my colleague from Bellwoods about rehab? I think his comments were absolutely dead on about the rehab problem. It is not contained in the report that we get. It is not the kind of actual picture which we should see.

Please take the comments not to be in the political arena per se with the intent of bringing down the government. That is not what it is about. It's about a hell of a lot of people out there who get injured on the work site and need some help, and we don't see that help coming forward in the clear, objective way that it should be. We are fighting in every way we know how to get justice for those workers. That is what it is about.

Please look at those comments as objectively as you can. Otherwise we'll be back again next year and it will be the same problem, because since the last time we sat, which was more than 12 months ago, between then and now, I have seen no perceptible change whatsoever in the operation. I am getting the same cases, the same complaints, the same problems as I did the last time we went through this exercise, and unless you can look at this whole matter objectively and take my comments and the comments of my colleagues with some objectivity, we are going to go through the same exercise a year from now.

Hon. Mr. Starr: Mr. Warner, we will look into this case the first thing tomorrow morning, but I can assure you that the next time we are here there will be complaints, because that's the sort of business we are in. When we make decisions, we can't make decisions that are going to suit everybody, and those decisions that are not suited to these people will land up on your desk, they will land up on Ms. Bryden's desk, they will land up on Mackenzie's desk, and they will land up on my desk. People will never be satisfied because we make decisions.

Mr. Warner: But the complaints of principle which were raised here today were raised the last time and that hasn't changed.

Mr. Mackenzie: You could surely make a fair improvement.

Mr. Warner: That hasn't changed.

Hon. Mr. Starr: The principle that matters is in fact that we have got to improve wherever we can in our field. There is no question about it.

Mr. Warner: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your indulgence, and I am sure that we can satisfy our hunger appetites.

Mr. Acting Chairman: This concludes the matter.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1978

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

Mr. Deans: Tell us about your visit to Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. members about my appearance last Tuesday before the House of Commons special committee on the northern pipeline bill and of my concern, which I know all members will share, that Ontario's interests be protected to the utmost in this proposed legislation.

Mr. Bradley: Tell us about the uranium deal.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: The legislation will establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, will affect jobs, energy supplies and the economic health of Ontario's residents in both the near- and the long-term future.

I must say, first of all, that I was shocked and surprised at the reception granted the Ontario presentation, particularly from the federal Liberal members of the committee. They seemed perplexed and hostile to the idea that Ontario would want to participate in the consultations on jobs, industrial involvement and energy planning that would be related to the construction of the northern pipeline.

Mr. Bradley: And uranium contracts.

Mr. Deans: They were probably even surprised.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Further, they felt that Ontario should be pleased to have the federal government represent this province's interests on that pipeline.

I must say I was equally surprised at their surprise. In fact, I was shocked by the narrowness of their outlook. I surely don't have to recall for the members of this Legislature that in the case of our uranium supplies the federal government turned a deaf ear on the repeated entreaties of both Ontario Hydro and the Ontario government to enact measures which would be of benefit to the public of Ontario in the negotiation of uranium contracts involving the province's own uranium reserves.

Mr. Roy: That's because they consider you a patsy.

Mr. Cassidy: And you ignore the interests of the taxpayers of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: If we have learned one thing from that experience, it is that Ontario emphatically cannot count on the federal government to protect or further Ontario's interests in any matter of concern for our energy future.

Mr. Cassidy: And the people of Ontario can't count on you.

Mr. Bradley: You're passing the buck.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Secondly, I think the reaction of some of the federal committee members clearly shows how shallow is their commitment to the principle of co-operative federalism.

Mr. Reid: Oh, come on. What kind of nonsense is this?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Here was a chance to involve directly those provinces which would have the greatest interest at stake in the pipeline issue. But, instead, the federal government has opted to follow a course of action that ignores Ontario. They just don't seem to care what Ontario thinks. All the rhetoric and embellishment we hear about national unity from the federal government is apparently just that—rhetoric.

Mr. Deans: This is an abuse of the order for statements.

Mr. Roy: That's lack of leadership. You are just a patsy.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Here was a concrete opportunity to demonstrate how much they really are concerned about greater federal-provincial co-operation, and, to put it bluntly, they blew it.

Mr. Kerrio: Why didn't you tell them that when you made the uranium deal?

Mr. Bradley: You're a pussy-cat.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I must add I was gratified—

Mr. Pope: Don't offend them over there.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure our visitors would like to hear this ministerial statement even if the members don't.

An hon. member: Not even his own members want to hear it.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, I was gratified the federal committee agreed to hear Ontario's brief.

Mr. Deans: I would like to hear Ontario's brief too.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I can't help but wonder, given the reception received, whether our hearing wasn't more the result of the interest of the federal opposition parties rather than that of the government, given that the members of the opposition seemed much more receptive and supportive than the Liberal members were.

Mr. Bradley: One thing: You are not partisan.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: In short, I intend to continue to speak out on this issue and to press Ontario's case. The consumers of this province currently use almost 50 per cent of the natural gas used in Canada. Further, Ontario provides the largest potential market for any additional supplies of Canadian natural gas, whether from the Mackenzie Delta or the Beaufort Sea. Of equal importance, Ontario would be the largest supplier of goods and services for this pipeline.

Mr. Roy: You can't even control Hydro, never mind the pipeline.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Wait until the election is called; Ontario will speak out.

Mr. Martel: The Minister of Northern Affairs must have been listening to Joe Clark last night. He must have been listening to that malevolent marshmallow.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: We have a lot at stake in this project: energy prices, jobs, manufacturing capacity. I think it's time the federal government recognized our interests and our rights and granted us full status on the consultative council, which will consult and co-ordinate on this gigantic project—

Mr. Bradley: You should run federally.

Hon. Mr. Baetz:—just as the federal government has granted such status to Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Alberta and the Yukon Territory. Now is the time for all members of this House to make it known to the federal government that they are unanimous in their view that Ontario should participate directly and fully in this process.

Mr. Deans: Now that you've told us that, Reuben, what did you say to them?

Mr. Roy: You can't even run Hydro, never mind running a pipeline. You should resign.

Mr. Deans: Have you got a copy of your brief? No, not your statement—the brief you presented.

Mr. Bradley: Your Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) says there is no unemployment problem.

Hon. Mr. Snow: It's a very silent statement I have to make, Mr. Speaker.

TRUCKING LEGISLATION

Hon. Mr. Snow: Mr. Speaker, on March 2, I introduced in this House several amendments to the Public Commercial Vehicles and Public Vehicles Acts. At that time, I indicated to the members that I would bring in additional amendments strengthening the enforcement procedures under the PCV Act. Today, I would like to present those additional amendments.

In preparing these proposals my ministry has given careful consideration to the recommendations on enforcement contained in the report of the select committee on the highway transportation of goods, a report which contained more than 300 recommendations in all.

At the same time, we have kept in mind the principles stated in the Speech from the Throne, namely the need to restrain government spending, simplify rules and regulations and conserve energy.

One of the central issues raised in the select committee report was a concern over the growth of unlicensed trucking in Ontario—a result, it was felt, of deficiencies in the enforcement of the PCV Act by the Ministry of Transportation and Communications. The object of these amendments, therefore, is to resolve those deficiencies identified in the committee's report.

My ministry took the initial step in this direction on March 2 with proposals for the enfranchisement of certain unlicensed carriers, together with the substantially increased penalties for offences under the PCV Act as recommended by the select committee.

Today, I am proposing, first of all, an amendment to the PCV Act recommended specifically by the select committee which makes it an offence for a shipper or any other person otherwise arranging transportation knowingly to engage the services of an unlicensed carrier or a carrier not properly licensed for that shipment.

At the present time, the only party subject to prosecution for contravention of the PCV Act is the provider of the illegal service; in other words, the carrier. The amendment will, we feel, deter collusion between shippers, carriers and other parties that might result in the encouragement of unlicensed trucking.

The remainder of the amendments are aimed at resolving some of the deficiencies in the enforcement system by increasing the powers of the PCV enforcement staff.

One of the roadblocks to proceeding with a prosecution under the PCV Act is the difficulties encountered by ministry officers attempting to get direct documentary evidence from the parties involved, evidence that would support a charge. At present, a ministry officer may enter the premises and examine the records of the holder of the operating licence for investigative purposes. But he or she has no authority to examine the freight forwarder's records.

The second amendment, therefore, extends the officer's authority as recommended by the select committee to allow him or her to enter and inspect the records of a licensed freight forwarder in the same manner as a licensed carrier.

The third amendment is aimed at eliminating the red tape that requires the minister to make a specific appointment for each investigation of a contravention of the Act and for each link in the chain of the investigation. Under this amendment, the minister will be allowed to appoint investigators for the purpose of entering the premises and inspecting the records of any person suspected on reasonable grounds of having contravened the Act. This amendment, by the way, is also based directly on the select committee's recommendations.

The fourth item is an amendment to the Highway Traffic Act which seeks to resolve another enforcement problem, the fact that there is no procedure at the present time for exercising administrative enforcement against carriers holding neither Ontario operating authority nor Ontario registration. This amendment will give the registrar of motor vehicles the authority to remove the permit and plates from a vehicle registered in a jurisdiction other than Ontario, as is presently the case with vehicles registered in Ontario, subject to the appropriate hearing and appeal procedures.

I feel this particular amendment will become more and more important as Ontario moves towards increased reciprocity with other jurisdictions. While on the subject of reciprocity, I'd also like to inform the House that my ministry will be reviewing the requirements applied to non-resident carriers operating in Ontario with regard to safety, documentation, insurance et cetera.

A final point before I close: I mentioned at the beginning of this statement that in studying the select committee's recommendations and drafting these specific proposals, we kept in mind the principles stated in the Throne Speech. As a result, we have decided not to implement two areas of the select committee report at this time on the grounds that they are incompatible with those principles. We felt the recommendations concerning the registration of driver pools and commercial vehicle lessors would be contrary to the ministry's and the government's stated policy of simplifying and reducing rules and regulations and would create an unnecessary and costly administrative burden.

The select committee also made a series of recommendations concerning transportation brokers and owner-drivers. In these areas, I am concerned that even with the investigations undertaken by the select committee, we do not have sufficient knowledge of the actual and the potential operations and relationships of these groups. I have, therefore, asked my staff to undertake a detailed study of transportation brokers and owner-drivers in cooperation with the appropriate industry representatives.

In closing, I'd like to direct the members' attention to the two bills I will be presenting at the appropriate time today and the accompanying compendia.

FLECK MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Hon. B. Stephenson: On March 10, the hon. members for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie) and Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) asked questions regarding the occupational health and safety conditions at the Centralia facility of Fleck Manufacturing. Because of the length of the response, may I beg to make the response at this time rather than taking up the time of question period? Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I would intend to deal with the 10 points which the two hon. members posed in the order in which they were raised. Before I begin I should point out that an official of the industrial health and safety branch visited the facility as late as March 13. I will refer to the results of that inspection later.

The following topics were raised on Friday, March 10 by the hon. members: outstanding directions; frequency of inspections; injuries from a moulding machine; injury from wire racks; guarding of machinery; the alleged practice of turning off machines during ministry inspections; washroom facilities; the alleged presence of garbage; the alleged presence of rats, and the alleged failure of industrial health and safety branch officials to contact representatives of the United Automobile Workers local.

First, let me deal with the hon. member for Ottawa Centre's question, regarding outstanding directions. On January 5, 1978, an industrial health and safety inspector left one direction as a result of his inspection. That direction was that an employee wear a hairnet because her long hair posed a personal safety risk. I am advised that this direction has been fully complied with.

Turning to the questions and comments raised by the hon. member for Hamilton East, industrial health and safety officers inspect Centralia facility approximately every six months. The inspections were on the following dates: January 9, 1975; July 10, 1975; February 9, 1976; August 26, 1976; February 8, 1977; July 27, 1977; October 20, 1977; January 5, 1978, and March 13, 1978. During those inspections, a total of 19 directions were issued. All 19 directions have been complied with.

The hon. member for Hamilton East alleged that five women have been burned by a defective moulding machine. According to Workmen's Compensation Board accident records, there was one lost-time incident at the plant on October 21, 1977, when a woman's right hand was burned. A direction requiring modifications to the machine was issued at that time as a result of the incident and that direction has been complied with.

Prior to November 1, 1977, an additional five employees had suffered very minor burns which required only first-aid treatment, but since November 1, 1977, there has been one burn incident which was not related to the condition of the moulding machine.

Ms. Gigantes: Are the minister's hands scarred?

Mr. Lewis: Then the member was right.

Hon. B. Stephenson: He also alleged that there have been injuries resulting from falling wire racks. There is one such incident recorded. A wire rack tipped over on September 8, 1977, scraping the left shoulder, the arm and the leg of a female worker. A corrective direction was issued and that direction has been complied with.

Mr. Martel: Seven.

Hon. B. Stephenson: In addition to these incidents, there have been accidents on the following dates: On March 10, 1977, a female worker pulled tendons in her right wrist and forearm while stringing wire. On April 20, 1977, a female worker sprained an ankle. On May 10, 1977, a female worker's left thumb was punctured while she was taking wire from a cutter. Unfortunately, her thumb later became infected. On July 11, 1977, a female worker's left thumb was cut while she was operating a cutter. On September 6, 1977, a mini-moulder under repair was activated and cut off approximately one inch of the finger of a male worker's right hand. On November 10, 1977, a female worker injured tendons while pulling wire.

Mr. Lewis: Some accidents.

Mr. Martel: Thirteen.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Approximate investigations were carried out on all these occasions and, where necessary, directions were issued. Thus far, there have been no lost-time injuries during the year 1978.

The hon. member for Hamilton East had a question regarding machine guards, as required by section 32 of the Industrial Safety Act, 1971.

Mr. Lewis: That's a terrible record.

Hon. B. Stephenson: As I mentioned earlier, there were 19 directions issued between January 1975 and January 5, 1978. Of these 19, nine were related to guarding and the company has complied with all 19 directions.

It is always possible that machines were turned off upon the arrival of an inspector of the Ministry of Labour, but I would point out that the industrial health and safety branch has received no complaint to this effect from any employee of the Centralia facility nor from any other person.

The seventh question raised concerned washroom facilities. Adequate facilities are, in fact, provided. Under the Industrial Safety Act, one toilet must be provided for every 15 employees. The day shift at the Centralia plant includes 90 female employees. At present, there are six toilets available to female workers, including two within the first-aid area. During the inspection on March 13, one of these was out of service due to blockage. It has since been repaired.

The eighth and ninth questions dealt with garbage and rats. Neither during the inspection on March 13 nor at any other time were any problems noted in this area, but specifically on March 13 there was no uncollected garbage and no rats were visible.

Mr. Lewis: They didn't come out for the inspector.

Mr. Martel: They fed them all the day before.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Nor were any such complaints made by anyone.

The hon. member for Hamilton East's final question concerned the alleged failure of inspectors to contact UAW officials before inspections or during inspections. The union was certified on October 20, 1977. The first inspection thereafter was January 5, 1978.

The industrial health and safety officer unfortunately did not contact the UAW representative during that visit because he was not aware that the UAW had been certified.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, that's good.

Hon. B. Stephenson: In order to ensure that officers are made promptly aware of union certification, I have instructed the Ontario Labour Relations Board to advise branches of the occupational health and safety division immediately the board grants certification in any situation.

Mr. Lewis: Small but useful.

Hon. B. Stephenson: During the March 13 inspection, a direction was issued under section 32 of the regulations to the Industrial Safety Act regarding the guarding of one cutter, two mini-moulders and five shuttle presses.

Mr. Lewis: Good grief.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Five of these machines were ordered out of service pending modifications to the control systems so that they cannot be operated—

Mr. Lewis: Unbelievable.

Hon. B. Stephenson:—unless the operator has both hands on the controls and thus out of harm's way.

Before I conclude, I would like to provide the members with some additional material on the Fleck Centralia facility beyond the questions posed by the hon. members.

First, to this date, no exercise of the right to refuse hazardous work has been brought to the attention of the Ministry of Labour.

Mr. Mackenzie: They have got no protection.

Mr. Cassidy: They were being intimidated.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Secondly, before these matters were raised in the Legislature on March 10 there had been absolutely no complaints at all about occupational health and safety conditions by any of the staff of the Fleck Manufacturing facility.

Thirdly, there is and has been a joint employer-employee occupational health and safety committee at the Centralia plant for some time.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that officials of the industrial health and safety branch will continue to assist both management and labour at this facility to develop an internal responsibility system which will enable management and employees to assume their specific responsibilities under the law.

Mr. Lewis: That is a very unsafe plant.

ORAL QUESTIONS

PAYMENTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. S. Smith: A question if I might to the Treasurer regarding the matter of property tax reform. Do I understand correctly, referring back to the documents that he issued regarding property tax reform in January 1978, that in his calculation about provincial tax contributions to municipalities, he has arranged that the total grants decrease would equal the increase in total provincial tax contributions? In other words, although the province would be paying more taxes to the municipalities, in fact the grants to the municipalities would decrease by an equivalent amount. Do I understand that correctly?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: On the basis of 1976, yes.

Mr. S. Smith: If that is the plan—that the one will cancel out the other—do I take it that the Treasurer's plans would be different in future years if his provincial-municipal reciprocal taxation arrangement comes into being? On page 14 of the budget the Treasurer says that if the province will be paying full local taxes on its properties under property tax reform, then it's only fair that the municipalities will have to pay sales tax, fuel taxes and licence fees to the province. I take it there will be a complete allowance for whatever fees are payable to the province, and this will be over and above the money presently included in his re-creation of the Edmonton commitment?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Yes, I think the figure was a very rough estimate. It would be for municipal, utility and education reciprocal taxation which we forgo at the moment and it would be a move to simplify things. It's an exemption process. I think the figure, as I remember, is somewhere around $50 million. If we stuck to what we showed on January 4, then I would expect to add that $50 million by way of, I suppose, unconditional grants—what would that be?—$6 per capita or some such figure across the province. Or we would put it into the grant system somehow or other before we started collecting the $50 million on the other side. I wasn't as clear on the budget as perhaps I should have been.

The other reason we have portrayed through the piece—and there's a great thick book for every municipality in the province—is that the committee, which is meeting again today, as a matter of fact, and tomorrow, is correct I think. For one thing, if this came into being in 1979, obviously the transfer figure would then have grown by three years, in any case, so the figures will never be exactly the same as they are. But we wanted the debate, and we have attempted to look at it on the basis of the same amount of money going in. Undoubtedly, in my view, there will be something more.

I indicated to them this morning that if we proceed with the property tax credits, that's $75 million which I would not expect to deduct as a further deduction. They were pushing me this morning as to how much extra I was prepared to put in, and that is a question I still can't answer until we see the dimensions of the problem. I may say, for the interest of the members of the House, the committee has been working diligently and very well and is reaching an agreement on a significant number of points.

Mr. S. Smith: Just one final supplementary, if I might.

Mr. Cassidy: It is not a final supplementary.

Mr. Foulds: It's his final one.

Mr. S. Smith: It's my final one; I'm sure there may be others. It's basically a brief one. In the reciprocal taxation arrangements—which seem to make a lot of sense and which now, I'm reassured, will not penalize the municipalities—can the Treasurer assure us that there are no particular municipalities where, for whatever reason, these payments in provincial taxes—fuel taxes and licence fees—would be considerably above what an average per capita grant back to them might be, and that special arrangements would be made in those instances?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I can't give the hon. member the assurance that there wouldn't be. I used the example yesterday that a municipality near and dear to my heart might decide to build a bridge for $5 million of which the steel and material was $1 million and on which the sales tax in that given year would be $70,000; over a period of a year, I'm sure it would work out. But I'm sure that before we do this we will have to take a look at where there are unusual circumstances so that it's phased in over a period of time. I think it's at least a couple of years away but I wanted to flag it in this year's budget for the attention of municipalities.

Mr. Swart: Will the Treasurer then give assurance to this House that any additional cost levied against municipalities this year—due to sales tax or for any other reason in the budget—will, in fact, be reflected in increased grants to the municipalities?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I'm sorry, I missed the first part of the question.

Mr. Swart: I said, can the Treasurer give assurance to this House that any increased costs to the municipalities this year, due to the sales tax increases, et cetera, will be reflected in his transfer payments to them; that there will be a corresponding increase in grants to match their costs?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I'm not aware of any sales tax increases in the budget which would be applicable to municipalities, other than the railway rolling stock which applies to only one municipality, and the Minister of Transportation and Communications and I have been having some discussions about that.

Mr. Warner: It's a sizeable bill.

UNIVERSITY FUNDING

Mr. S. Smith: I ask a question of the Minister of Colleges and Universities: Can he give us the figure for the average transfer payment grants to universities, averaged out per student attending universities on a full-time basis? Does he have a figure, and can he tell us how that compares with other provinces?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: By memory, I can tell the hon. member the value of the basic income unit. It's essentially $2,650 this year. That isn't quite a direct answer to the member's question. I'm prepared to table that information; we do have it. Obviously, the average grant per student is a reflection of the number of BIUs per student which averages approximately 2.5 BIUs per student. I would not be sure that two and one-half is the correct figure. I'm more than prepared to give the member that information though. [2:30]

I would certainly suggest that the number of dollars per student is about average. Another figure that must be put into that same equation is the number of dollars per taxpayer given per student. On that basis, Ontario fares very well. With regard to per student, we do not appear to do as well for this reason. We educate a larger share of the students in Ontario than our population figure would reflect. We have about 36 per cent of the population of Canada and we educate about 42 per cent of the post-secondary students of Canada.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary, I understand the minister feels that Ontario is justified in ranking somewhere between sixth and eighth, which is the figure I have, in the amount of dollars spent per student in the university sector in the country as a whole, and that that low ranking is justified in the minister's mind on the basis that we simply allow a larger number of students into our universities. If that is the case, is he not worried that in point of fact he is sacrificing quality for quantity in a way that has not been adopted elsewhere in the country and in a way that may in the long run be the undoing of our post-secondary system?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: No, I don't see it in that perspective. One of the things that should also be considered when we are discussing this problem is what was the commitment in the last decade. Based on those figures, I think you will see that a few years ago Ontario was at the top of those percentages and those commitments. Therefore, we have a more mature system that over the years has had the benefit of those large numbers of dollars previously spent and now in the system working to its advantage. We can't view it for one year only. I think that's far too short a perspective when we view the commitment to our post-secondary institutions.

Mr. Cooke: I have a supplementary for the Minister of Colleges and Universities. I was interested to hear his news conference this morning. I would like to ask him, when he was calculating the increased grants to universities for the upcoming year, did he not feel it's a much better comparison to look at the overall percentage increase to universities rather than the increase in the basic income unit? Was he not just attempting this morning to fudge the issue?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: I don't think so. I just heard yesterday—and I am not 100 per cent certain of these facts, but if I had wanted to fudge the issue I might have presented this kind of information to that particular press conference—that the province to the west of us, I believe, will have a much smaller contribution to its system this year than we will.

Ms. Gigantes: They are Tories. What do you expect?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: I am not going to try to justify the number of dollars that we spend on our post-secondary system by the number of dollars that Alberta spends or Manitoba spends or Nova Scotia spends.

Mr. Cooke: I am talking about here in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: I think the commitment that this province has made this year and in the last decade to post-secondary education has indicated the very strong and high priority that this government places on post-secondary education.

An hon. member: You are talking about the past now.

Mr. Sweeney: Supplementary: Given that the figures that you were using earlier refer to operating grants and not capital, would the minister not agree that the maturity of the system has nothing to do with it? Would he not also agree that the fact that we have dropped from first place to eighth place is a clear indication of a deterioration in the support of this government for the post-secondary system?

Hon. Mr. Parrott: No, I don't see it that way at all. I have in front of me figures which indicate how well we have fared with inflation. In the year 1967-1968, taking that as a base, the value of a basic income unit was $1,320. Inflate that throughout that decade by the same proportion as CPI would inflate dollars and we are right with it. In addition to increasing our commitment from $1,320 to some $2,650 a year per basic income unit, we have dealt with a very significant growth in the system. Combine those, and I think we have ample reason to say we have done an excellent job of funding those institutions.

The point I make about capital is simply this, if I could use this analogy, if I have a home and the member has a home but I have a mortgage on the home, I submit to him that it costs a good deal more for me to live in that home than he in his home of an identical price with no mortgage payments to make. I am suggesting that those large commitments made on the basis of capital grants to those institutions in a long period of time are reducing the needs for operating grants today in our system. It is part of the maturing of the system.

Mr. S. Smith: Universities don't pay capital costs like that. It is not part of their operating expenses.

Mr. Sweeney: It is a capital cost, not an operating expense.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: I'm afraid that capital costs—rental costs—do come out of operating funds.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary to the minister: In view of the fact that students are being driven out of universities and colleges because of the inadequacy of the student aid program, would the minister not agree that his statement today was patronizing and irresponsible in its attack on students, and that he would do a more constructive job as minister by ensuring that there was enough funding there so that the universities could, in fact, continue to provide quality education and meet the needs of Ontario society?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: What nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Irresponsible distortion.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Totally irresponsible.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: It is extremely difficult for me to treat that question seriously. It really is. There is absolutely no possibility that the facts are as the member just presented them. The opportunities in our post-secondary educational system are such that a person wishing to attend an institution is more than able to do so.

Mr. Cooke: Once they graduate there is no opportunity at all, thanks to your government.

Hon. Mr. Parrott: I have no hesitation in saying that to the hon. leader of the third party whatsoever. None.

Mr. Foulds: You have not solved the accessibility problem.

CHRYSLER PLANT CLOSURE

Mr. Cassidy: I have a question for the Premier. Is the Premier aware that as of this morning Chrysler announced the closing, effective July 1, of their Tecumseh Road truck assembly plant in Windsor, which will result in a loss of 750 jobs? Also, what steps does the government intend to take to protect these workers and ensure that these jobs remain in Canada?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Those are not the facts. Distortion, distortion.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I'm not aware of that.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Well I am.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The most recent information I have, as of just a few moments ago, is that there is a study under way in terms of the old plant, the possibility of moving the truck production to the newer plant, something of that nature. I will check right away; but as of my information of about half an hour ago, no such decision has been made public that I know of.

Mr. Cooke: They held a press conference this morning.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I know about that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I'm sorry, the Minister of Labour has more recent news than I have. If, in fact, they have made a decision, it has been done since about 2 o'clock, that I am aware of.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I will redirect the question to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is my understanding that the 62-year-old facility is to be terminated as a truck production plant. It is to be used as a supportive fabricating plant for the van plant, and indeed it is the intention and obviously the goal of Chrysler Canada Limited to employ, within a six-month period, all of those 750 people at present working in that plant within the Chrysler operation in Windsor. The truck production will be phased out by the end of July of this year.

Mr. Deans: Where is it going?

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is anticipated that the increase in production in the van plant will be accommodated and accomplished by the first of January, and within six months, between the end of July and the ensuing six months, all of the workers who have been working in the truck plant will be employed by Chrysler in some other capacity; it is expected 350 will be in the support fabricating plant and the other 400 throughout the entire Chrysler operation.

Mr. Deans: I'll believe it when I see it.

Mr. Bounsell: Since, in the questioning by the union at the announcement today of the closure of the Chrysler truck plant, it was indicated that those employees would be retained only if their sales increased, and only some of them would be rehired in fact, this does represent a closure and a termination of many of the jobs in the Windsor area.

The rumoured closure was first heard of on Monday and it is now confirmed today, and since today it is rumoured and not denied by the company that the plant 2 six-cylinder engine plant, involving 600 employees, will be closed, what steps will be Minister of Labour and the Premier take to ensure that the engine plant does not close in the near future, providing as it does employment in the parts sector of the auto industry already woefully unbalanced in a manner detrimental to us under the auto pact agreement?

Further, what steps is the minister prepared to take and what talks is the minister prepared to have with Chrysler Canada Limited to retain all of those truck plant jobs in Windsor, so we don't have the disastrous economic effect in Windsor and Essex county that will otherwise take place and we don't further unbalance the auto pact, which is already seriously imbalanced to our detriment?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The hon. member knows that at any time the Ministry of Labour staff and the minister are very pleased to talk to both the union and the employers in order to minimize any potential disturbances which might occur. But at this point in time it is my understanding that although there will be temporary layoffs, those jobs are not in jeopardy. The 750 employees presently employed there will indeed be employed in the Windsor area by Chrysler Canada Limited.

Mr. Deans: What proof do you have of that?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have the word of the president.

Mr. Deans: What information have they given you to back that up?

Mr. S. Smith: Supplementary: Will the Ministry of Labour, together with the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) and together with the Premier, immediately call in the presidents of Chrysler, of Ford and of General Motors, and have on the table the plans of those companies and make clear the determination of this province to have a fair share of all the new plant investment which is going to have to occur in the next little while, and also a fair share of both the parts and the assembly jobs in this province?

Will the minister take that kind of action and do it quickly before the thing is closed on us piece by piece?

Mr. Cooke: Why doesn't the Leader of the Opposition get his Liberals in Ottawa to do something?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I'm sure the Minister of Industry and Tourism and the Premier are much more fitted to talk about the ongoing conversations which have been held, but I spent one half hour today talking to the president of Chrysler Canada Limited—

Mr. Bounsall: Oh, taken in again.

Mr. Mackenzie: Did you call the president of the union?

Hon. B. Stephenson: —who informed me that indeed they were willing to spend within the next very short period of time another $13.5 million to upgrade their plant in Windsor which they fully intend to keep totally operational.

In so far as General Motors and Ford are concerned, I am aware that there have been discussions with the presidents and senior officers of those companies, because as you know, the Premier has made a very positive public statement that we were going to do everything we could to ensure our fair share of whatever expansion those companies would have within the province of Ontario.

Mr. Cooke: Supplementary: The question started off with the Premier. I'd like to ask the Premier or the Minister of Labour—whoever wants to answer it—if they would in fact look at the problem in Windsor. Would they find out if these jobs are going to Detroit, as we have been told? I have been hounded by members of the press from Windsor this morning telling me of the 800 jobs that are lost, so I can't see that the minister has the proper information.

Mr. Lewis: Your ministry never knows what's going on, for heaven's sake.

Mr. Cooke: Maybe the Premier could today inform me of the new initiatives that he is willing to take to get a balance in this auto pact—not the old things that he has done, the new initiatives. We in Windsor are sick and tired of this government's inaction.

Mr. Mackenzie: Inaction on everything.

Mr. Lewis: Your ministry doesn't know what's going on—it never does until after the event.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I'm sorry that the hon. member for Scarborough West is deaf and really doesn't understand.

Mr. Martel: You don't?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I had a conversation with the president of Chrysler Canada Limited—

Mr. Bounsall: Co-opted again.

Mr. Mackenzie: Why didn't you phone the union president, too?

Hon. B. Stephenson: —an honourable gentleman—who informed me precisely what their intentions were.

Mr. Lewis: Their intentions, not their undertakings.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have no reason to doubt that gentleman.

Mr. Mackenzie: Just like Inco—trustworthy.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have no reason to doubt that the information which he gave me was correct. The small truck plant will not be, I gather, located in Windsor.

Mr. Martel: Where will it be?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The van plant will be expanded.

Mr. Martel: Where is the truck plant going to be? That's the bloody question.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The small truck plant, I would anticipate, will be moving to Detroit, because of the fact that the plant in which that truck is being made is 62 years old—

Mr. Martel: Don't build a new plant in Canada, heaven forbid.

Mr. Cooke: The union's been on their backs for years to upgrade it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: —and is very difficult and very expensive to upgrade for that purpose. It is their intention, as I said before, and I would re-emphasize it, to continue to use that facility as a support fabrication plant—

[2:45]

Mr. Mackenzie: You guys over there are great managers. You are great planners.

Hon. B. Stephenson: —for the van line which will be produced, in much larger numbers than it has been, in the new plant—

Mr. Bounsall: That will create few jobs.

Hon. B. Stephenson: —for which Chrysler Canada Limited spent $40 million two years ago. That production line is to be increased dramatically.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege, I would like to inform the hon. minister that I am not deaf. What I heard clearly was that the truck plant is going out of this country to the United States and that the minister has no undertaking from Chrysler but only a statement of intentions. That is not good enough for the workers in Windsor.

Mr. Cassidy: That's right. You're being taken in.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You are a misogynist. You really are.

Mr. Lewis: I am not a misogynist; I am a misanthrope.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You are both.

Mr. Lewis: You have to be careful the way you handle the language. I am not a sexist either.

POLICE SURVEILLANCE

Mr. Sweeney: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: What is your point of order?

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, I have to ask your assistance to direct me or guide me in this matter. I have just been advised that there is an unmarked police van out in the front taking movies of the students. Whom may I ask on the government's side as to which ministry gave approval to do this?

Mr. Lewis: And where is the screening?

Mr. Bounsall: It is your responsibility to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: I am not aware of any such occurrence out there. We did have a meeting to run over what the procedures would be for large demonstrations. There was none authorized by the Speaker's office and the Speaker was not advised that any of this would be going on. We have the director of administration who is in charge of the demonstration out there now, trying to liaise between the demonstrators and our security forces.

Ms. Gigantes: It is the Solicitor General (Mr. Kerr).

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps if he is within hearing distance of my voice he can get out and investigate. In any event, I will try to get to the bottom of it.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, would either the Solicitor General or the Ministry of Government Services (Mr. Henderson) have anything to do with such authorization?

Mr. Speaker: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Mackenzie: Who then?

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that the Metro police are not able to come on these grounds without the authority of you or the Premier or the Solicitor General? Who gives them the authority?

Mr. Speaker: It is common practice for large demonstrations. We have a full-time staff of only 19 around here. It is common practice to invite the Metropolitan Toronto police force and on occasion the Ontario Provincial Police when we need assistance just for crowd control.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. You are not going to debate this matter. Does the hon. member for Riverdale have a point of privilege?

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I thought since it touched upon my privileges it would touch upon the privileges of the Solicitor General. I am surprised that he is not making a response in this House about that matter.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I really hadn't had a chance to. There have been a number of people on their feet at the same time. As far as the hon. member's question is concerned, I am not aware of any authorization for the taking of movies or pictures, as the hon. member referred to them. Certainly the metropolitan police force has every right to be in front of the building today.

Mr. Martel: They have got to watch for goons.

Mr. Lewis: They're a bunch of paranoids all of them. They sit there and they tremble at a student demonstration.

Mr. Laughren: Allan Grossman is running the camera.

Mr. Lewis: They run around taking pictures of the demonstrators.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Cassidy: I have a question of the Treasurer: In view of the fact that the federal Minister of Housing has today announced a doubling of federal money available for public housing, in view of the fact that thousands of jobs can be created in the construction industry were Ontario to take advantage of this particular offer from the federal government, and in view of the fact that last year Ontario took only half of the $92 million available from the federal government for public housing, will the Treasurer take action to ensure that funds from Ontario are made available so that this year for a change we take full advantage of that opportunity both to create jobs and also to meet a very bad need for housing for people of modest incomes?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That question should be put to the Minister of Housing.

Mr. Martel: He is new and he will say he doesn't know.

Ms. Gigantes: He doesn't believe in public housing.

Mr. Warner: He doesn't believe in housing.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I would have to say the statement by the federal minister is somewhat premature inasmuch as since January 30 there have been discussions going on with the 10 provinces, the senior representatives of the ministries of housing across this country, and the federal representatives of CMHC.

It is my understanding that at this very moment there has not been a conclusion arrived at between the 10 provinces and the federal government. They will meet again on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday of the coming week to discuss and to try to finalize a plan, an attack or an approach for housing in Canada that will relate to the 10 provinces. Until that is concluded, I would think it is somewhat premature for the federal minister to be speaking out in this particular way in terms of programs.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: In view of the need to create jobs in Ontario at this time and the very severe unemployment that exists in the construction industry, will the Minister of Housing guarantee to this House that we will use all of the funds that are made available for this program from the federal government and not underspend it by $46 million, as Ontario did last year?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I offer the assurance to this House and to the people of the province of Ontario that we will take full advantage of all the programs that are put at our disposal by the federal government. The programs we are now discussing will go far beyond just funding of housing; they will relate to other programs for which we, as a government, have responsibility.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Can the minister explain how Ontario intends to take full advantage of the federal programs when this very Minister of Housing, within days of taking the job, said that Ontario was going to get out of public housing completely and would not build any more?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: The leader of the third party should go back and try to read some of the news stories. I don't think that is exactly what I said.

Ms. Gigantes: Oh yes, it was.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I said as explained previously by the former Minister of Housing, this government would try to withdraw its participation in public housing—

Mr. Cassidy: Exactly.

Hon. Mr. Bennett—and to get into other programs that would assist the private sector to produce the type of housing that's necessary.

Mr. Deans: How does that differ from what my leader said?

Mr. Foulds: What does that mean?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: If the hon. member also would read Mr. Ouellet's remarks of this morning, I think his point of view is exactly in that direction. Indeed, the other nine provinces are taking the same attitude as well, that there has to be a reduction in government ownership but a greater participation in assisting the private sector to produce the type of housing that is needed.

Mr. Samis: That's not what they said in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: The program that Mr. Ouellet is now bringing forward, I think will complement that very point of view.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary: In view of this policy of the minister's about encouraging the private sector, could he tell us what policy initiatives he has taken since he has been minister to change the shift from public ownership to encouragement of the private sector. What are the new programs that he is talking about?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: In the fullness of time, that position will be made clear to this House.

Mr. Roy: You are looking at alternatives without action.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: We have them.

Mrs. Campbell: Tell us. Tells us!

Mr. Warner: Supplementary: Exactly how long will it be before the 10,000 people who are on the waiting list in Metro Toronto for housing will know of the minister's specific plans? How long will it be before those 10,000 people will get an answer as to when they can expect some housing in this city of ours?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I think the member should be aware of the fact that a certain portion of the responsibility rests with the metropolitan housing authority and not with the Ministry of Housing entirely.

Ms. Gigantes: Promises, promises.

Mr. Deans: They can't build houses; they don't have a supply of money.

Mr. Cassidy: It's a puppet of your ministry.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: The housing list has been reviewed and examined here in the metropolitan area, as it is being examined in every major city. As to specifics for Metropolitan Toronto, I will be pleased to table that information with the House.

Mr. Warner: Your first major day and you are a failure. You should resign. You are a failure.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: You're not the ones to talk about failure.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You should resign, David.

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Bradley: My question is of the Treasurer: Is he aware of the financial impact of his 37½ per cent increase in OHIP premiums on community colleges and universities in this province? If so, is he prepared to modify this proposed increase, or withdraw or to compensate these universities and colleges with increased grants?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the specific impact. I suppose it could be completely sorted out. The answer to the second part of the question is no.

Mr. Bradley: Supplementary: In the light of the fact that it will cost Brock University approximately $60,000 and Niagara College about $35,000—and these are just two examples—would the Treasurer not agree that it is very likely that the number of faculty will have to be decreased and, therefore, the quality of education in these institutions will go down as a result of this particular move?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I doubt that very much. I suppose there may be some faculty on staff who perhaps were looking forward to, let's say, a five per cent raise and who may only receive a 4½ per cent raise. That may happen.

BEARE ROAD LANDFILL SITE

Ms. Bryden: I have a question for the Minister of the Environment: Will the minister tell us if a formal request has gone from the ministry to Metropolitan Toronto for a further extension of the right to dump liquid industrial waste at the Beare Road landfill site beyond the present extension which expires April 30, 1978?

Hon. Mr. McCague: Mr. Speaker, not that I am aware of.

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that when Metro Toronto applied for a certificate of approval to continue to operate this plant in an application dated February 5, 1974, it was stated that the future life of the landfill site was two and a half years, which would bring it to July 1976?

Hon. Mr. McCague: No, I wasn't personally aware of that.

RESTRUCTURING OF UTILITIES

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, a question of the Minister of Energy: In the last four years, there has been a very comprehensive study by a study team on the restructuring of hydro within the region of York. That report was presented to his ministry late in 1977. My question is, has the minister accepted the report of the study committee of the region of York on restructuring? If the answer is yes, when can we expect legislation to be presented to this House?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, I'm aware of the hon. member's impatience with the progress on the restructuring of the utilities there, but I am pleased to advise him that legislation is now being drafted and we will be introducing it in this House in the month of April. It has been slow in coming, but we wished to make sure that the people living in that particular area were in full agreement and consensus had been achieved before we would introduce legislation.

Mr. Hodgson: Supplementary: Could we give the municipalities that are prepared to take over restructuring by May 1 of this year, some hope that they will be able to take over the restructuring plan that they have presented to the minister? Certain municipalities are ready to take over May 1.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I have every reason to believe that to be the case.

GLENDALE TRAINING CENTRE

Mr. G. I. Miller: I have a question for the Premier. Would the Premier please inform me if he has written to Mr. Baldock of the Glendale community committee concerning the fate of the Glendale adult training centre? If so, could he please indicate his decision?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I don't recall having sent a letter to him as yet. If the hon. member would like a copy of what that correspondence may contain, I will endeavour to get that to him.

ROLLING STOCK TAX

Mr. Foulds: I have a question for the Treasurer: Did the Treasurer take into account, when he imposed the seven per cent tax on railway rolling stock, the adverse effect that such a tax would have on the development of rapid transit through TTC and GO Transit, and on the competitive position of one of the few secondary manufacturing industries in northwestern Ontario—namely, Hawker Siddeley division of Canada Car in Thunder Bay—which has successfully produced rapid transit parts for both those operations? If so, can he tell us what that effect will be and what steps he can take to remedy that?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, in response to the second part, I think none. In response to the first part, inasmuch as I believe on present order we're paying something like 80 per cent of the cost, the cost to the users of Metropolitan Toronto is not going to be that great. In so far as our own use through GO Transit is concerned—and I'm sure the minister would want me to say this—we believe in the benefits of public transit and seven per cent isn't going to stand in our way.

Mr. Foulds: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Do I understand correctly that the Treasurer went through the process of establishing a tax in the budget and gave absolutely no consideration to how that tax would affect one of the few secondary manufacturing plants in northwestern Ontario?

[3:00]

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, it's not going to affect them, obviously. It's not going to affect them. It's paid by the purchaser.

Mr. Foulds: What?

Mr. Renwick: For heaven's sake. That won't affect the purchaser then, eh? His sense of economics has deteriorated.

Mr. Foulds: Does the Treasurer not understand that the contract with the Hawker Siddeley Can-Car plant in Thunder Bay will have an additional seven per cent cost and therefore its competitive position in bidding for contracts with TTC and GO Transit will be adversely affected?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No. Why would it be? If Bombardier bid on a contract for TTC and the goods are sold in this province then the tax would have to be paid. It doesn't change the competitive position one iota.

ORGANIZED CRIME

Mr. Roy: I have a question of the Solicitor General. Would he advise whether he is aware of the arrest that has taken place in Ottawa, apparently involving charges of extortion and conspiracy to extort on Ottawa students? According to the investigators the people involved are part of what they call the Hong Kong based Triads, or the Chinese mafia, which have centres in San Francisco, Toronto and Vancouver. Would the Solicitor General advise whether he has this problem under control, because according to the Ottawa investigators it would appear that these people are receiving their orders from Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, we are aware of a certain group, allegedly from Hong Kong, that infiltrated the Chinese community in various parts of the province, mainly in Toronto. Whether or not this is the head office, as the hon. member implies, we are not aware. We know that they are involved mainly in the Chinese community here, because it is the largest Chinese community in the province.

The hon. member may know there was a trial just recently in St. Catharines involving that group. Our combined forces operation is quite aware of the activities of that group and it is under continuous surveillance. We expect more arrests. The hon. member has indicated an incident in Ottawa, and this would be part of the operation.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary: May I ask the Solicitor General if he would confirm that the police here in Toronto apparently have to contend with two groups in the Chinese community here which apparently are responsible for a number of incidents, including multiple shootings, robberies and a dozen reported extortions? Would he also advise, in view of the fact that apparently this group comes from Hong Kong, whether his ministry or the police forces in the province have been in touch with the federal minister responsible for immigration about these people coming into the country?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the combined forces operation, and that includes the RCMP as well as our local police and the OPP. I could get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. Roy: How are they getting in?

NATIONAL STEEL CAR STRIKE

Mr. Mackenzie: A question of the Minister of Labour: I am wondering if I could make a personal appeal to the minister to involve herself in the strike situation at National Steel Car in Hamilton, where, as the minister I am sure is aware, 667 employees have been out since January 12? Would she have a senior member of her ministry take a look at the entire situation, re-evaluate it and see if they could not do something now that might head off what will be a potentially explosive situation if the injunction that has now been applied for in that situation should be granted in that section of Hamilton?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, senior members of the staff of the mediation branch have been involved in that dispute and, indeed, there was a mediation meeting held not longer than eight days ago.

This is certainly being monitored very carefully and I shall see what we can do to attempt to bring the parties back together.

Mr. Mackenzie: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: I made the appeal personally to the minister because I think the threat of the injunction that is there has started to accelerate an already touchy situation. I think we might be able to head it off if there were some real effort shown, particularly by the minister herself, in getting them together in that situation. I'm aware of the mediation effort on March 8.

FLECK MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Mr. Riddell: Mr. Speaker, a question of the Solicitor General: In view of the continued violence at the Fleck industrial plant—and I make reference to the incidents this morning in which the vice-president's car was stopped and damaged and threats made on his life by workers from outside the area—and in view of the report that 100 workers from outside the area are going to beef up the picket line tomorrow morning, what additional measures is the ministry prepared to take to ensure that those who are rightfully entitled to enter the plant can do so without threats to their person and property?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. There was an incident this morning. I understand that charges of wilful damage have been laid against two people and there's a possibility that charges of threatening may also be laid. As far as tomorrow morning is concerned, there is the rumour that there may be an additional number of employees from Talbotville who will join the picket line. We don't anticipate that there will be that much trouble. The OPP presence there will be pretty well as it has been all along. There may be some additional policewomen at the scene tomorrow morning, but hopefully there will not be any incidents such as happened there today and on previous occasions.

CENTRAL INVESTIGATION BUREAU

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Will the Solicitor General cause to have investigated the statement which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator for Wednesday, March 15, in which the headline says "Private Force Shocks Union" and in which the Central Investigation Bureau of Hamilton appears to have set up a team or SWAT unit for the purpose of providing protection of property for people who may be faced with a labour dispute?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I also noticed that article in the Hamilton Spectator. The head of that organization has been advised by the registrar that security guards are required to have licences; that only in very particular circumstances are they allowed to carry weapons such as was indicated in the article; and that the idea of being a security guard under our legislation is to protect property, not to indicate that there will be confrontations using weapons or animals or anything of that nature. Apparently, the head of the squad, a Mr. Fitzgerald, has indicated that when he made the remark that "We are mercenaries, pure and simple," he was misquoted.

Mr. Deans: Of course, everyone always is.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I hope he was because we will not tolerate this type of private organization in the province.

Mr. Deans: Supplementary question: It's funny, you know; I don't remember ever being misquoted in 11 years in politics. Everybody else seems to be misquoted every day.

Let me ask the minister if he would investigate further the claim by Mr. Fitzgerald that they have, apparently, been accustomed to arming the people who have been providing this service with baseball bats, axe handles and guard dogs. Would he look into that, in the light of the sort of thing that's happening in southwestern Ontario and in the light of the general mood that seems to be developing, the sort of anti-union mood that seems to be developing in the province of Ontario? There's something terribly wrong. Would the minister take a look at that and instruct them clearly that they do not have the right and must not and shall not engage in that kind of undertaking, and that if they do they will be subject to the full penalty of the law?

Mr. Conway: We're hearing about that leadership race at last.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The head of this Central Investigation Bureau, Mr. Fitzgerald, had a licence for about 10 or 11 years as a security guard, so he's quite aware of the laws in respect to security guards and private investigators. As I say, our inspector in that area intends to call him in, as he has on previous occasions in respect to a particular strike in Hamilton, and I anticipate that the so-called private SWAT squad will not develop.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: You can make it a new question. The hon. member for Nipissing has a question first.

URANIUM HAZARD

Mr. Bolan: My question is for the Minister of Housing. Having informed him on Tuesday last that I would ask him a question today about a proposed plan of subdivision on an island in Lake Nipissing, having regard to the fact that there is a known quantity of uranium ore on this island system, and in view of a report filed by the Ministry of the Environment calling for a halt to the development because of the potential for the water supply being contaminated by radioactive material, what does the ministry propose to do about this potential health hazard and doesn't the minister feel that the development should be discontinued?

Mr. Martel: You should get a policy over there.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I do recognize the fact that the member for Nipissing handed me the question earlier this week. It's correct to say there was a plan filed with our ministry in October, 1977. As the member knows, we have been having a number of meetings with an organization, a group of people he is associated with. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. McCague) and the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller) have given us preliminary reports. They are being further analysed in relation to some of the subjects the member has raised. There are other areas we are concerned about as well and we hope we'll have a conclusion on this within a short period of time.

Mr. Bolan: By way of a supplementary, in view of this potential health hazard, is the minister not prepared to instruct his ministry officials to place a ministerial order on the entire island so that there is no development whatever pending the determination of these matters relating to health hazards?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I would think it somewhat premature of me to try to put a ministerial order on the property or on the island until we have had some conclusive information from the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) and the Minister of Natural Resources in relation to the problems the member has mentioned. Until I have that information I do not intend to put a ministerial order on this particular project.

METRO BOARD OF EDUCATION

Ms. Gigantes: I have a question of the Premier. Considering the events of the last few days in Metropolitan Toronto and the fact that the Toronto board has been driven to considering legal action to protect the interests of Toronto taxpayers and the Toronto education system, and the fact, as I stated last week in the House, that the Metro board is not protecting the special education teachers in the Toronto system, even when it was given $1 million by the government to do precisely that last May, I would like to know when the government is going to make a decision on the dissolution of the Metro board of education?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I assume from the hon. member's question that she believes the Metro board should be dissolved. She might consult with some members opposite whether they share totally that point of view. There has been no such decision made.

Ms. Gigantes: Oh, yes; they do.

Mr. Warner: It was unanimous.

Ms. Gigantes: When will it be made?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The decision to dissolve the Metro board?

Ms. Gigantes: Yes. When will the Premier make a decision on the question?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wouldn't count on it coming in at all.

HYDRO CORRIDORS

Mr. Reed: This question to the Minister of Energy is very much in line with a couple of phrases he used in his opening statement today in the House about "narrowness of outlook" and "blowing it." Now that the minister has capitulated to cabinet and denied the interested citizens' group the justice of an independent study on the Bradley-Georgetown Hydro corridor, will the minister act to preserve his own credibility and follow his predecessor into resignation from the cabinet?

Mr. Roy: And if he has any guts he will run federally.

[3:15]

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, that question is so irrelevant to the current situation that I think if there are any signs or thoughts of resignation they should be for the opposition's energy critic rather than over here.

An hon. member: And David Warner too.

Mr. Bradley: Very arrogant.

Mr. Kerrio: If you won't resign, will you take a long leave?

Mr. Reed: Could I ask the minister what has happened to the statements that he made shortly after his—

Mr. Bradley: Ascension.

Mr. Reed: His ascension—thank you—into the cabinet—about turning the light on Ontario Hydro and letting the people know?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I am prepared to answer that question, which finally came out. He even had to have some help to get the question across the floor here.

Mr. Kerrio: We'll let them help you with the answer. Let Lorne help you with the answer.

Mr. Nixon: You're an LLD. Let's see what you have to say.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, we have had any number of meetings with interested citizens' groups. We have heard them out. That particular group is satisfied with the decision that was finally taken.

Mr. Reed: Oh, were they?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Yes, indeed they are. And if the hon. member would read some of their public statements, he would see that they say, "We have to accept reality." They agree that the line, going as it now will be going, was in fact the best of all alternative routes.

Mr. Reed: Where will we read that?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I read it. I read it a few days ago.

Mr. Roy: That is a poor answer for an LLD.

An hon. member: Why don't you resign, Reuben?

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

Mr. Swart: My question is also to the Minister of Energy and it concerns his somewhat belated and apparently abortive trip to Ottawa to make representation on the Alaska pipeline bill. Would I be right in assuming that the minister's submission to the special committee of the Commons on Bill C-25 was directed solely towards urging that Ontario be included in the federal-provincial consultative council or did he make other proposals for improving the bill?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: In that particular visit to Ottawa, we dealt only with the question of membership for Ontario in the consultative council because that was the issue under study by the House of Commons committee.

However, in the way the presentation was made, we certainly did make it very clear that we were interested in the northern pipeline for a substantial number of reasons, including that of providing supplies, creating jobs here in Ontario and so forth, just as the hon. member opposite and some of his colleagues had done in their submission to Ottawa a few days before. I think there was a commonality of interest there.

We were rather disappointed, however, to find nothing—and here are the people sitting right over there, whose speaker has been shouting and pounding and saying we should be doing more and more in terms of stating our case to the federal government, and all they have been doing is playing patshies. They haven't opened their mouths once to try to get Ontario into the membership of this consultative council. But the NDP have.

Ms. Gigantes: Two namby-pambies don't make a policy.

Mr. Roy: Hey, Reuben, what does LLD mean?

Mr. Swart: Supplementary: Did the minister or will he, make special representation to that committee for inclusion of another clause or for a change of a clause in the bill so that there is a guarantee that Canadian pipe and facilities that can be produced in Canada will be used in the construction of the pipeline in Canadian soil?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: We did not make that specific recommendation.

Mr. Swart: Will you?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: As far as I know, the committee terminated its hearings last night.

Mr. Swart: No, it didn't. It's not through until tomorrow morning.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Well, we are certainly prepared in any way, shape or form to make our views known to that committee or to the federal government.

Mr. Warner: My colleague knows more about the committee than you do.

Mr. Bradley: You're not getting an answer, Mel.

Mr. Warner: We should send Mel up there. He knows more about the committee than the minister does.

AIR SERVICES

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transportation and Communications: In specific terms, what is the nature of the commitment, outlined in the Throne Speech of some two or three weeks ago, to improve the quality of air commuter service in eastern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Snow: Mr. Speaker, I believe, as I recall the language—

Mrs. Campbell: You'd better ask.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Snow: As I recall the language of the Throne Speech, it was quite specific.

Mr. Roy: We're not concerned about the language but about the intent.

Hon. Mr. Snow: It was stated that my ministry would carry out a study—

Mr. Martel: Oh, we know all about studies over here.

Hon. Mr. Snow: —of the possibility of implementing a commuter air service serving the communities of eastern Ontario. The intent as I see it is for us to explore the possibilities, along with the present licensed private carriers, to see what could be done to have a better service—a service possibly along the lines of the norOntair service in northern Ontario, but not necessarily operated in the same way; perhaps with not as much, or perhaps with very little government involvement. I would like to see us able to work with the federal government and with the presently licensed carriers to get a better integrated air service and perhaps operating into more communities.

Mr. Conway: The phrases “not as much” and “very little” are terms we well understand in eastern Ontario from this government.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's not fair, Sean. You know that's not true.

Mr. Sweeney: You're right, it isn't fair.

Mr. Conway: When does the minister expect those studies to be completed and when can we expect a policy statement from this ministry? What is the time-frame for those studies presently under way, and at what point can we in the Legislature expect to hear from this government a policy direction to produce what the minister intends in the way of an improved air commuter service?

Hon. Mr. Snow: Perhaps the people from eastern Ontario might be used to very little, with comments like that from the hon. member.

Mr. Roy: No, no. It's the evidence we have been getting from that government—that's what we are used to.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Snow: In any case, we have certain initial work under way right now, getting these studies started. I have not established a definite timetable at this time; I have recently had some personal conversations with the federal government. I would hope, though, that we would have the studies completed by the end of the year.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, before calling the orders for this afternoon, I wonder if I could make announcements at this point.

This afternoon, following completion of the private members' public business, Her Honour will come in to give royal assent to Bill 59 and to the supply bill which the House has just agreed to.

In view of that I am wondering if I might take this opportunity to give the usual statement of the order of business. Following the completion of private members' public business this afternoon and the royal assent, the House stands adjourned until Tuesday afternoon, March 28.

On Tuesday, March 28, we will take some legislation into consideration and in this order: first, the Land Titles Amendment Act and the Land Registry Amendment Act for second reading and committee of the whole House; second, Bill 23 for second reading and committee of the whole House; third, a debate on a motion for interim supply; fourth, Bill 25, the Tobacco Tax Act; fifth, Bill 27, the Retail Sales Tax Act; sixth, Bill 30, the Municipal Elections Act.

We won't be in the House on Wednesday. On Thursday, March 30, in the afternoon is private members' public business. We will do Bill 40, standing in the name of Mrs. Campbell, and Bill 32, standing in the name of Mr. Warner. In the evening we will continue from where we left off on Tuesday night with respect to legislation.

On Friday we will first debate a motion to refer sessional paper 13 to the standing committee on general government, and secondly, resume debate on the first order as time allows.

On Monday, April 3, the House will be in committee of supply and will take into consideration the estimates of the Ministry of Government Services.

On Tuesday, April 4, in the afternoon, we have arranged to debate and vote on private members' notice of motion No. 5, standing in the name of Mr. Cassidy. Then, of course, we will have an opportunity to discuss subsequent business after we return.

ESTIMATES SCHEDULE

Hon. Mr. Welch: I might also take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to say that in accordance with procedures laid down in the rules we have arrived at some agreement with respect to the estimates schedule. Perhaps that could be read into the record at this time as well.

In committee of supply, these ministries in this order and within the time allocations as set out: Ministry of Government Services—eight hours; Management Board—five hours; the Premier, Cabinet Office and the Lieutenant Governor—five hours; Ministry of Revenue—nine hours; Ministry of Northern Affairs—10 hours, and Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs—25 hours.

As for the estimates in the justice policy field, it has been agreed that we shall begin with the estimates of the Solicitor General at the standing committee on the administration of justice on Wednesday morning, April 26.

LAND TITLES AND REGISTRY AMENDMENT ACTS

Mr. Martel: Just before the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, for clarification, it was my understanding that the land titles amendment and the land registry amendments were to be moved today. I can't find them in the order paper and I can't understand how they are going to be debated on March 28.

Hon. Mr. Welch: It may be that sometime during the course of the afternoon we can locate them and get the concurrence of the House to introduce them. It was my understanding that we were going to introduce them this afternoon.

Mr. Martel: Otherwise we can't debate them on March 28.

Hon. Mr. Welch: That's right. You are quite right. I'll follow up on that. Thank you very much for drawing that to my attention.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS FOODLANDS PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Swart moved second reading of Bill 12, An Act to provide for the Designation and Retention of Foodlands.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have up to 20 minutes; he may reserve any portion of it for a windup if he so desires.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, I have been involved in the matter of foodland preservation for many years and I am obviously pleased to rise to promote this bill.

It was in 1965 that the then Premier of this province, John Robarts, told a St. Catharines audience that their area was "the outstanding example in Ontario of the need for long-range planning." He prefaced those remarks by saying that the problems facing Lincoln and Welland counties were more acute than in any other area of Ontario and he referred specifically to the disappearing fruit lands.

He then pledged that his government would take action to resolve the problem. He had reason to know there was a problem of disappearing fruit land and a rising public consciousness about it. Ralph Krueger, the noted geographer from Waterloo, had been hired to do a study in Louth in 1957 and his report focused on that issue. In 1961 the community planning branch of the Ontario government updated Krueger's work and showed that the loss of fruit land to urban development was increasing year by year.

Several other reports were also done in the early 1960s but no action was taken by the Ontario government. Then in 1968 Professor Gertler's Niagara Escarpment fruit belt study report was completed. It was a most comprehensive planning study ever done for a region in this province and it provided a clear blueprint for provincial government action. It was so good and so embarrassing to the government that it refused to release the report to the public until four years after, in 1972.

By that time, of course, the Niagara regional government had been formed and the province had passed over to it the overall planning responsibilities. Let me say that for three years a bitter battle raged in the Niagara regional council between the food land preservationists and the "development anywhere" exponents, and I am conscious of this because I was there. Lined up with the preservationists generally were the regional planners and, no doubt about it, the bulk of the public, but the preservationists on the council were always a minority and we lost every battle, at least the final battles. The culmination of the exercise was a regional plan produced in 1974 which placed 26,000 acres of undeveloped land inside the urban development boundaries.

That 26,000 acres was an area capable of accommodating a population of 275,000 people in the succeeding 20 years, although the highest estimate of the region's expected growth was only 155,000, some 120,000 less. When this planned destruction of the grape and fruit land became a hot political issue in the 1975 campaign—

Mr. Hall: Why aren't you talking about the whole province? Why just fruit land all the time?

Mr. Swart: I'll get to the province—the Ontario government through its then Housing minister, Mr. Irvine, told the regional council it must cut back those boundaries to preserve more of the unique land. In August 1976 the region produced a revised plan cutting out 600 acres or 2.5 per cent of the 26,000 acres originally put in.

Mr. Hall: By a vote of 22 to 4.

Mr. Swart: Then in February 1977 a new Housing minister (Mr. Rhodes) ordered the region to take out another approximately 2,400 acres. This cut the total original amount still further.

Mr. Hall: It was 3,000 acres.

Mr. Swart: No, it was not 3,000 acres. The member for Lincoln should know. He has examined it. The minister included the 600 acres that had been taken out by the region in his 3,000 cutback. That cut it actually by about a twelfth. By then, the projected growth rate had greatly changed. Niagara regional government then estimated that the 20-year growth would be a maximum of 110,000, not 165,000, a cut of one-third. The latest projections prepared by Peter Barnard and Associates for the Ontario government, and the Minister of Housing, put the growth in the next 20 years at 48,000.

Mr. Hall: No way. That's not the situation.

Mr. Swart: There are 23,000 acres of vacant land inside the urban boundaries—

Mr. Hall: There is a lot of unemployment down there now.

Mr. MacDonald: Whose side are you on?

Mr. Swart: —of which 11,000 is prime food land, including 7,500 acres of grape and fruit land. That's double the amount of development land needed for the growth during the next 20 years.

During the decade and a half following the war years, only half the Niagara Peninsula growth located in the unique land, but in the eight years that regional government has existed—and this was a gradual increase—75 per cent of all the region's population growth has been in those communities on that grape and fruit land. Originally there were some 38,000 acres of tender fruit land in the Niagara region. Now it's down to 23,500 acres and that figure's a year or two old. It would be somewhat less by this time.

The loss of the grape lands is similar. Yet for the rest of this century the regional plan will permit—and these are pretty significant figures—three-quarters of the Peninsula's growth to locate on the one-quarter area of the Peninsula with the unique climate and soil conditions. Three-quarters of the growth can go on that one-quarter of the very special crop land.

All these statistics can easily be documented and they tell a sordid tale, but it's even worse than those figures portray. The urban boundaries over which millions of dollars have been spent are little more than meaningless lines on a map. Recently, Walker Real Estate of St. Catharines, as agents for an unnamed firm whom we all know, proposed construction of an office complex to house 320 workers on 32 acres of land below the escarpment just south and east of the Queen Elizabeth Way-Glendale interchange. That land is 70 per cent class one and 30 per cent class three.

The report of the Niagara Escarpment Commission staff, dated February 10, 1978, states that the site is located outside of the urban development boundaries—those boundaries have 23,000 acres in them—of the official plans of both the Niagara region and the municipality of Niagara-on-the-Lake, where it is proposed that it locate, and also that it contravenes the Niagara Escarpment proposals.

It further notes: "That it is the belief of the municipality and the firm that the location of the office building in its proposed site would act as a catalyst for similar types of development to occupy adjacent sites." That is a deliberate statement of trying to attract more on to the agricultural land which is outside the urban boundary.

For all these reasons, the staff recommend that the commission refuse the development permit. What has happened? The council of Niagara-on-the-Lake has approved it and Niagara region has approved it. The Escarpment Commission has approved it and the Ministry of Agriculture and Food has by letter indicated no objections to the proposal. [3:45]

So much for the possibility of the Niagara regional plan ever saving one acre of Niagara's unique land, and as everyone knows, Niagara is the bell-wether as to what happens to food land preservation in the province. If the exceptionally unique food land is not saved there, land won't be saved any place in Ontario.

Mr. Phillin: Between the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. W. Newman) and the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow) we won't have much land left.

Mr. Swart: What kind of leadership has the Ontario government given in the preservation issue in Niagara? I quote from a September 10, 1976, statement of Mr. Robert Bell, whom some of the members of this House will know. He is a Conservative and he is chairman of the Niagara Regional Planning Committee which is a committee, of course, for regional council. He said, "We asked for guidelines from the province and got no reply. They told us they didn't like the original urban boundary bylaw we passed but they didn't say what they wanted." That just about sums up past and present Ontario government policy on the preservation of food lands.

On April 20, 1976, the then independent well-known columnist, Harold Greer, said in his column, and I quote: "For the most part, planning in Ontario under the Conservatives has been a massive con game in which the printing of ever more plans has been substituted for real planning." I further quote: "Even this in the talk about the plans is an overstatement. The Ontario government does not publish plans. Instead, it publishes designs, concepts, challenges and strategies which sound like plans until one discovers on reading the fine print that they lack the definition and official commitment which plans are supposed to have." How true that statement is. The government has simply refused to develop a firm position.

One of the first documents I sought out when I arrived at Queen's Park was called, "Guidelines for Land-Use Planning". It was produced by the Ministry of Natural Resources, and dated January 1, 1974. It had the following noble statement on page 1; I quote: "The first part of the strategic land use plan will be an overall provincial plan where provincial policies are formulated and where areas of provincial significance are designated. Then, working within the overall provincial framework, policies will be refined and a broad land-use plan will be prepared for each of the planning regions."

That's great stuff and I naively asked in the House when I was first here when the overall provincial plan might be forthcoming. The answers at that time, as they so frequently are, were evasive.

Then, on April 8, 1976, in great fanfare, the government produced 11 planning reports, one of which was titled, "A Strategy for Ontario Farmland." Well, I say to the House that it was a masterpiece of flimflam. It was full of options, alternatives and possibilities but not a provincial plan mentioned anywhere.

The year 1977 brought forth another document of equal vagueness and indecisiveness; it was called "the green paper". After soliciting input from municipalities and the other groups that green paper will now be slightly amended and then become about the sixth set of guidelines for municipal land use planning. No legislation, of course; no overall provincial plan; no firmness; just a very weak map which municipalities may follow if they wish.

Those guidelines will be nothing more than a rewrite of the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food guidelines for revising official plans and amendments which were produced in March 1975. Identical; all the same stuff. It is simply too much to expect the regions and the municipalities to do the broad planning for the province. Their actions to date have proved that they won't, and Niagara clearly demonstrates it.

The Ontario government has failed totally in land preservation. Whether the food-land loss has been the well-documented 26 acres an hour or 36 acres an hour or 16 acres an hour, I want to say that we haven't, in this province, yet saved one hour's worth. I simply challenge—and I'm not sure whether he is still in the House—the Minister of Agriculture and Food; I wish he were here—

Mr. G. Taylor: He's listening.

Mr. Swart: I simply challenge him today to name a single, proposed major industrial or residential development which has been refused because it proposed to locate on prime food land. Just name one. I don't want the answer to be, "Well, we've drawn lines on that and we're going to prevent them from locating there."

It is that dismal failure of the government that causes this bill to be before us today. You will recognize that it is a principle identical to the one submitted by the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. McCague) on November 15, 1976. It is submitted here in that form, not because I think it's ideal, but because it's far better than the vacuum we've now got and because I think, too, the bill ought to find some favour on that side of the House when several Conservative members and Conservative organizations lauded it so highly when it was tabled a little over a year and a half ago.

If passed, as I hope it will be, certain changes could be made which would not meet objections from me. I am not at all sure that class four lands should be put in the same classification as one, two and three; and we may want to look at that. Section 5 could be strengthened by including approval of other authorities on exemptions from the retention of the farm land instead of just the local planning group.

I like the bill because it does strike some appropriate balance between provincial responsibility and local jurisdiction, although it should require the Ontario government to produce its own master plan within two years, as it is going to require of the municipalities, and which the government has promised to produce on so many occasions before.

Unlike the green paper, however, it does require planning authorities to produce plans for the protection of food lands, and where there is no planning authority over food lands, the minister shall designate such authority. The passage of this bill will be the first step towards recognition of the value of our food lands, and no one recognizes better than I do the need for an adequate farm income stabilization program and the security of the home market for the food we can produce in this province; at least the last one, I think, meets the general approval of the members of this House on all sides.

Measures to meet those needs should have been implemented by our government long ago, but refusal to shift urban growth away from our best food lands doesn't help the farmer or anyone else. As much land is needed and is thus sold by the land owners—which in almost all cases are farmers—to locate a 100,000 population increase on class five land as is needed if they located on class one land. You are not depriving any farmers of the right to sell their lands; maybe one against another but the same amount of land is going to be sold. What we're doing, in fact, is seriously jeopardizing the farmers' long-range viability by forcing their operations on to land of lower productivity. It's an economic loss to them and to our society.

No one questions that there is an approaching energy crisis. Even more than energy, however, we know now that the food-land resource is finite. We know that at least one-third of the world's population is now undernourished. We know that 10,000 people die weekly in Africa, Asia and Latin America from hunger and improper distribution.

We know that the population of this planet will go from four billion to six and a half billion by the end of this century—and that's just 22 years away. Last week's newspaper reminded us that there are now 74 million more mouths to feed than just one year ago. We are told by every responsible organization studying the matter that we're going to be short of food land. Whether it's the World Food and Health Organization, the Science Council of Canada, the agrologists of Ontario, or the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, they all sound the warning of an approaching world-wide food shortage in which we in this province and nation won't go unscathed.

Federal Environment Minister Leonard Marchand released a report less than two weeks ago which confirmed the loss of 200,000 acres of land to urban expansion alone from 1966 to 1971 and that report—

Hon. W. Newman: In Canada, in Canada.

Mr. Swart: That's correct. But listen to what I'm going to say now, too. It said:

"About 63 per cent of the land paved over in the six-year period had been used for crops, orchards, market gardens and pasture. Toronto was the major glutton, expanding over 29,000 acres, almost all of it on prime farm land, but St. Catharines, Niagara, was the worst offender using 699 acres of irreplaceable fruit belt for every 1,000 increase in population.

Then the report said: "The land now being lost will be needed in 25 years to feed a larger population."

A short while ago, Robert Long, the United States Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, put it more bluntly when he said: "The hand on the granary door will soon be the one to rule the world unless food production continues to stay ahead of the global population explosion. The key issue is that world food supply and population growth are headed along a collision course."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Swart: One sentence: Ontario's contribution to that collision course to date has been to put green lights at the intersection. This bill might at least switch on a caution light down the food lands' road to destruction.

Mr. McNeil: Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to understand why some people want to put this province in a land-use strait-jacket. Land-use policy isn't the kind of thing that should be written into legislation.

Mr. MacDonald: Are you back in that old rut?

Mr. McNeil: It covers too large a territory and has too many variables to be engraved as a statute. I wonder if the hon. member for Welland-Thorold realizes the full implications of his bill?

Mr. Swart: I sure do.

Mr. McNeil: Does he realize the effect of his bill will be to freeze 21 million acres of land for two years and that for the two years it would take to draw up a new plan for every municipality in this province, no development could take place at all? There are some municipalities where it would be almost impossible to second-guess what land is likely to be defined as food land so no decisions would be made at all. It seems to me that two years is an optimistic time limit. There are municipalities where it would take a lot longer than two years to draw up a plan if they could find any planners to do it.

Mr. Swart: The planning authority can give approval. Read the bill.

Mr. McNeil: The two-year freeze is a particularly strange result of a bill coming from a member whose party is so anxious about jobs and housing.

Mr. MacDonald: That's claptrap.

Mr. McNeil: Does he have any idea what this two-year hiatus would do to the housing supply and to the economy of this province?

Mr. Swart: Read the bill.

Mr. Warner: Cadillac-Fairview put you up to this.

Mr. McNeil: The bill just proves what I said about legislating land-use policy. Look at the contradictions it has built into it. There is a much better way of achieving the result we all want—namely, the protection of our productive farm land and we're already doing it?

Mr. Swart: Where? Name the places.

Mr. McNeil: We've stated the principle to which we are committed. I'll quote it from the Foodland Guidelines: "To maintain a permanent, secure and economically viable agricultural industry for Ontario, not only as a producer of food—"

Mr. Swart: You are the government.

Mr. McNeil: "—but as an important component of our economic use, a course of employment and as the basis of a rural community and the rural way of life."

To put the principle into practice, we have to consider a number of factors. One of the most important is the land. The government's guiding statement on land is—and I'll quote the guidelines: "Our land-use policies and planning must assure that as much as possible of the land area with capability for agriculture is kept available for farming when needed."

Mr. Swart: What is that other than a pious statement?

Mr. McNeil: It seems to me that the next logical step is to identify the land with a capability for agriculture. That is the next section to the guidelines: "A description of what kind of land is valuable and how to identify it."

Mr. Swart: That's kindergarten stuff.

[4:00]

Mr. McNeil: The guidelines then go on to discuss how the various classifications of land should be treated in various situations. The final section of the guidelines sets out how this shall be applied and by whom. The document is short but comprehensive, explicit as to intent, yet flexible. It has all the things a land-use policy needs to be if it is to accomplish its intentions, while at the same time being applicable to so diverse a geographical area as the whole province of Ontario.

The ministry published this document last year and asked for public comment, particularly from the municipalities. As members will be hearing later from my colleague, we have had largely favourable reaction. In the near future we will be adopting the guidelines possibly in a slightly amended way—

Mr. Swart: That's exciting.

Mr. McNeil: —as a formal government policy. We can do that with confidence, because we know they work. We have been using them in our regular review of plans submitted to us by the Ministry of Housing. By applying the guidelines—

Mr. Swart: You adopted them in 1975.

Mr. McNeil: —it is quite a straightforward matter to decide whether a doubtful section of a plan conforms to desirable planning principles. This has been especially helpful in making decisions on estate development, severance policies, application of the code of practice and uses that conflict with agriculture.

There is an even more encouraging aspect of this, however, and that is the use the municipalities are obviously making of the guidelines. We see more and more plans coming in where the municipal councils and planning boards have used the guidelines to provide their municipalities with extremely well-designed plans. In fact, I would like to mention just a few municipalities by name. Municipalities that have followed the sound planning guidelines that the provincial government has developed for agricultural land—a few, there are many more—include London township, Pembroke township and the north Perth planning area. I believe these plans are still undergoing the approval process but the Ministry of Agriculture and Food is satisfied with the agricultural aspects of them.

I am sure members will recall that we applied the principles of the food land guidelines in the Niagara decision, which received a lot of publicity. We were able to save 3,000 acres of fruit land from urban development.

Mr. Swart: And lost 4,000.

Mr. McNeil: Since that time, we have used the guidelines to protect land in similar situations—

Mr. MacDonald: Destruction by instalment.

Mr. McNeil: —none of them so dramatically large as the Niagara situation, but at least one amounted to 358 acres of corn and processing crops land. Just protecting the land isn't enough, however. It's no use having land sitting there if nothing is being grown on it and if we can ensure a reasonable market at reasonable prices so our farmers make a decent living that's just what will happen, so the protection of food land involves much more than land-use policy. It involves a viable farming community.

It can easily be argued that every one of the programs of the Ministry of Agriculture and Food is designed to ensure a viable agricultural industry. That, indeed, is their purpose, but I will confine my remarks to our marketing programs because when we come right down to it, if the market is inadequate, production will drop off and consumer prices could rise.

The government has been running its Foodland Ontario food promotion program since last fall. We have been getting tremendous co-operation from the commodity groups and from the major chains and we have been seeing results. More turkey has been sold this past Christmas than ever before after our ads appeared—

Mr. MacDonald: What has that got to do with agricultural land use and production? You have one string to your bow and you are plucking it.

Mr. McNeil: —and our winter vegetable promotion has pushed sales away up. Let me give a couple of examples. After our promotion, sales of onions in one chain went up a whopping 1,200 per cent; sales of carrots in another went up 40 per cent. We calculate the overall sales are up an average of 50 per cent in the chains on items promoted. That's the kind of results that keeps our land productive.

Mr. MacDonald: He has nothing to say so he is filling it with irrelevancies.

Mr. McNeil: The government is protecting our high-quality productive farm land and we are doing it the right way, with a land-use policy that can be applied fairly and equitably right across the province and a marketing program that is giving our farmers a decent return for their labour and investment.

Mr. Warner: The Minister of Agriculture and Food doesn't believe that. You know better.

Mr. Riddell: Mr. Speaker, we had a chance to look at this exact same bill, the same wording with very few exceptions, when it was introduced in the House in November 1976 by the member for Dufferin-Simcoe and now the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McCague). It is a duplicate of this bill with very few exceptions. Inasmuch as I believe in land-use planning, I would be inclined to think the member for Welland-Thorold who introduced the bill is using it as a wee bit of a forum to appeal to the urban people in the Niagara Peninsula.

Having said that, I would like to say that I believe the concept of a mandatory designation for food land, as outlined in the member's bill, An Act to provide for the Designation and Retention of Foodlands, is a step in the right direction. Mandatory designation is the type of legislation that groups such as the Ontario Institute of Agrologists have been asking for. Present municipal zoning is very flexible. It is often merely a review process whereby individual applications for land-use changes are considered as they arise and are either approved or rejected.

The zoning can be changed as growth pressures increase, and so land values are not affected as much as by stricter provincial control. In this way, the value of zoning as a planning tool is usually overlooked. A move to designate all class one, two and three lands and special crop lands as food land could reverse the current assumption that agricultural designation is merely a holding category for development land and could thus slow the loss of prime food land. Moreover, it could also be used to establish and effectively maintain planned urban edges and prevent uncontrolled urban sprawl and the breaking up of farming units in a growing urban and industrial economy.

In his Strategy for Ontario Farmland, tabled on April 8, 1976, the Minister of Agriculture and Food rejected provincial control to protect farm land, and there was nothing new in the government strategy. The protection of farm land will be left to the municipalities and their local plans, as has been the case in the past. Municipalities, however, cannot be counted on to preserve agricultural land through zoning, if an agricultural zoning is merely a holding zone for future development. Therefore, zoning as a method of implementing preservation of food land at the local level will not be sufficient, and other methods of preserving agricultural land will have to be devised. Examples of local control of farming in many municipalities, such as Huron county, do not apply to growth municipalities.

It has been pointed out that a legislated designation of agricultural land would fit in well with the green paper on food land guidelines which was released last year by the Minister of Agriculture and Food for use in the planning procedures in municipalities. I would agree that the designation would give a base for the guidelines. As the Ontario Institute of Agrologists has pointed out, it would also provide a means whereby the preferred approach would have to be followed.

However, the success of government measures, such as the Foodland Guidelines, will depend on their implementation. Are they to become government policy or merely weak suggestions? It is interesting to note that they have been presented in the form of a discussion paper, and so are not policy. It is also noted that the government has not indicated the degree to which these guidelines must be followed by the municipalities in their planning and the degree to which they are merely suggestions.

This would seem to me to be a crucial aspect of any guideline principle. I would agree with observations which have been made that these guidelines are merely an elaboration of the government's agricultural strategy and focus on local land-use policies to assure that as much as possible of the land area with the capability for agriculture is kept available for farming when needed. The province is merely saying that this is the way they want the municipalities to go.

Moreover, in the long run these measures will never be successful without government incentives to draw development on to the lower-quality land. However, no such incentives have been announced. Neither is any mention made for public utilities, such as Ontario Hydro, or government ministries, such as the Ministry of Transportation and Communications, to conform to the guidelines.

While the proposed bill would require all municipalities in the province to survey and classify all agricultural land within their planning areas, using Canada Land Inventory maps as a guide, there is ample evidence to demonstrate that this classification does not supply an accurate map of the significant agricultural lands to be preserved.

Mr. MacDonald: That can be corrected in the first two years.

Mr. Riddell: Rapid improvement in Canada Land Inventory is a vital element for improved agricultural planning. The total acreage with a soil capability for class one, two and three agricultural lands for most of the Canada Land Inventory area in Ontario is about 16.4 million acres and nearly 10 million acres of improved farm land. There is, however, a definite constraint on the climatically favourable land.

If we add an important climatic indicator such as heat units at a selected level, then we get a clear indication of how limited is the best farm land in southern Ontario. In fact, it has been estimated that perhaps seven million acres is a safe figure to use for the significant farm land, meaning land which is outside the urban arc, not affected by the Shield and in a relatively favourable climatic situation. It is these agricultural lands, based both on soil classification and climatic constraints, which are the significant farm lands in Ontario and which must be designated as food land and preserved for that purpose.

In conclusion, while I would support a mandatory designation of the significant agricultural lands as food lands to be kept in food production, this land-use strategy on its own, without meaningful guidelines from the province, cannot ensure that prime agricultural land is kept for farm land. This would leave the major implementation to the municipalities and assumes that the problem of maintaining good agricultural land is universal throughout the province. On the contrary, some municipalities have little concern with the preservation of viable agricultural land.

What is needed is a provincial land inventory of prime agricultural land based on the significant class one, two and three soils and special crop lands. An important climatic indicator such as heat unit must be added at a selected level. The province, in co-operation with the local municipalities, would identify and establish the significant agricultural resource areas. The local municipalities would work within Ministry of Agriculture and Food guidelines to determine which areas should be eliminated or included for designations, taking into account criteria such as physical conditions of the land, proximity to existing development areas, price of land et cetera.

Once these areas are established and the provincial agricultural strategy is put into effect, the official plan of the municipalities would be amended by the local councils to reflect this policy, designating significant farm land as agricultural priority areas. These lands would be released to other uses only when it is proven that the need for such land cannot be met from the supply of lower-quality land and that society will benefit from the change in use.

Different planning strategies will be required for different areas of the province. Planning in the predominantly rural agricultural areas of the province would encourage and support agriculture, rather than limit, restrict and control it, as has been the case in the past. In the urban fringe areas, buffer zones must be established which encourage open space and which are compatible with the urban nature of the area, such as pick-your-own fruit farms.

The detailed follow-through on land-use policy must be put in the hands of the local government, because it is the government most accessible to the people. Incentives must be provided by the province to attract industries on to the less productive lands in eastern and northern Ontario.

In closing, I would like to say that synonymous with the preservation of agricultural land is the good management of that land. Unless we are prepared to save the farmer, then it is futile to save the land.

Mr. MacDonald: What appals me, Mr. Speaker, is the lack of intellectual integrity on the other side of the House. When the first spokesman for the government rose, what was his phraseology? It was about the hon. member for Welland-Thorold, who wanted to impose upon this province a land-use strait-jacket. You're aware of the fact, sir, that what we are introducing is a bill that was introduced more than a year and a half ago by a member who is now in the cabinet of this government.

Hon. W. Newman: There are some differences.

Mr. MacDonald: There are no differences in it at all.

Mr. Foulds: Don't nit-pick.

Mr. MacDonald: There are no differences at all. That is nit-picking.

Hon. W. Newman: You have been nit-picking for 20 years.

Mr. MacDonald: He introduced it. It called for the mandatory designation of prime agricultural land and it received the support of all those who are interested in the preservation of prime agricultural land; indeed, that includes many Tories. This is what appals me about the government's willingness to try to dismiss what we're suggesting when they have no intellectual integrity at all.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Globe and Mail of November 16, 1976, which was the day after the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. McCague) introduced that bill in the House. How does it read? "The use of government-imposed freezes to control land use in Ontario has been endorsed by the Metro Toronto Progressive Conservatives."

[4:15]

Next paragraph: "The endorsement is a significant step for Conservatives still smarting from election losses last year in which the defeats in some ridings were attributed mainly to controversial land use and development control measures. Delegates of the 29 Metro Toronto Conservative riding associations—and listen to this—

Hon. W. Newman: I've read the article.

Mr. MacDonald: —"voted 73 to 21 at a policy conference last night to 'tolerate a very limited use of the land-use freeze tool'". That's what the Conservatives want, so please don't get up with a total lack of intellectual integrity and describe us as trying to put this province in a land-use straitjacket.

Hon. W. Newman: That's exactly what you'd do.

Mr. MacDonald: What we are doing is introducing a bill which was introduced by one of the minister's members over there, and which has the support of the Ontario Institute of Agrologists, the Rural Ontario Municipal Association, and every other collective group in this province interested in the preservation of prime agricultural land.

It is really very simple. The objective of the government is that we should preserve prime agricultural land, but they have no mechanism for achieving it. A guide is only a guideline that has no backing in law, so what they are engaged in is doubletalk. I'll come to show how much backing in law it has in a moment.

Hon. W. Newman: You know better than that. Just don't mislead us.

Mr. MacDonald: Mislead? The minister has just come up with total doubletalk; what does he think he is engaging in if that isn't misleading?

Hon. W. Newman: I just said don't mislead us.

Mr. MacDonald: What this bill does is to set out that objective, which presumably is the minister's objective, and then it provides a mechanism for achieving that objective. What it says is that in two years the guideline to municipalities shall be with the backing of law, that they will proceed to examine in a mandatory way, class 1, 2, 3 and 4 lands—I will agree with my colleague that class 4 should not be in there, although conceivably in some northern areas where you have no class 1 at all you may want to move into class 4 for agricultural land, but that is a detail.

I would agree with the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. Riddell) that there needs to be an updating of the CLI categories. In many instances they are very much out of date. But you use that guideline with the backing of law and within two years the local planning authorities come up with a designation of agricultural priorities, it is approved by the council, it gets the approval of the government and you have saved agricultural land. The government then is not playing games, is not engaging in double talk.

Mr. Lupusella: Come on, change your policies once and for all.

Mr. MacDonald: This is where the intellectual integrity is totally lacking. That is not a land freeze; we have operated for years where agricultural land, as a vital natural resource, has become a commodity on the market that can be bought and sold at will for whoever can make the fastest buck out of it.

Most people in society who have the future of our own province, the future of the human race at heart, recognize that you can't continue to dissipate a vital natural resource like that; therefore we have to protect it in some fashion or another. We have to say that this can't be bought and sold at will; that this is going to be maintained as a vital resource for future food production for our needs and the needs of the rest of the world.

And that is what this will do. It represents a fundamental change in approach. In other words, agricultural land isn't something to be played with in the marketplace. It is something that will be preserved for future purposes.

Let me give you an example, just to reply directly to an interjection of the Minister of Agriculture and Food a few moments ago. Let's take the Barrie example. Here is a government that presumably is in favour of protecting prime agricultural land. It enunciates a policy which is going to gobble up 20,000 acres of prime agricultural land around Barrie. So we go into the OMB to have an examination of it, and the local townships, which don't want their prime agricultural land to be absorbed into Barrie, fight the battle.

I don't want to get into the legal technicality of the OMB mistakenly saying that they couldn't question the population figures for Barrie and now it has gone to the court of appeal and the court of appeal has decreed that the whole of the OMB's operation is in nullity and we have to go back to square one. The important thing is that this government said it wanted to use 20,000 acres of prime agricultural land to build a growth point.

What is the situation today? Barrie today has 33,000 population. Barrie's current area, within the city boundaries, could hold 57,000 population. The most optimistic speculation in terms of Barrie's growth can't go beyond 75,000 or 77,000 population; yet this government comes along and says they want to have 125,000 population.

They have no policies to force feed Barrie to a figure that nobody conceives as possible, but they are willing to use all of that agricultural land; and yet the OMB cuts their 20,000 acres back to 8,800. Indeed if the government were really intent on protecting agricultural land it could have met the future needs of Barrie's prospective growth up to 77,000, the highest possible figure, with their current size plus at most another 3,000 or 4,000 acres to meet industrial and residential needs.

Don't tell us that this government is protecting prime agricultural land; it has no control over the Treasurer. The interventions of the Minister of Agriculture and Food to cut back on that massive grab on prime agricultural land had no effect at all; Darcy runs the show, and the Minister of Agriculture and Food, as protector of prime agricultural land, isn't really in the picture at all.

Hon. W. Newman: That's great rhetoric.

Mr. MacDonald: That's why we need to have a law, a backing of law. I am not saying this is any guarantee, because I suspect the Treasurer would challenge the law and run around it, over it and through it and everything if he could get away with it, but at least with a law he could be called to halt.

Mr. Warner: Bring the Treasurer under public control.

Mr. MacDonald: What this bill does is to enact in law what the Ontario Institute of Agrologists suggested two years ago, and they reaffirmed it at their annual meeting that was held two days ago in this city. But even more important, Mr. Speaker, I have always found it very convincing and impressive that another group that is calling for this kind of an approach to the protection of prime agricultural land is the Rural Ontario Municipal Association.

The Rural Ontario Municipal Association is made up of the municipal leaders who have been wrestling with this problem and not succeeding, because they know they are helpless in fact of the kind of powerful pressures of developers who gradually wear them down and manoeuvre in one way or another to achieve their purpose of eating up still more prime agricultural land. Two years ago they passed a resolution which calls—and let me read this just as one sentence: "When legislation that restricts the uses of the designated agricultural land is enacted."

I don't need to go any further. Their whole approach is premised on the basis that there shall be a legislation to designate prime agricultural land and to protect it. When that is done, then they go on to say that we should have exemptions so that if anybody wants to use agricultural land—it is not a freeze, may I say to the hon. member for Elgin, it's not a freeze; if they want to use agricultural land they will come in and prove that there is no lower class land available for that project, or alternately it is a project which is of such great community need and paramount importance that it is legitimate to sacrifice a small portion of agricultural land. But at least—

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member's time has expired. Would he please wind up?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. Not only the Institute of Agrologists, not only one of your own cabinet ministers, Mr. Speaker, not only rural municipal leaders, but everybody who has at heart the protection of prime agricultural land favours this bill. So don't give us any of this sophistry and this reflection of a lack of intellectual integrity.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I indicated to the member for York South that his time has expired.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cureatz: Mr. Speaker, could you indicate my timing on this? Have I got till 4:30?

Mr. Acting Speaker: You have your full 10 minutes.

Mr. Swart: When is the Minister of Agriculture and Food speaking?

Mr. MacDonald: He hasn't got anything to say, he knows the policy won't work.

Mr. Cureatz: I would like to open up by saying, as I have heard many judges say to me, I remember the judge commenting, I appreciate very much your intent; and indeed I would like to comment to the member who is proposing this bill that indeed I do appreciate his intent. I would like to comment also to the member for York South, I believe I heard him on radio a week or two ago, a CBC broadcast with regard to these very concerns, and he spoke very adequately in regard to his arguments.

My concern is that if this food land Act becomes law it seems to me that to begin with it would be hard on the 837 municipalities that would be required to prepare new plans within two years.

Mr. Swart: It doesn't say new plans.

Mr. Cureatz: Surveying and classifying all classes 1 to 4 land would be an enormous job. I am told that there are just not enough planners around in the province to do that kind of a tremendous task. My own personal belief is that I think at the moment we have enough planners in this province. The cost to the municipalities across the province would probably run into thousands.

Mr. MacDonald: That's a copout.

Mr. Cureatz: And what would the people get? I'm not sure whether we know. That would depend on each municipality, since the bill provides for no overall direction by the province. I feel that in some areas it would result in a freeze on necessary development, and members will note there are no provisions for varying or revoking the plans once they are adopted.

I wonder if the member for Welland-Thorold has considered that the Canada Land Inventory identified more than 21 million acres of land in Ontario in classes one through four, and that is 40 per cent of all our land. In the region of Durham, of which my riding is part, those classes account for 80 per cent of our total acreage. Is all that likely to be defined as food land, I question? Permit me to remind the member and the House that under section 5 of the bill, "no agricultural land which, prior to the completion of a planning study pursuant to section 2, is likely to be defined as food land, may be authorized for a non-agricultural use without the specific recommendation of the planning authority." What will happen to poor old Durham out there? Would we go into a deep freeze, as indicated by the previous member?

Mr. Swart: Who is the planning authority in Durham? Isn't it the council or the region?

Mr. Cureatz: We have a difficult enough time already, I would like to mention to the House, in regard to the Durham regional official plan, without adding another burden. From a legal point of view, it appears to be in conflict with the Planning Act. It requires every municipality to pass a bylaw adopting a plan. Does that mean that the new plan would supersede other official plans adopted in accordance with the Planning Act?

Mr. Swart: Many don't have plans; the others simply add to their plans.

Mr. MacDonald: Did you talk this over with George McCague before you decided to write that stuff?

Mr. Cureatz: If so, the plan required by this bill would take effect without the public meetings, the public involvement and the public safeguards guaranteed by the present Planning Act. The Planning Act provides a mechanism for any landowner to appeal an official plan to the Ontario Municipal Board, as the member for York South intimated previously; but this bill contains no such provisions in regard to such appeals, nor can I find any penalties for failing to comply with the provisions it does contain.

I imagine the bill could be reworded to clear up these particular points and a couple that I haven't mentioned, and indeed as I mentioned previously I do appreciate the overall intent of the legislation, but I have a couple of other reservations.

Mr. MacDonald: Make those criticisms in committee; support the principle.

Mr. Swart: Make the changes. Don't kill the bill.

Mr. Cureatz: In areas where protection of food lands is a more legitimate concern, this proposed Act apparently would permit the local council to decide arbitrarily what should be protected and what might be used for other purposes. Obviously, the standards could vary widely. It is possible that such a system would work most of the time, but I believe it just could not work all of the time. The government of Ontario must have a coordinating role to ensure that planning criteria and public involvement are uniform across the province.

I think it's plain that detailed land-use planning is done best at the local level by people familiar with local situations, but they must operate within a policy framework for Ontario's development. That requires close provincial-municipal co-operation. The government realizes that Ontario's urban growth has to continue and makes allowances for it. In many cases, the better land is kept for food production while development is directed to less valuable land, and certainly land severances should be made more readily available in less valuable agricultural land areas.

The alternative to the course was found in the Strategy for Ontario Farmland, which the government tabled two years ago. That strategy renewed the commitment to maintain a strong and viable agricultural industry through two approaches. One consists of measures to ensure the economic feasibility of farming our prime land and keeping it in production. The other approach consists of measures to ensure that the better land in every part of our province is kept for food production.

The later campaign resulted, among other things, in the government's green paper on planning for agriculture. It was issued in February of 1977 and it proposed guidelines to help municipalities identify and preserve our better food lands. That means not only good cultivated land, but good potential food land. In setting goals, the guidelines didn't just say, "Thou shalt not touch class one to four." No; they established such priorities, but they also gave high priority to areas with a high capability for specialty crops and they drew attention to other areas because of special conditions that made them valuable.

The municipalities were told that their official plans should designate some high priority food lands where only farming or uses compatible with farming would be allowed. The guidelines might allow a broader range of ultimate uses on land with a lower agricultural priority, but only if spelled out in the official plan.

The guidelines made it clear that in future, before any lands designated for agriculture could be used for other purposes, the need for the change would have to be justified and documented. In addition, the amount of land allocated for various uses must be realistically related to population projections and growth objectives for the general areas.

When the foodland guidelines were announced, copies were mailed to all the municipalities, to farm groups and to private and government planners. All were invited to comment by the end of last year. Officials are now clarifying some areas that were questioned and co-ordinating some changes that were suggested. The guidelines will become government policy in due course, without losing the flexibility that will make them effective. As a result, I believe the government has already in motion a land-use policy. There is a consensus in Ontario that it is a reasonable policy to date in reflecting as best as possible today's concerns, although some improvement could be made.

However, this bill is not the way of improvement and I will not be supporting it this afternoon.

Mr. Bradley: I rise in support of this particular bill. As an urban dweller, I suppose it is easy for me to do so. I would find, even amongst my own caucus, many who would disagree with me on this particular policy as it relates to agriculture and to planning.

I presently reside in a home which is on fine agricultural land and which probably is an excellent example of where development should not have taken place, in the north end of the city of St. Catharines where we have some of the best soil and the very excellent climate which is necessary to grow tender fruit. One of the reasons I became involved in the political arena was in the hope of saving that land which is valuable for agricultural use for future generations.

The hon. member for Welland-Thorold has mentioned the difficulties he experienced on the regional council. As a member of an area municipal council, I must say I experienced some of the same frustrations in attempting to bring about policies which would tend to restrict the growth of the municipality in which I reside.

As has been said on many occasions, to speak about the Niagara Peninsula for just a moment, it is an area which has possibly some of the best soil in Canada in terms of growing tender fruit, and in terms of growing grapes. The difference between the top of the escarpment and the bottom of the escarpment in terms of growing days is 27 frost-free days. I think we would recognize it is unique land which, as much as possible, should be saved for future use, and that use should be agricultural.

Many in this House will remember that in mid-May the thing to do was to visit the Niagara Peninsula to look at the blossoms. Understandably, that's not the main purpose of growing tender fruit, but nevertheless it was an example of how it became a tourist attraction. People looked upon the Niagara Peninsula primarily as an agricultural area and one very valuable, not only to this province but to the nation.

As well, 15 or 20 years ago, people looked almost with pride upon the fact that some day we would have a megalopolis from Metropolitan Toronto to Fort Erie, and that somehow this was something we should look forward to. Those were the days when growth was worshipped for the sake of growth and we were not perhaps using growth to our best advantage as we would now try to do in the year 1978. Things have changed from those particular thoughts, but they have not changed enough, because there are still those who wish to see some of this land gobbled up for development purposes, and I am not suggesting that every piece of agricultural land in this province necessarily has to be retained.

The need for a bill of this nature then is rather obvious and the member for Welland-Thorold and the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. McCague) deserve credit for this particular initiative. While we have sufficient farmland to meet our present needs, and our needs in the immediate future, the supply of prime farmland is not sufficient to meet the needs of the next generation or the generation after that. According to the Ontario Institute of Agrologists, and I am quoting from a Globe and Mail editorial of August 7, 1976, given population increases that can be expected—and they are talking here about this particular group—they found the future grim. "Even if no future improved land were lost to urbanization, it would be difficult for Ontario farmers to produce enough food to satisfy the Ontario population 25 years from now."

Our short-term interest may be served by random development or massive development of prime agricultural land, but our long-term interests are clearly in the preservation of good agricultural land. If we are to look beyond our own borders, or beyond the needs of our own population, we find that our present trade deficit could be turned completely around. Indeed, agricultural products could be to Canada what oil has been to certain Mid-East countries.

With the $5 billion to $10 billion oil energy deficit expected in the 1980s, this export of food to a hungry world could provide a much-needed infusion of funds and at the same time perhaps meet a need that we should look at in moral terms. Today foreign-produced foods as well are relatively cheap, but if we take away the competition of local grown foods, I think we'll find that the prices of these products will tend to soar.

What has been overlooked in this debate also is the possibility of a significant change in weather patterns. I note an article that appeared in the Toronto Star some time ago—it would be August 7, 1976—entitled "Disasters Feared as Climate Goes Haywire." Quoting a meteorologist, Patrick McTaggart-Cowan, it says the following: "For Canada, where existence is already a battle with winter cold and summer heat, the implications in a weather change are immense. All our planning in agriculture and urban development and development of the north has been done on the basis of weather records for the last 30 years and now that's all changed." I suggest to the members of this Legislature that if the average temperature in this country were to drop even a few degrees, the effect on the growing of farm products could be rather devastating.

Some will say that certain prime agricultural land is really not viable; that it lies fallow, that it is not financially attractive to farm. This is, however, a practice used by certain members of the development industry and by certain farmers who think that there is much more profit to be made in the sale of this land or the development of this land. I suppose this is, in their terms, in their personal interests, rather legitimate; but in the terms of the well-being of this entire province or country, I think this is difficult to justify. To use this tactic of letting the land lie fallow so that members of municipal councils will point to it and say, "It's really no good for farming and should be used for development," is not a practice that we should encourage.

This bill by itself will not solve the problems related to agriculture. Indeed it will need amendment to gain even a measure of support from the majority of the members of this House. But it is a step in the right direction. Tariff protection, import quotas, adequate financing for farmers, a buy-Canadian or buy-Ontario policy by our governments and people, such as practised by the Ministry of Correctional Services in its purchase of products from the Niagara Peninsula rather than from the southern United States; these are just a few of the measures needed to assist the Ontario farmer.

What this bill will do is give this province time to develop policies to ensure the long-term viability of the agricultural industry. I quote again from an article back in August 1976—this article appearing in the Globe and Mail. It quotes J. J. Shepherd, of the Science Council of Canada at that time: "He said in an interview that a forthcoming Science Council report will strongly recommend that provincial governments immediately designate all agricultural land in the country for agricultural use only. No other consideration should have priority in the use of agricultural land."

As an urban dweller, I recognize the needs of the farmer. I also recognize the needs of the population as a whole. I recognize that this bill, or certain other isolated bills or measures proposed to this Legislature, will not in themselves solve all the problems related to the production of food for our country, for our province, or for the world, but we do have to move in the correct direction, we do have to give an impetus to saving agricultural land because we know that once it is gone, once the pavement is on top of the land, on top of the excellent soil, it is no longer good for the growing of agricultural products.

On this basis, although I cannot agree 100 per cent with the bill, I strongly support the main thrust of this bill and hope that members of this Legislature will give it assent and send it to committee for necessary study.

Mr. Martel: It will probably get guillotined again.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for Etobicoke. There are three minutes left for this debate.

Hon. W. Newman: Yes, you would stop the world; and you want jobs.

Mr. Philip: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the fact that there are only three minutes left, but I can't help but think that even though the member for St. Catharines spoke at some length he brought out the very points that I was going to bring out. I certainly compliment him on an excellent speech and one which brought out a number of interesting points.

I think that perhaps it is significant that two of the most pointed and reasonable speeches that I've listened to in this particular debate were given by the member for St. Catharines and the member for Welland-Thorold, for they are in the middle of the very area that is being the most devastated at this moment by urban sprawl and development over the fruit-land areas.

One of the main objections to food-land use regulation is that farm prices are already low due to surpluses. We are already producing too much food as it is. The fact is that our basic crops—that is, corn, soya beans, pork, beef, white beans and fresh fruit—fluctuate with world markets, and that prices are low despite Ontario's deficit in production and would not be significantly lowered if Ontario entered into a position of self-sufficiency in production.

This bill allows for flexibility at the local level. It allows for considerable input and control by the local municipalities, and I think it is significant that the minister chooses, and that this government chooses, to listen to the spokesmen of the developer and the real estate industry rather than the spokesmen of rural municipalities, farmers' groups, agrologists and other people who are interested and are dealing on a day-to-day basis with farm-land use and farm production.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The time allotted for the debate of this bill has concluded.

KIDNAPPING OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF ITALY

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of personal privilege. It's on a matter that concerns all of us, as legislators, and all the people who are concerned with the democratic process.

The kidnapping of the former Prime Minister of Italy, Aldo Moro, and the killing of his five bodyguards by a group of criminal terrorists represents the peak of an escalation of violence against the Italian democratic state.

I express, on behalf of the Legislature and the people of Ontario, our condemnation of the absolute and criminal attack on the Italian democratic institution, and while we condemn with all our strength and convictions the insane violence of the terrorists, we express the solidarity of the people of Ontario, with the Italian government, with the Italian people, with the families of the murdered innocent victims, as well as with the family of Mr. Moro, with the full confidence that the people of Italy will be able to defend their democratic system.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I would assume that the member for Downsview is asking for unanimous consent to place that before the House.

Agreed.

Mr. Acting Speaker: We thank the member for bringing that to our attention.

Mr. Foulds: The Premier (Mr. Davis) should have made that statement.

Hon. W. Newman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege. I would take this opportunity to acknowledge the hon. member's concern. I shall pass it on to the Premier.

Mr. Foulds: The Premier should have made that statement.

Mr. Breithaupt: Not really.

Mr. Martel: Trudeau did, at great length.

Mr. Breithaupt: He did? That's nice.

WRITING OF CONSUMER CONTRACTS

Mr. G. Taylor moved private member's resolution No. 2:

That in the opinion of this House the government should give immediate consideration to legislation which would require consumer contracts to be written in non-technical language and in a clear and coherent manner using words with common and everyday meanings.

Mr. Reid: Could you explain that?
[4:45]

Mr. Martel: Only too well, I understand.

Mr. G. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, what time I do not use at this point. I would reserve at the end for comment. This is private members' time and I put forth a resolution instead of a piece of legislation and the resolution is primarily designed to end what might be termed, in the vernacular, legalese in consumer contracts.

One might ask why I chose the resolution instead of legislation but there are many difficulties with legislation. There is the cost of preparation of such an item, and it is often difficult for a private member to caucus the other members in this House, particularly the opposition, as to the success of a piece of legislation. One might say it's no use putting forth some pieces of legislation only to have them reach the veto or no status at all.

Also there is the difficulty of the advance knowledge of the business community and how your piece of legislation will be received by the business community. It's often difficult to assess the cost of such legislation to the business community should one insert it by private member's bill without the resources of the ministry and people advancing on it so that one can tell what will be the actual costs of such legislation.

It's also difficult to assess the consequences of a particular piece of legislation to the community as a private member, so I put forth this resolution as a prod and a catalyst to put the government on notice, and the consumers and the business community that—

Mr. Martel: It will take more than that to prop the government.

Mr. Foulds: They ignore resolutions.

Mr. G. Taylor:—such legislation may be forthcoming should it reach the consent of this House to put forth this resolution.

Let's look at consumer contracts, leases and such conditional sales contracts, personal instalment loans, purchase of goods such as cars, and insurance. All of these have very complicated contracts presently. One can look at the rules in law that say he who prepares the contract receives some of the benefit of it, but we can usually discover that the person preparing the contract does it for his benefit and it's usually the vendor or the person who is most concerned about the contract. If one is a purchaser one has to take what is there or one doesn't buy the goods, which is not always beneficial to the purchaser.

We can be sure that when somebody prepares a contract it's a seller's contract and it is usually loaded with fine print. One I have looked at starts out with large print, then fine print, fine fine print and then fine fine fine print, so one has great difficulty wondering what he is presented with. I can assure members that most purchasers do not know what they are getting into when they look at the contract as it sits.

Mr. Martel: Free enterprisers wouldn't do that to the public.

Mr. G. Taylor: The common law is of little assistance at times, although there is the common law rule that's there and it's a general rule: If there is any ambiguity in a contract, it's usually construed against the person preparing the contract. In my resolution, I don't intend that that rule would be dissipated but this is an amplification of that rule and something that will assist them.

Just to give you some examples, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues, of the type of legislation that would be prepared and what we have been trying to get away from in these contracts, just look at these examples of contracts. This is to help the person purchasing, and I quote: "We have read this agreement and we acknowledge receipt of a copy hereof," and that's usually at the bottom of the page where one signs the contract and then they will give one a copy of it. The purchaser gets the pink copy with the blue printing, which in itself is difficult enough to read, but the white copy with black printing, which the vendor usually gets.

I doubt if most people would have read the contract in the first place, in the second place, usually the print is too small to read, and in third place, if one does read it I doubt whether most people would understand it. When I speak of these examples, I hope that these examples can be cleared up with the type of legislation that might be forthcoming out of this type of resolution.

Let's look at car contracts. I read another contract; the long details are in the top part of the contract and when I get down to the bottom it says, and I quote: "Information below this line not part of the contract." That's very helpful—below that line there is nothing. There again, it's simply words to confuse. At the top of the contract it says, "Conditions on the back form part of this contract," hidden up in the right hand corner of the contract. That's not very helpful to the purchaser as to realizing what he is getting.

Mr. Martel: Sounds like something Walker would do; he's a great free enterpriser.

Mr. G. Taylor: Another example; listen to this one: "Warranties: There are no warranties or representations by the dealer with respect to the motor vehicle described herein or affecting the rights of the parties other than those set out in any applicable legislation in the case of a new motor vehicle provided a new warranty is given by the manufacturer and/or the dealer. No other warranty, agreement or representation made hereto nor modification hereof shall be binding upon the dealer or his assigns unless endorsed herein in writing."

What does that mean to the purchaser? That's what he is getting as a warranty, but what he is getting he does not know. He has to look at some other document outside the one he is signing; he has to look at some other piece of legislation outside that which he is signing. So there again it's another area where the vendor is not really helping the purchaser, he is trying to disguise something of what he is giving.

Again, other examples: "Conditions of sale." Listen to this one: "Time is of the essence of this contract, and if purchaser defaults hereunder or violates any condition contained herein or if a proceeding in bankruptcy, receivership, winding-up, or insolvency is instituted by or against the purchaser or his goods, or if any execution, attachment or writ should be levied upon any of purchaser's goods or the goods are confiscated"—and it goes on ad nauseam. What it really means when you boil it all down is, "If you don't pay off this contract, we are going to take back the goods."

So there's another one of the examples, not of clarity in the contract, but just the opposite—the very fine print that goes on.

There are some that go on for pages—no paragraph delineation, very little cohesive sentence structure. You could read them and read them and read them. These contracts go on, not for clarity but, I would submit, to confuse the purchaser.

Business alone is not to be condemned for this style of contract. Indeed, in our Legislature we put forth even more confusing legislation. That is not part of the resolution, just an aside. Many of our pieces of legislation have totally confusing words. Again, we put forth in some of our statutes clauses that must go in certain styles of contracts, such as insurance contracts and the Mortgage Act. They are just as confusing as those which some of the people use in businesses and which commercial people use in their contracts.

How do we propose putting forth such a campaign to promote the use of less legalese in the business community? Well, with the start of this resolution, should it receive the approval of this House, we would then start into the usual promotional campaign so that they know there is pending, and support in this House, for forthcoming legislation concerning the consumer contracts that are used by individuals out there.

The type of contracts that this resolution particularly gets at are the non-commercial consumer contracts which are written to cover transactions where money is involved—for property or service, for personal family goods, household goods—the usual everyday contracts that are on printed forms and which everybody runs up against in the commercial situation. They include apartment leases, instalment loans, credit applications, conditional sales contracts, retail sales contracts and new car purchases. You could have in some forthcoming legislation monetary limits of the size of the contract that might be involved, such as would they be non-commercial contracts of a personal nature that don't exceed $10,000, $25,000 or $50,000. There could be a monetary limit put on.

Another piece of possible legislation could be that each paragraph concerning a term would be segregated and the paragraphs captioned, so that one has a brief summary similar to our legislation, which has a brief summary at the lefthand side, telling you what might be in the legislation in the righthand side, although it's not always totally accurate, so you don't have the intermingling of paragraphs, numbers, sentences and words so that it becomes confusing rather than understandable.

Language could be simplified. Get away from some of what we would term legal jargon—the whereases, the heretofores, the hereins, the hereafters. I am sure the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk—he must be here—would love to read some of these contracts. He is so knowledgeable in the legal field that—

Mr. Nixon: I've got an LLD.

Mr. G. Taylor: From McMaster. I am sure if he would try to read some of the legal jargon he would be surprised at what it means at times.

The sanctions—what types of sanctions could be in such legislation? Sometimes you could make the contracts void or voidable. I would suggest the voidable situation might be more acceptable. There might be damages flowing out of the contract where the person injured, who didn't prepare the contract, would receive the benefit from the damages.

Class actions might be forthcoming where the damages would be pro rata and spread among all consumers in that particular area. Then, of course, we could have some lead time in the legislation, should the legislation come forth, saying contracts must be done within one year from the date hereof or some attempt done in that way. You can have good-faith and simplification clauses where the person who has prepared the contract and has tried to comply with the legislation is exempted from it in a court action concerning that.

With all of these, there is some benefit provided to the consumer. The reason for this, I think, is that a consumer who understands his obligations will better meet them. A vendor who sells accurately in the printed area will not receive unnecessary arguments at a later date. It will void unnecessary criticism and unnecessary callbacks as well as promoting better public relations with the people and the consumers he is serving. Even lawyers may better understand the contracts if they were read and printed in more simpler language.

Mr. Nixon: More simpler? How simple can you get?

Mr. G. Taylor: We may receive some objections to this from the legal community or from the business community but, to counter those, I must say it might even be productive of more work for lawyers rather than less. Think of all those contracts out there that have to be rewritten and corrected.

Mr. Foulds: Now we have the motives!

Mr. G. Taylor: It was coming. My friend had to wait to the end of the chapter.

Mr. Foulds: If Darcy's not going to make work, you will.

Mr. G. Taylor: But there is already legislation similar to this. There is the truth-in-lending legislation which requires that you have to set out the accurate terms of interest. So it is not uncommon.

The Royal Insurance Company has embarked upon a promotional campaign, and if you read their insurance contract, it has wording in it that is understandable. So it's not unheard of in the business community today.

Mr. Foulds: How fine is the print?

Mr. G. Taylor: Many US jurisdictions have gone into this. The Citibank in the United States has a consumer loan that is prepared in non-technical language. It hasn't changed the common law. The common law is still there. But I hope this resolution is a prod, a catalyst and gives this House the intent so that contracts, printed and reproduced in a standard form, are put forward in good, plain language so that when the person goes to buy the gold mine, he gets the gold mine and not the shaft.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak in favour of this resolution in principle. So far as the average citizen in Ontario is concerned, a study of the various contracts and agreements to which the member for Simcoe Centre has referred is clearly an example of floccinaucinihilipilification.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, is that parliamentary?

Mr. G. Taylor: Would you do that to me?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Point of clarification!

Mr. Breithaupt: As members are well aware, the meaning of that word is the art or habit of estimating as worthless. Certainly, so far as the citizens of the province are concerned in dealing with contracts and agreements of this sort, the time which is spent by them in attempting to work out the meanings of various terms and phrases is indeed part of the habit of estimating as worthless the results with which they are faced.

Our Legislature should approve this as a challenge to the financial and commercial areas of our community to be more responsible to all of us as consumers.

There are two particular examples of areas where the principle of this resolution is already being brought about. The first of which I am aware is in the life assurance field. At the last annual meeting of Canadian superintendents of insurance in September 1977, Mr. E. S. Jackson, the chairman of the Canadian Life Assurance Association, announced that a plain-language life assurance policy was close at hand. A committee of that association has refined and reworked some 24 model clauses to have them available for the various companies to use. As Mr. Jackson commented, the clauses cover such areas as the insuring clause, the relationship of beneficiary and owners, contestability, policy dividends, exchange options, and misstatement of age particulars and certain other matters.

[5:00]

It is clear that the end result will be better understanding and comprehension for the policyholder, as Mr. Jackson had said.

At the recent annual meeting of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada in Waterloo, part of the address of the president, Mr. John Panabaker, related to the practice which that company is undergoing.

Mr. Nixon: Graduate of McMaster.

Mr. Breithaupt: He stated as follows: "Visibly the new policies have been given a bright, informal appearance, they have also been completely rewritten to make them easy to read and understand. We have reduced insurance jargon and verbiage to a minimum. For example, one paragraph which formerly contained three sentences totalling 130 words, now gives the needed information in two sentences of only 44 words."

I am sure that members of the House in asking questions and in answering them, as well as in making speeches and comments generally, would all benefit from the reduction of that kind of verbiage so that more clear and simple results are available—

Mr. Roy: It's important for new cabinet ministers.

Mr. Breithaupt: —not only to the people of the province listening to politicians, but also in this way as consumers.

A visit to a Mutual Life office this morning obtained for me a copy of some of the provisions which that company is using. They are clearly set out, they are well defined. I am sure that is an example of only one company that is proceeding in that kind of a manner. I might say that even I understood the provisions once I had read them over a second time.

The second area is one that has been referred to by the member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. G. Taylor). That is particularly the approach which has been taken by the Royal Insurance Company as it has developed its homeowner's coverage. There have been a series of advertisements which have attempted to bring forward the principle upon which this kind of policy is being written.

The select committee on company law has noted during the past two years of our study of automobile insurance that there are many changes which could usefully be made to clarify the terms of the standard auto insurance policy. These changes have been actively reviewed by a number of the companies and I would commend Royal Insurance for their moves to bring out their new home shield select policy.

Mr. Alan Horsford of Royal Insurance has sent up to us an example of the policy. Royal of course, as one of the largest purveyors of insurance coverage, have used their approach in the market to give leadership in this matter. I believe this will have a great effect on the insurance market generally. The policy is clearly printed; it is crisply worded; and I would think properly understandable to the average citizen. The seven pages of it are clearly set out, and then there is the additional page which sets out the conditions required by this Legislature. The wording there isn't as clear as is the wording in the earlier seven pages, but that is the kind of thing which we as legislators can work upon.

This policy sets out the who and the why and the where and the what and the when so far as the individual policyholder is concerned. I commend Royal Insurance and Mutual Life as only two examples of companies taking this kind of approach. Of course, there are many others, not only in the insurance field but in the finance and credit granting institutions which are moving in the same way. Government here has an opportunity to give leadership and to deal with these kinds of approaches in a positive and intelligent way.

I commend the member for Simcoe Centre for bringing forward this resolution. I hope that its approval by members of the House will give the government encouragement to move to draft legislation and forms in much more clearly understood ways so that the people of the province will be better served by us as legislators, as well as by the various financial and commercial aspects of our society, of which the activities we have are a reflection. We should certainly encourage this approach, and I commend the member for bringing forward this resolution.

Mr. Davison: I also rise to congratulate the member for Simcoe Centre, and to support the principle of this resolution that consumer contracts be written in non-technical language and in a clear coherent manner, using words with common and everyday meaning. I have found in my experience, and my constituents have found in their experience, that consumer contracts for everything from automobiles to bank loans are not written in that fashion, and indeed not in the English language but in an off-shoot of the English language called legalese.

This language of legalese is readily identifiable from English in a number of ways. First, it takes a minimum of 10 times as many words to describe the same thought or matter of fact. Second, it contains a substantial number of words that are merely combinations of simple English words all run together with the spaces missing—words such as notwithstanding. Third, it is peppered liberally with hyphens between words instead of spaces such as herein-before. Fourth, it can only be understood or translated by someone with legal training or by one of those rare citizens in our community that understands these matters and specializes in the art.

Some time ago a gentleman who is familiar to all of the lawyers in the House, Mr. Justice Reilly, offered what I think is a rather fine and excellent comparison of the English language and legalese to the Canadian Bar Association. If I might quote a not overly long sentence from that address, I think members will get the point quite well. Mr. Justice Reilly said: "When a man gives you an orange he simply says, 'Have an orange', but when this transaction is entrusted to a lawyer he adopts this form: 'I hereby give and convey to you all and singular my estate and interest, right, title, claim and advantage of and in said orange together with its rind, juice, pulp and pits and all rights and advantages therein with full power to bite such and otherwise to eat the same or give the same away with or without the rind, skin, juice, pulp and pits, anything herein-before or herein-after or in any other means, whatever nature or kind whatsoever to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.'"

Mr. Ruston: He sounds like Pat Lawlor.

Mr. Davison: And he said it without taking a breath.

Mr. G. Taylor: He probably had to buy the orange. He wasn't giving it away.

Mr. Martel: It says a lot about lawyers.

Mr. Davison: Lest any of us think we can escape this off-shoot of the English language, legalese, by dealing and entering contracts in our other official language, French; or in any of the languages which are in common usage in my riding, such as Polish, Italian or Portuguese, we should all be aware that legalese does not recognize such linguistic bounds and jumps freely back and forth. I believe every consumer has an absolute right to know and understand what he is signing without having to seek legal advice or the services of a lawyer.

Mr. Warner: It sounds revolutionary.

Mr. Davison: In most consumer contracts of any length, this is not the case. Frankly, rather than requiring all of the citizenry of the province to take courses in legalese and become lawyers so they can understand contracts, it is much more sensible to do as the member for Simcoe Centre has suggested and to change the nature of the contract so that the contracts are written in plain language which is understandable to the vast majority of people in the province.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Think of the teaching jobs that will create.

Mr. Davison: A second matter touched on by the member for Simcoe Centre in his resolution and in his comments today is the question of the very technical nature of languages in some contracts. To some extent, of course, that is unavoidable, but it does present an equally difficult problem to the consumer.

We, unfortunately, live in a society where it would take a chemist to discern the contents of cosmetics, it would take a pharmacist to comprehend the contents of patent medicines, and an engineer of some great skill to interpret the assembly instructions for a child's model car kit. All of those situations are bad enough, but the fact is that before the consumer can even come to that problem he has to get through the contract. While at some other point I hope we can seek solutions and adopt solutions to the problem of what he does with the product when he gets it, today at least we can make the argument that that kind of language really doesn't have a place in consumer contracts.

Consumers in Ontario very rarely purchase products such as nuclear power stations, so I can see no reason why the contracts for everyday items and everyday services should be written in a language which draws on the same technical requirements in many cases.

While I fully support, as I suspect most members of the House do, the fine principle embodied and expressed in the resolution, I can also understand the difficulty our colleague from Simcoe Centre must have had when he considered whether he would put this to the House as a resolution or as a bill, and as he has alluded, it will be a difficult bill to write but one that I think has to be written. It will also be a very difficult bill to enforce without a lot of good will on the part of people writing these contracts.

However, that said, I would hope that, regardless of the outcome of any vote today, the most excellent Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Grossman) will read the record of Hansard today and on his own initiative, as he so often does, bring forward the proper legislation so that sometime not too far down the road the members of this House can have the opportunity of debating legislation to simplify these contracts.

Finally, lest I be subject to criticism, I'm not supporting this bill because I think it would be nice to see a few lawyers on the unemployment lines as well as a few workers, but simply because the principle of the resolution is a sensible one.

Mr. Eaton: Mr. Speaker, I was prepared to rise and speak to the bill in support of my colleague, but after he came out with that hidden meaning of making work for lawyers, I begin to wonder because it's just like some of the contracts lawyers have drawn up—they've got hidden meanings in them. So it makes one wonder what they're getting at sometimes.

Mr. Warner: That's what he's up to.

Mr. Martel: You don't think they're going to do themselves in, do you?

Mr. Roy: We don't need two bills for lawyers in one day. We just passed one, Bill 59.

Mr. Eaton: However, I do support the principle that is being put forth by my colleague, not necessarily that legislation is required to do this, but that action be taken. I think the trend towards simplification of contracts is obviously one which will continue and one which is to be commended. It does not appear though that legislation of itself will do the job without incredible enforcement, and I think this was pointed out by the member. It's going to take a lot of good will on the part of people without a general enforcement of it to do it.

I think the most important thing to remember is that the consumer interest must come first, and it's not always met by simplification. Thus, for example, it's also important that contracts within a given industry bear a resemblance to each other and that as much uniformity as possible is put into the various types of contracts that are placed before the public.

It's similarly very important that information in sufficient quantity be of assistance to consumers in the contracts that they receive, that contracts can be drawn up too simply so that the information they do need is not before them.

In our Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations we have attempted to approach the subject in a broad, general way.

Rather than attempting to specify what may or may not be said in a contract, we have concentrated our efforts on the development of such general areas as warranty legislation, which will have a uniform effect regardless of the industry in question, and on the Business Practices Act, which will deal with improper practices of deceptive wording in contracts or approaches to contracts that may mislead the consumer.

In those areas which are specifically administered by the Business Practices Act, we've had a considerable success in having industry work to develop common and fairly simple forms. Thus, the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act is similar right across the province. My colleague did make reference to that particular form, and stated that on the bottom of it, it said, "Information below this line is not part of the contract." He said there was nothing below the line. It so happens that the portion that he had is the portion that's been agreed to by the ministry. However, it's a long form and the motor vehicle dealers do put some information of their own below it. That's why it says, "The information below is not part of the contract." [5:15]

I think we have had good co-operation from a number of industries in trying to make contracts simple. There are a few problems, and I think there are probably two major criticisms of the legislation. There is the fact that statutory requirements often make it almost impossible to word contracts simply while still complying with the requirements of the law, the law that we have sometimes created here; sometimes we get into committee, especially the lawyers in our committee, and we wrangle over a word or something and add three or four extra clauses in a sentence to clarify what a word means, when I think most of us recognize the common need.

In that regard, I think there was reference made to the insurance contracts put out by Royal Insurance and how clear they are. I would like to read into the record a couple of statements in these contracts that do show very clearly what is intended. For instance, they point out examples in their contracts: "Your son is playing baseball in your neighbour's backyard and he breaks a window with a wild throw; if you want the cost of replacing the window covered, it can be done under this policy."

However, with all that simplification, our legislation requires certain things at the back of it; so you go to the back page and you read something like this: "Statutory conditions misrepresentation. If a person applying for insurance falsely describes the property to the prejudice of the insurer or misrepresents or fraudulently omits to communicate any circumstances, that is material to be made known to the insurer in order to be able to judge of the risk to be undertaken, the contract is void as to any property and relations to which the misrepresentation or admission is material."

That's required to be put in there by our statute. So rather than bring in more legislation that would require them to put certain things in contracts, such as that does, we should be reviewing some of the legislation we already have which requires statements like that be put in. There is one sentence in the contract that covers about 10 lines. That's the kind of thing that has developed from the legalese inside our ministries, where they are trying to see that everything in a statement that is going out to the public is clarified.

The other thing I think we must guard against in these contracts is making sure, in telling the company that certain things should be done, we don't get away from using phrases that have become particular in their meaning in law, phrases that people recognize in contracts that are before them every day.

So, in general, I would say we certainly support the thrust of the resolution of my colleague. It is consistent with government policy and we should certainly encourage all industries or trades or associations to work towards developing uniform forms that are simple contracts that can be understood by the public and will protect the consumer.

Mr. Blundy: I am very pleased to arise in support of the resolution that has been placed before the House by the hon. member for Simcoe Centre.

I believe there is a possibility of us improving the situation for consumers. You know, we have always heard the dictum "read before signing." If the consumer is to be really protected, then he has to read it and he has to understand it. But I suggest that some of the words and some of the phrases that are used in contracts today and for many years past do discourage very much the people from reading before signing. So I think it is important that we try to put across not only to the government but to people in business and commerce and the province of Ontario that we want to protect the consumers and to do that they must be able to read and understand what is in the contract.

There are many technical terms in contracts and I don't believe these are essential for either the consumer or the person who is putting out the product. There are complicated legal phrases that certainly do not have to be used. I think common English could very well take their place.

The member for Simcoe Centre gave several very excellent examples of the language and phrases used in contracts. They are glowing examples of what we are trying to avoid in this resolution. Many of these words and expressions that are now used in contracts in general use in the province were words that were used in previous days. They were used by those who were educated in the use of contracts.

We are living in a new era—an era in which nearly every one of us, regardless of our position, our education or our income, is faced with such contracts—from mortgages, automobile and other loans, right down to buying a hair dryer. In all of these things, the ordinary consumer in the province is being faced with these contracts. I submit that they must be very discouraged when they remember that they have been told, "Read carefully before signing," and they come upon some of these very difficult phrases and technical terms.

Times have changed. Our ways of buying and of renting have changed. It's time that the legal jargon and technical phrases in consumers' contracts are also changed. I know that it may be very difficult to do this, and I know it can't be done overnight; it's going to take a little encouragement and, above all, some leadership to accomplish what the resolution of the member for Simcoe Centre has in mind. It is going to take leadership on behalf of the government; particularly, it is perhaps going to take leadership on the part of the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. It will be not too long before the examples that can be set, particularly by that ministry, will filter down.

I would think that many of these companies, with their long, wordy and difficult-to-understand contracts, probably could save a great deal of money in printing up a contract that will be so much less wordy.

The member for Kitchener gave us examples of how many terms of the contract, which are so essential to the buyer and the consumer, could be put in fewer sentences and words.

I must support the resolution, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that there will be some action taken on it because if we are truly to protect the consumers of Ontario, we must make it easy for them to protect themselves; and I submit that, under some of the present contracts that are to be signed, that is very difficult.

Mr. Foulds: On a point of order, if I might, Mr. Speaker: I believe the Attorney General would like to interrupt the proceedings, with which I fully agree.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to revert very briefly to bills for the introduction of two bills.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

LAND TITLES AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved first reading of Bill 33, An Act to amend the Land Titles Act.
Motion agreed to.

REGISTRY AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved first reading of Bill 34, An Act to amend the Registry Act.
Motion agreed to.

WRITING OF CONSUMER CONTRACTS (continued)

Mr. Foulds: I rise to speak on the resolution before us with some mixed feelings. I support the aims and objectives of the resolution because I think it is important, as a number of speakers have indicated previously, that both seller and buyer understand the terms of the agreement that they come into.

However, I do find it strange that the lawyers of the province and of the Legislature have taken such a kicking, if you like, in the Legislature today. I find it strange that legislators themselves have taken such a beating in the Legislature during the debate on this resolution. I can understand fully why the hon. member for Simcoe Centre has introduced a resolution rather than a bill because, if he had introduced the bill, I suspect that it would have suffered from all of the faults of a contract that he decries. I suspect that is one of the difficulties that faced him when he came up with this idea.

I found it strange that—

Hon. B. Stephenson: You're supposed to say "passing strange".

Mr. Foulds: Passing strange. I found it strange that so many members of the Legislature felt compelled, not only to condemn business for the contracts that are afloat in the province, but also to condemn themselves. It's almost as if we had, in the Legislature, a massive public confession of guilt. I frankly don't want to participate in that. If I have confessions to make I'll make them privately, I think.

I think we must admit that in any contractual arrangement, no matter what it entails in terms of sale, there must be some precision of language, some precision in the terms that both buyer and seller agree to. What I find a little worrisome is that in the debate that has taken place there has been no recognition of the necessity for precision. If we devise contracts or terms of sale that are so simplified that the words are ambiguous and vacuous, we will get into more problems than we already have.

Earlier in the day we had a long involved debate involving Bill 59. Many of the speakers referred to the "real world" as if there were a single real world out there that we speak of. There are, in fact, a number of real worlds.

With reference to this bill, we have to admit that every profession and every endeavour has its own specialized language. If we, for example, are engaged in buying or selling an automobile, there are certain precise descriptions of the mechanics of that particular consumer good, and a precise relationship between its moving parts. How do we design consumer protection that fits that and fits a box of corn flakes? I don't know how you do it with one simplified single contract. Engineering has its specialized language of necessity. Drafting has its specialized language of necessity.

[5:30]

I would suggest that probably the activity that receives most attention by the general readership of the province and by the populace generally is sports. Sports activity in all of its areas has its own precise meanings for its own language. For example, in baseball we talk about a foul ball. There is a specialized meaning to that expression that is quite different from the meaning of the term as taken in general parlance. We talk about icing in hockey which has the specialized meaning of the momentum of the puck down the ice and it being touched or not touched for certain lengths of time. That meaning is quite different and quite precise but different from the term icing generally, which either has to do with frozen water or sweetness on top of a cake.

We talk in tennis, for example, about scores like one or two love, and love there has a very precise and specialized meaning.

An hon. member: It usually means hate.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Don't talk about one or two love. You haven't played tennis lately.

Mr. Foulds: I have never played tennis, but it has a quite different and specialized meaning from the usual four that arise as a result of the original four Greek words that have to do with that particular activity. I would say there is a little bit of a danger that we could be jumping on a bandwagon, when we talk about simplified language, of getting into ambiguous and vacuous language. While I would support the aim and the objective, I really have yet to be convinced that the member has come up with a practical solution so that if this Legislature passes this resolution there will be immediate and responsible response from the government side.

He has said he would like this resolution to act as a prod. The word "prod" itself has a number of specialized and different meanings that the member didn't go into. I point out to the House the particular bon mot with which the hon. member concluded his address which was that when a buyer buys a gold mine, he hopes the buyer will actually get the gold mine and not the shaft.

From those words themselves, the definition of a gold mine is extremely difficult in terms of grades of ore, where the veins happen to run, in terms of geography and in terms of depth. "Shaft" in that context has a deliberately ambiguous meaning, a deliberately double meaning which I think we should avoid at all times in consumer protection legislation and consumer contracts throughout the province.

Mr. Rotenberg: I rise to support the motion and I commend the member for Simcoe Centre for bringing forth the motion. I do so for one reason, because it seems it's one of the few private members' motions that has seemed to receive unanimous support around the House. But also I commend him for bringing this forward as a motion and not as a bill.

I have been listening to the speeches around the House and I find myself most in agreement with the last speech of the member for Port Arthur, and that made me instantly want to reconsider my position.

Mr. Lawlor: He is perfectly right.

Mr. Nixon: Don't you always agree with the last person?

Mr. Rotenberg: Had this been brought forward as a bill, I probably would have had great difficulty in supporting it.

Mr. Lawlor: In reading it.

Mr. Rotenberg: Yes, in reading it and supporting it. A bill which tried to solve this problem for the total consumer industry, let alone for just a wee bit of the consumer industry, would not only be very difficult to draft but before we even get into the bill stage, before we consider legislation, there has to be an awful lot of research done as to what effect any legislation would have on various areas of the consumer industry.

I also want to echo the warnings by the member for Port Arthur. We have to be very careful in not going too far the other way, because consumer contracts are legal documents, and whereas some legal documents have too much verbiage, whereas some legal documents may be loaded in favour of the vendor—as some are—legal documents are there for the protection of both sides, the consumer and the vendor. If a document is written ambiguously in non-legalese, if a document is written in such a way that lawyers in court will have trouble interpreting it, I think it would be a great disservice to the consuming public.

Mr. Deans: The problems are the lawyers. The lawyers are the problems.

Mr. Rotenberg: Sometimes they're the problem—

Mr. Deans: Let's be perfectly frank about it; the lawyers create the problems.

Mr. Pope: Oh, no, not unless they are from Kilmarnock.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, lawyers sometimes create the problems. As the member for Wentworth knows, lawyers also do sometimes assist in putting out fires, and they are legal fires, so he would have some knowledge of that as well.

Mr. Deans: They set a few, too.

Mr. Rotenberg: So we have to be very careful before we draft legislation. But this doesn't take away from the principle that the member for Simcoe Centre has brought forward, and it doesn't take away from the fact that we should be adopting the motion and giving consideration to it.

The member for Kitchener earlier brought up the matter of insurance policies and the work we have been doing on the select committee on company law. Certainly in insurance, as in other fields, there is room to improve the language in a contract, not only in the statutory conditions, as the parliamentary assistant has brought forward, but simply in the total language of the contract.

I don't want to give a commercial here, but I do commend the Royal Insurance Company for the new type of contracts it has brought forward. I think a number of members have the contracts before them. The parliamentary assistant to the minister, the member for Middlesex, read out from some of the simple language and read out from some of the legalese. I think the Royal Insurance has come to a very good compromise and a very good solution for this problem, because in a way it has the best of both worlds. It has given, in a non-contractual part of the form, a simple explanation that the public can understand. Yet it has in the back page, the required conditions, the statutory conditions, the legalese which are necessary to protect, yes, the Royal Insurance Company, which puts out the contract, but also to protect the consumer who purchases insurance, the person who wants to or may eventually get to court, the person who may have a legal argument.

There has to be—as the member for Port Arthur said—precise language in at least part of the document so that if there is a dispute as to what the contract meant, the lawyers who drew it up in the first place will be able to sort it out, and if it ever gets that far, the courts will be able to adjudicate as to who is correct, who is wrong, who has to pay whom.

I think, really, the purpose of this motion is a message to the government, a message specifically to the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Relations. I think there are some industries and some ministries whose contracts can use some clarification. Some of them are statutory conditions where legislation may have to be amended; some of them are simply the contracts which these industries use, and a redrafting for clarification would be necessary.

There are probably some industries where there will be required legislation, or change of legislation, in order to make those contracts reasonably readable and to bring them into conformity with present-day practices. Probably the vast majority of industries simply need a nudge to do the sort of thing the Royal Insurance Company has done. I think it is within the purview of the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations to look into the various types of contracts, to look into the various industries, and to bring forward legislation where necessary, but in most cases to give the industries this nudge, this prod to try to bring their contracts into understandable form without giving up the necessary legal protection to both the vendor and consumers.

For these reasons I will support the motion and hope that the members of the House will do likewise.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lakeshore, for about three and a half minutes.

Mr. Lawlor: The passion for the meticulous has dried all the sap and ardour out of my veins. That's the whole history of law.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It obviously flowed to some of your colleagues.

Mr. Lawlor: There are two kinds. As in most things, there has to be some balance in this. Every profession, every group and every self-interested little clique in the country, no matter what it is—the country club in golf or whatever area; women purling in a knitting contest, in any other area—each area, particularly professional associations, has its high priests, its witch doctors and its mumbo jumbo. They enter incantations in the night and feed one another the pabulum of tricky words. That's to be understood.

On the other hand, there is the sloppiness that goes with most of our speech where we don't say precisely what we mean, mostly because we don't know precisely what we mean and therefore adopt some kind of vacuity, blathering around. If the layman were permitted to draft most of the legislation in this House, because of the monumental lawsuits, the estimates of the Attorney General would have to be expanded at least 12 times in order to provide enough accommodation for courts and judges.

I just want to say a word at the end of this debate, giving commendation to the professional draftsmen bringing law before us in this House. I think they do an exquisite job, because most members of this House understand the legislation that's set out before us and I would defy many of them to be able to boil it down to simple terms.

Simplicity is not something one starts with. It comes at the end, after great ardour and enormous struggle. You boil yourself down in terms of purification to some form of simplicity. It's a state of mind which I hope never to reach.

Mr. G. Taylor: I thank my colleagues in this House for such great support for my resolution. I'd like to speak on the member from Lakeshore's comments, but he talked in so much legalese I'm having difficulty in understanding him, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Foulds: No, it's just the richness of language that you don't understand.

Mr. G. Taylor: I'm so pleased also that my resolution brought such soul-cleansing into the House this afternoon. Every organization and body needs that from time to time, and if it's brought just that to this House, I'm gratified.

The other part one might say—and I hope some people will accept this in jest—if you were wondering why I introduced a resolution and not legislation, in my calculations of the number of participants in this House there are 22 lawyers, and you know what it takes to veto legislation. I'm not so sure I would succeed in bringing to my side 22 lawyers. The other grouping—there are 14 teachers in this House and I'm not so sure they would agree with the motives of 22 lawyers.

Mr. Foulds: I thought there were 17 in our caucus alone.

Mr. G. Taylor: So that the resolution was the more honoured form to bring this in.

Mr. Roy: How many LLDs?

Mr. G. Taylor: There are a few QCs who still have wet documents, Mr. Speaker, and I'm not sure they would understand my resolution.

Mr. Roy: It is a shiny gown.

Mr. G. Taylor: Once the ink dries on the QC of the member for Ottawa East then he may comment on it.

The other thing—and I comment upon it as a prod and a catalyst—is that there are some organizations that have gone forward with this type of contract, being Royal Insurance, Mutual Insurance, and Citibank. There is presently one state in the United States, the state of New York, that has the legislation in place and going forward, but it's receiving, as you can imagine, the greatest amount of challenge from the lawyers in that area.

I heard my friend from Port Arthur there comment upon language. Of course, we put language in and he talked about love and items such as that. Of course, when you put your contract together, you hope that when the words are put in the words have some meaning pertaining to that type of object that you're contracting.

If he's discussing tennis and love, you'd think that would go together with tennis and he would understand the type of love. If he was into some type of body shop and contracting with love there, he would know the style of love and the meaning that might have.

And if he was going to a body shop that has to do with cars he would understand that they are not in love with him for wrecking the car. So the type of love that would be inserted in any one of those contracts would be, I am sure, understandable.

My friend from Lakeshore comments that I was whistling in the moonlight.

[5:45]

Mr. Foulds: You can't even tell the difference.

Mr. G. Taylor: The difficulty with whistling in the moonlight on contracts that are presently in the consumer field today is that they are not always playing the same tune; the whistling is not always there. I had hoped this resolution would bring some tune to the contracts that are in the consumer field so that at least those receiving them on both sides of the bargain would have some harmonious music in what is being put forward to them so that the discordant vibrations, after they have discovered what the words mean, would not lead them to slow up the orchestra and stop playing altogether and head for the courts into the arms of those lawyers who would naturally charge them large fees to discover what is in the contracts.

Mr. Foulds: A bad analogy.

Mr. G. Taylor: If the member for Lakeshore comments further I could use up more minutes, Mr. Speaker, but how many do I have left?

Mr. Speaker: We cannot vote before 5:50 p.m.

Mr. G. Taylor: With that I thank all the members and my colleagues. I hope they will support my resolution and that it will bring some semblance of the problem to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Grossman) that he will prepare some legislation in the near future; or maybe no legislation, just the resolution will bring to the people of this province the idea that there can be words simplistic enough in nature to put in contracts to ease the problem.

FOODLANDS PROTECTION ACT

Sufficient members having objected by rising, a vote was not taken on Bill 12.

WRITING OF CONSUMER CONTRACTS

Mr. Speaker: Mr. G. Taylor had moved private member's resolution No. 2.

Resolution concurred in.

ANSWER TO WRITTEN QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be allowed to table the answer to question 13 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix, page 902.)

The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario entered the chamber of the Legislative Assembly and took her seat upon the throne.

ROYAL ASSENT

Hon. P. M. McGibbon: Pray be seated.

Mr. Speaker: May it please Your Honour, the Legislative Assembly of the province has, at its present sitting thereof, passed a certain bill to which, in the name of and on behalf of the said Legislative Assembly, I respectfully request Your Honour's assent.

Clerk Assistant: The following is the title of the bill to which Your Honour's assent is prayed:

Bill 59, An Act to reform the Law respecting Property Rights and Support Obligations between Married Persons and in other Family Relationships.

Clerk of the House: In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor doth assent to this bill.

Mr. Speaker: May it please Your Honour, we, Her Majesty's most dutiful and faithful subjects of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario in session assembled, approach Your Honour with sentiments of unfeigned devotion and loyalty to Her Majesty's person and government, and humbly beg to present for Your Honour's acceptance, a bill entitled An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain additional sums of money for the Public Service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978.

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor doth thank Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, accept their benevolence and assent to this bill in Her Majesty's name.

The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor was pleased to retire from the chamber.

Mr. Deans: I hope you spend that money more wisely than you spent the rest.

Mr. Renwick: He said it's all gone.

Mr. Deans: It's all gone? Did you dribble it away again?

Mr. Speaker: I would remind members that the adjournment today is until 2 of the clock, Tuesday afternoon, March 28, pursuant to the order passed on March 9.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See page 901)

The answer to a written question was tabled as follows:

13. Mr. Peterson—Inquiry of the ministry: Would the ministry provide a list of all independent studies commissioned by the government in the fiscal year 1977 as well as the names of all personnel and companies employed and their method of payment, per diem rates and total costs of the studies to the government? [Tabled March 2nd, 1978]

Answer by the Chairman of Management Board (Mr. Auld):

It is noted that the question refers to "fiscal year 1977." If this is intended to mean 1977-78, the information is not available since fiscal year 1977-78 will not close until March 31, 1978. If the question is concerned with 1976-77, then it is essentially identical to the question asked by the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden), on November 21, 1977 (question 46, order paper 37, 1977 fall session). Therefore, the same answer would apply, as tabled on December 8, 1977 (Legislature of Ontario Debates 73, p. 2778).

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1978

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTRY

DEATH OF ADRIENNE PAQUETTE

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House of the completion of my ministry's investigation into the management of the case of Adrienne Paquette, a victim of child abuse, who died in her own home and who had been in the care and under the supervision of the Ottawa Children's Aid Society.

The ministry's staff has now completed the review and forwarded to me a report which included their findings and recommendations. For the information of the members and the public, I am today making these findings and recommendations available along with this statement. The findings have identified a number of concerns about the society's case management and supervisory practices, its policies and procedures and the adequacy of decision-making and services provided to the family. The recommendations propose a number of specific actions to be taken in order to address the concerns identified.

I see no basis in this report to justify the ordering of a judicial inquiry. The facts of the case are known and are agreed upon between the ministry and the society. The need for further action and the nature of that action are clearly identified in the findings and recommendations of the report. The most important aspect of the matter is now to ensure, with the co-operation and the assistance of the society, that appropriate steps are taken.

Following the completion of the review, a special meeting of the board of directors of the society was held at which the findings and recommendations were presented by the director of child welfare and the two staff members who conducted the review. I believe that meeting has laid the groundwork for an analysis by the society of the report's implications for its services and for a commitment to the resolution of the problems identified. The board has appointed an ad hoc committee to work with ministry staff to this end. With this commitment to joint action by the ministry and the board, I am confident that everything possible will be done to prevent the occurrence of any similar circumstances in the future.

Mr. S. Smith: Can I have a copy of that? I don't have a copy.

FOREST REGENERATION

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to inform the House of an important conference of forest regeneration taking place in Thunder Bay this week, beginning tomorrow. I have invited more than 150 representatives from the forest industry, the universities and the Ministry of Natural Resources—and I might say I would be glad to have the official critics of the two opposition parties—

Mr. Reid: Now you ask.

Mr. Foulds: That's a little late.

Hon. F. S. Miller: —to meet and discuss all aspects of closing the gap between the number of trees harvested annually in Ontario and the number required for future use and enjoyment.

Mr. MacDonald: You're 40 years too late.

Mr. Foulds: It's not two for one.

Hon. F. S. Miller: As members know, my ministry estimates that of the licensed area cut over each year approximately two-thirds is adequately regenerated, leaving one-third which is not.

Mr. Foulds: That is not what your ministry estimates.

Hon. F. S. Miller: While that is an improvement over what it used to be, it's still not good enough—

Mr. Foulds: You are right.

Mr. S. Smith: Two for one!

Hon. F. S. Miller: —nor will it be good enough for the thousands of Ontario residents, in the south as well as in the north, who depend on trees for jobs, recreation and the well-being of their community.

We are at a critical point. We must satisfy ever-increasing demands for timber and fibre and yet guarantee that our forests will flourish. The participants at this Thunder Bay working conference have been asked in advance to come prepared to identify problems, present their views, talk frankly about possible solutions, and come to an agreement or consensus on certain basic realities and what should be done to close the regeneration gap.

I have also taken steps to ensure that what goes on at Thunder Bay is well publicized by inviting the news media in Ontario to send representatives to all general sessions and the sessions of the 14 working groups.

Mr. Reid: If you planted as many trees as you have news conferences, we wouldn't have any problems.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Afterwards, there will be briefing sessions and plenty of opportunity to question delegates. I will also participate in the conference through its three days.

I expect that this will be a productive, exciting coming-together of experts who know our forests. These people collectively share more than 2,000 years of experience managing and working with our forest resources. I am confident they will be able to provide positive ideas to enable all those responsible to do the best job possible in managing our forests now and for the future.

ONTARIO ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, earlier today I deposited with the clerk copies of the second annual report of the Ontario Advisory Council on the Physically Handicapped. It is not a statutory requirement that the report be tabled in the Legislature, but I did want to bring it to the attention of all the members of the House. The council, as you know, is made up of a group of very dedicated individuals who have done excellent work in bringing the concerns and aspirations of the physically handicapped to our attention. I am very happy to be associated with the council and want to express my appreciation for the outstanding job that they have done.

HYDRO CORRIDORS

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege. The hon. member for Halton-Burlington (Mr. Reed) was quoted, both on CBC radio and in the Hamilton Spectator of March 17, as saying that the decision reconfirming the Bradley-to-Milton transmission line "was not made by the cabinet but was an informal decision made by the Minister of Energy."

The member, as quoted in the Hamilton Spectator, said: "A couple of ministers apparently haven't heard a thing about it. I have reason to believe there was never any formal presentation to cabinet on this matter. I suspect Mr. Baetz discussed it with Darcy McKeough and was told to go to blazes."

Mr. Roy: Right on.

Mr. Reid: That's a pretty safe bet.

Mr. Reed: You are right sometimes, Darcy.

Mr. S. Smith: Was Darcy ever that moderate? When did Darcy ever speak that moderately?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I continue the quote of the member for Halton-Burlington. He said: "He's a very naive politician."

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Ontario does not function in such an irresponsible, arbitrary and ad hoc manner as the member has suggested.

Mr. Peterson: When did you change?

Mr. Bolan: How is the hot seat there, Reuben?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I wish the record to note that the decision on this transmission line route was reconfirmed by the Ontario cabinet subsequent to my meeting with interested citizens' groups on March 6. This formal decision taken by cabinet reconfirmed earlier decisions taken by cabinet on the same transmission route. For any member to suggest publicly that this decision was taken in any other way is the height of irresponsibility, in my estimation.

Mr. Roy: Reuben, did he say you had an LLD?

Mr. Reed: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister is referring to a statement in his letter to the ICG where he referred to the fact that he had discussed the question with his cabinet colleagues, because that is the area of the letter to which I was referring. Information came to me from the ICG that some checking had been done, and certainly not all of the cabinet ministers were aware that contact had been made with cabinet.

Mr. Foulds: They were sleeping through that part of the cabinet meeting.

LAND SALE BY FORMER PC PRESIDENT

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of privilege. I refer to a story and headline in the early edition of the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, March 28, which reads: "Order by McKeough helps Former PC President sell Money-Losing Site." There are several inaccuracies in the story, and I am consulting my solicitors.

Mrs. Campbell: Did it help him?

ORAL QUESTIONS

INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. S. Smith: A question for the Treasurer, Mr. Speaker: With regard to his budget statement of 1976, does he recall, when he raised premiums for OHIP by about 45 per cent then, making the following statement in budget paper B in 1976:

"Premiums will now generate approximately 28 per cent of the total financing of OHIP. This is a more appropriate level than the 23 per cent raised in 1975-76 and is a suitable long-run norm to maintain as health care costs increase in future years."

Does he recall that statement? What was it based on, and why has he changed his mind?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, honestly I don't recall that particular statement. Although most of the words in my budgets are indelibly engraved on my heart, I don't frankly recall that.

Mr. Reid: Or don't want to recall.

Mr. Foulds: Is it engraved on your brain?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: However, I would say to the hon. member that the committee on health costs, the Taylor committee, recommended approximately a third and I was guided by that advice.

Mr. S. Smith: Supplementary: The Taylor committee made its recommendation based on two documents, a 1973 Ontario Council of Health report, and the 1976 budget statement of the Treasurer. Since it obviously came three years after the OCH report, they must have taken it into consideration. How can the Treasurer now justify moving to 34 per cent when he already said that 28 per cent was a legitimate goal? Does he agree that if he stuck to his original 28 per cent long-term goal—which is the statement he made in 1976—he would only need to raise OHIP premiums, given this year's estimate, approximately nine per cent and not 37.5 per cent?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I doubt the member's arithmetic.

Mr. S. Smith: If the Treasurer doubts the arithmetic, I shall now read to him. Is he familiar with the fact that OHIP insured services include in the estimates, practitioners, ambulance services, hospitals, extended care and home care, totalling in this year's estimates $3,289,002,600? Does he agree that 28 per cent of that total is $920,921,000, and that he is generating, by his increase, $199 million more than he would need according to that guideline, which he himself assured the people of this province two years ago was fair and reasonable?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Let me repeat myself. I said, apparently, in 1976, that that was an appropriate norm—

Mr. S. Smith: Long-term.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—a long-term norm. What I had been guided by was the report, as I have indicated, of the committee on health costs, which recommended about a third. I think we can play with percentages in any way we like if we wish to. The Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) points out that in terms of his total budget the cost met by premiums is something in the neighbourhood of 27 or 28 per cent. There is also a figure, which is used from time to time, that the cost to those who actually pay premiums as opposed to those—the 1,800,000 or so people who do not pay premiums—is in the neighbourhood of 47 or 48 per cent. But I would say now, irrespective of what I may have said in 1976, that about a third is an approximate figure and in my judgement, would be about right.

Mr. S. Smith: Would the Treasurer then admit that the numbers he is drawing out of a hat have no relationship, either to his own original estimate nor to the Taylor committee—which only based its statement on his original statement—and the preceding statement, which presumably it took into consideration? Will he now admit that he is looking for some place to raise an additional $200 million of revenue and picked on the OHIP premiums to do it, because he knows that people are worried about health and because it is a high-profile ministry behind which he can hide the fiscal irresponsibility which put him in this box in the first place?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I don't think it is fair to say that the Taylor committee relied only on a statement I may have made in 1973 or 1976. Those six or seven members of the committee went into all aspects of health costs and of premiums; they did an exhaustive study. I doubt very much that they only looked at my particular words of advice in 1976 or the view of someone in 1973. Therefore, ergo, the Leader of the Opposition's question is based on a completely wrong assumption, like so much else that he says.

[2:15]

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary, the hon. member for Renfrew North.

Mr. Conway: I would like to have the Treasurer reiterate whether or not he is prepared at this point to abandon the principle which he stated very clearly in his budget paper of 1976, that premiums would be expected to pay no more than 28 per cent of insured health services and that this would be an acceptable long-term norm. Is he saying today that 28 per cent is no longer an acceptable long-term norm, and that in fact 33 per cent is his new long-term norm?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, obviously if that's what I said in the 1978 budget, then the member has the benefit of my latest thinking.

An hon. member: Which changes yearly.

Mr. Roy: We can't rely on the Treasurer's word. He changes his mind from one year to the next.

QUEBEC POLICY ON CONSTRUCTION HIRING

Mr. S. Smith: A question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the Quebec government is proposing to bar qualified Ontario construction workers from working in Quebec by regulation 77-587 section 12.14—to take effect in July, 1978—while, as the minister knows, Ontario permits qualified construction workers from Quebec to work here, which is only proper; will the minister indicate whether efforts to preserve the traditional common labour market in the Ottawa-Hull and Cornwall-Montreal areas might result in modifications to the proposed Quebec regulations? What is the present status of the negotiations which have been going on?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I would remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the barring of Ontario workers from construction jobs in the province of Quebec is not something of recent origin. In actual fact, the government before the PQ government brought in the kind of legislation which encouraged this activity; and indeed there was a great deal of movement which prevented much of the interchange which had been traditional for Ontario construction workers along the Ontario-Quebec border.

However, there is a certain refinement of that activity going on at this time, which is becoming, I think, much more obvious, and obviously much more painful to Ontario workers in a time of high unemployment in the construction industry. As a result of the concerns which have been expressed by members of the construction unions, by the Construction Industry Review Panel, by members of the unions in the Ottawa-Hull area and in Cornwall, we have indeed had a number of meetings with our opposite numbers in the province of Quebec—the latest one having been about 10 days ago—in an attempt to resolve this difficulty.

Mr. Speaker, I would have to say that I am not at this point hopeful we will be able to persuade the government of the province of Quebec to modify the regulation. I am sufficiently optimistic to hope that we can do something which will circumvent this problem, but I would have to say quite honestly at this point that I do not see a change in the drafting of that regulation as a solution to the problem. Therefore, we are moving on a different tack in order to attempt to solve the problem for the benefit of the workers in the province of Ontario.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary, may I ask a brief, two-part question: One, what is this different tack; is the minister at liberty to share this with the members of this House? The second question: since all of us realize that retaliation is not the proper way to build a country, is the minister considering launching a legal challenge in concert with the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) against the constitutionality of the regulation 77-587 section 12.14 that I have brought to her attention?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I would have to say that as soon as I feel that I am at liberty I would be pleased to share with the members of the House the route we are considering following. I would also remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that, indeed, labour matters have been traditionally considered to be of provincial jurisdiction rather than federal jurisdiction, and whether indeed there is any challenge to the constitutional argument in this situation is something which we have explored. We have not as yet received an opinion from any of the learned gentlemen in this area which would give us any feeling of security that an argument on constitutional grounds would be a winning argument for the province of Ontario.

I would like to say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition, however, that in spite of having been urged by the now leader of the third party to draft retaliatory legislation, I have resisted this impulse, and will continue to do so—

Mr. Kerrio: Shameful.

Hon. B. Stephenson:—because I really do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that balkanizing Canada is the way in which we can unite Canada.

Mr. Martel: Your government didn't tell Sun Life to stay at home.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary: Recognizing the difficulty of the problem and recognizing as well the fact that in the spirit of this country retaliatory legislation is not the answer, would the minister advise, since we have been raising this problem since 1971, why we can't work out some reciprocal arrangement with the province of Quebec, since we have had a problem in the Cornwall-Ottawa-Hull area since 1971? Why is it we can't work out reciprocal agreements with them, especially in light of the fact that the benefit has been mostly one way as Hull workers were working in Ottawa? They are starting to get tough now when there is more construction on the Quebec side than there is on the Ontario side.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is a delightful suggestion but I would remind the hon. member that it takes two to reciprocate. We have been trying since 1970-71 to develop some kind of reciprocal arrangement and it has not been possible to do so.

Mr. Roy: In view of the suggestion by my leader, has the minister received a constitutional opinion as to challenging the legislation in the courts? If she has, who is the author of that opinion; because we are somewhat suspicious at times of opinions coming from certain ministries, and I won't be personal?

Mr. Speaker: That question has already been asked and answered.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes. Although I would support consistently the value of the opinions which arrive from the Ministry of the Attorney General and others, it was an independent, external opinion.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: We got it from Ron Basford and we are suspicious of it.

Mr. Roy: He's never wrong.

NICKEL MINING

Mr. Martel: I have a question of the Minister of Natural Resources: After the report prepared by the Ministry of Natural Resources, entitled The Ontario Metal Mining Industry, which was tabled in February, 1977 and which warned, "unless the markets improve rapidly in the near future it is difficult to see how cuts in the Sudbury mine output can be avoided"—to which the government failed to respond; what action is the government prepared to take now as a result of the Mohide report, entitled Towards a Nickel Policy for the Province of Ontario, wherein he recommends: "Encourage, through special Ontario income and mining tax adjustments, the adaptation and use of currently idle nickel refining capacity in Ontario and Alberta to refine part or all of the significant proportion of Ontario mine outputs of nickel which still goes to Wales and Norway in semi-refined forms for refining, so as to create jobs in Canada?"

Hon. F. S. Miller: In the mid-term break, this report received a fair amount of press. There were one or two conclusions apparently reached from it. One was that the Treasurer had not accepted the advice of my ministry as shown in that report. I think that was a misunderstanding. The very authors of that report and myself advocated to the Treasurer the kinds of policies he adopted in the budget. There is quite a difference between penalizing offshore processing and encouraging processing at home.

Mr. Laughren: Oh stop it.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We were penalizing offshore processing. We have strong encouragement for processing at home. The committee that studied the problems, the select committee of this House, amongst its recommendations did point out that we should encourage, wherever possible, the maximum employment of miners within Canada.

I have to say we are currently at a stage in the mining industry where any capital required for home processing is not available. Section 113 of the Act, which prohibits the export without our permission, will be used, whenever it is feasible, to produce and process those ores at home; it is our opinion that currently it is not.

Mr. Martel: Supplementary: Is it not a fact that there is excess capacity for refining purposes, both in Alberta and in Ontario, for nickels being exploited from the Sudbury basin; that those avenues have not been utilized but rather we have shipped the ores to Wales and Norway for refining, as opposed to using the capacity which exists in Canada?

Hon. F. S. Miller: One of the processing plants—I think it's the one out west—doesn't have the ability to extract the precious metals. The other one may or may not have, I'm not sure, but the fact is it is not geared up to handle Falconbridge ore, as I'm told; and in fact I was told, and I believe the committee was told, that the current investment requirement would be $30 million or more to allow it to process these ores.

Obviously, the hon. member and I share one common objective—whether we agree upon the way of getting there or not remains to be seen—and that is to protect the most jobs we can in Canada, the maximum number.

Mr. Foulds: Maybe create a few too.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We believe, currently, by judicious use of section 113 and the continuation of some processing offshore, which allows that metal to enter the European market—don't forget that, metal could be supplied by other mines in other parts of the world—that in fact the maximum number of jobs are being protected here at home in Canada.

Mr. Reid: Supplementary: That's the first justification I've heard of the $5 million gift to them. Can the minister explain if there was any commitment by Falconbridge or Inco that that $5 million credit the government is giving to them for their offshore refining in Norway and Wales is going to go into capital investment in Ontario or in Canada?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has assumed it comes from Inco and Falconbridge. The $5 million appraisal made by the Ministry of Treasury was based upon all of the allowances and all of the changes in the mining taxes mentioned in the budget, not just the offshore processing allowance. Right now, in the last year, I don't think that would have had any effect upon the total revenues to the province. It would be in the future that it would have.

We are simply looking very carefully at the world markets, as the hon. member's leader said we should—I recall this very clearly in the opening debate—the fact we hadn't allowed matte to be exported in 1972 was—

Mr. S. Smith: Not to be refined elsewhere; only if it was to be used in the unrefined state.

Hon. F. S. Miller: All right. The fact remains that the world markets for electrolytically-refined metals are shrinking as these other forms take their place. I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition would agree with me there.

Mr. S. Smith: Not to be refined elsewhere.

Hon. F. S. Miller: The fact remains that very low cost electricity is being used in Norway for the processing of the Falconbridge ores, electricity which Ontario currently does not have available, and which would cost more if it were available in Ontario. We believe that the combination of lower offshore costs and entry to the foreign markets is protecting jobs within the nickel industry in Ontario right now.

Mr. Laughren: Supplementary: Could the minister give us any reasons, other than self-serving or bureaucratic ones, as to why that Mohide report was not made available to the select committee on the layoffs, in view of the fact that the report was dated December, 1977? While the minister is on his feet, perhaps he could explain to us if he understands that there is unused capacity in the mineral refining industry in Ontario today?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Of course there's some unused capacity; the fact is that every ore requires a different processing technique, and I'm sure the hon. member knows that.

Mr. Renwick: Do you know that?

Hon. F. S. Miller: As for the report, I can assure the hon. member that if it was dated December, 1977, it was because it was in typewritten form then and it certainly wasn't even read by me at that point. Secondly, was it available for the committee? I read the transcript of that committee, because Dr. Mohide was present at the committee, and I read the comments made by Mr. Geddes-Brooks, is it?—

Mr. Martel: Webster.

Hon. F. S. Miller: —who referred to that report in the context and said that this report was available and had been examined by the committee. That was my understanding.

Mr. S. Smith: Supplementary: Does the minister not agree that it is important to draw a distinction between allowing exemptions to section 113 for the purpose of exporting into those markets which can use matte directly in the steel-making process, and therefore are going to shop around for such matte, as opposed to those possible markets that intend to further refine the matte outside the country? Does the minister not agree that it's important to draw that distinction and to allow exemptions mainly in markets which otherwise could use unrefined matte from some other place, but not to further refine it outside the country?

[2:30]

Hon. F. S. Miller: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the hon. Leader of the Opposition, providing that there was not an alternative source of the raw material for that particular refinery. It happens that the Wales' operations of Inco can now process ores from other locations in the world; and the Falconbridge overseas operations can also.

Mr. Laughren: Where have you been all these years, Frank?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Therefore, we're faced with other willing suppliers of the raw materials for those two refineries for entry to the European market. I still say it is much better to keep the seven to 10 jobs-per-ton of capacity through the mining process from going overseas, than to try to get back the one in the refining that is now overseas; because it's that kind of a ratio, a 10-to-one ratio.

Mr. Speaker: We'll have one final supplementary from the hon. member for Sudbury East.

Mr. Martel: In view of the fact that the platinum group metals have been extracted for over 50 years and that nowhere in Canada, as yet, do we refine any of that, what action is the government prepared to undertake to ensure that those platinum group metals are finally refined in Canada?

Hon. F. S. Miller: For a change the member and I are going to agree. I think those should be refined in Canada. I have asked for an explanation as to the amount of investment that will be required and the number of jobs that would come back. I'm told that in the range of 50 to 60 jobs could come back to the Sudbury area or some other area. I would very much like to see the platinum group metals refined in Ontario and I intend to serve notice—and have unofficially—that I need that explanation before I'll be prepared to continue exporting.

Mr. Laughren: We've lost over 1,000 jobs at Falconbridge refining and you dabble with 60 jobs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sudbury East has a second question.

AUTO PACT

Mr. Martel: I have a question of the Treasurer, in view of the Premier's (Mr. Davis) absence today. Regarding the announcement by American Motors that 1,000 employees face two months' layoff beginning in June, and some 350 will be terminated until such time as the Jeep line of production reaches the desired production rate, has the government of Ontario done any analysis to determine the production level which has to be achieved in order to restore the lost employment? How long will it take to reach the production level, which I think W. S. Pickett said would have to reach 70,000 or 80,000 to guarantee all the jobs which are being lost? Maybe I should direct that to the Minister of Industry and Tourism.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Or the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, I don't believe we have done such an analysis. My understanding is, of course, that American Motors have done so and they are very confident that the future market for the Jeep product is such that with the product being made exclusively at the Brampton plant the total work force will come back to what it is at the present time, and perhaps even surpass that.

Mr. Martel: In how long?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: No, we have not done a total analysis of that subject.

Mr. Martel: A supplementary: In view of the Chrysler layoffs in Windsor and in view of the American Motors situation in Brampton, what steps has the government of Ontario taken by way of direct communication with the industry—the four producers—to insist on a fair share of auto production on first-line products for Canadian plants, as opposed to Jeeps and vans as is the case in those two areas?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I believe that certainly Jeeps and vans and what-have-you would be considered first-line, as compared to others; unless, of course, the member is referring only to the larger automobiles and family automobiles.

Mr. Martel: Cars and trucks.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: In discussions I had with American Motors, their feeling is that they are not able to capture the size of the automobile market that they would obviously like to have, and they could see a better future for their company, and more employment, by moving into the Jeep line as their most prominent product.

In the case of Chrysler, we are going to be meeting with the Chrysler people to discuss just what is happening as it relates to their operations in Windsor, and some of the discussion will be revolving around information that has been brought to my attention about what is happening to their facilities in Detroit.

Mr. Ruston: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker: While the minister is meeting with Chrysler, I assume he will also be asking them about their small cars, since they are now into the small car industry and going very well. Will he be proposing that some of their parts for small cars be made in Canada, even if the small cars are not made here?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Certainly we can make that proposal, but I think the member is aware of the fact that the whole matter is up for a considerable amount of discussion as it relates to the manufacture of parts—well, the whole auto pact area. There is a lot of concern being expressed by the unions, by governments, and in some cases I think by the automobile manufacturers themselves, as to how this is going to work out; certainly the auto parts manufacturers have a great deal of concern. This whole matter is being discussed.

I certainly can suggest to Chrysler that we think this would be desirable. What effect that will have, I don't know. I think right now that one of the things we are going to have to do is to enter into very serious discussions with my federal counterpart with a view to finding out just what is happening, if there is in fact severe political pressure being brought to bear on the major car manufacturers in the United States which is drawing some of the potential jobs out of Canada and into the United States.

Mr. Renwick: Of course there is.

Mr. Mackenzie: Don't send the Minister of Labour (B. Stephenson) to find out.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I can agree with the hon. member when he says, "Of course there is"; but I think rather than simply standing and saying "of course there is," let's find out to what degree it is and whether or not the companies are prepared to recognize that they have a responsibility towards investment and the creation and the continuation of existing jobs in this country.

Mr. S. Smith: You still don't know?

Mr. Bounsall: Mr. Speaker, since the economy of Ontario is so dependent upon the auto industry, where 40 per cent of the work force in Ontario is either directly or very closely indirectly associated with the auto industry, and the minister has mentioned the non-operation in the proper sense of the auto pact, is it not time, in his opinion, that a committee of this Legislature should bring the auto companies before us and ask them and demand from them that the production in parts and finished products in Ontario equal the sales in Ontario, which was the intent of the auto pact, and find out why they have not done that to date?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, I am not completely satisfied that a select committee of this Legislature is going to produce the sort of answers that are wanted, I am not saying it isn't possible that that may be the way we want to go, but it does seem to me that we are in a position now where we must go—and I am not saying this as a matter of passing the buck—to the federal government, who have the responsibility to negotiate with the United States government as it relates to the auto pact, and to find out why we are not receiving our fair share, if we are not. The select committee will do nothing more than bring in the auto manufacturers, who will sit down and discuss with us what their situation is.

Mr. Bounsall: That's where the power is.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: It's still a federal responsibility and we would like to work in conjunction with the federal government, but it's really of no value for us to go off by ourselves in this thing.

Mr. Martel: They've been dragging their feet for years.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: The opposition members continually want us to do things as a province which are really in the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Mr. B. Newman: Supplementary: Would the minister not consider it right that he demand that industry immediately inform him whenever any substantial changes are contemplated by them that can adversely affect the work force in all communities in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, that requirement is already there. The companies are required to notify the Ministry of Labour when there is any change that may affect the work force at those particular plants.

Mr. B. Newman: They didn't know about the Chrysler layoff.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I am the first to admit to the member that there seems to have been some lack of communication in that particular situation as it reflects on Chrysler, but that requirement is there—that the reporting is supposed to be given by advance notice to the Minister of Labour.

OLIVETTI LAYOFFS

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, on March 13, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Wildman) asked a question regarding the work force at Olivetti Canada on Don Mills Road.

Employment at the plant has been reduced. Three years ago 180 persons were employed at the plant; two years ago it was at 150; employment now stands at 88, not at the 55 that the hon. member stated. But dumping in Canada of offshore-produced typewriters cannot be blamed for this cut.

The reason for the reduction in staff over the past three years is twofold and hinges on market conditions. First, electric typewriters are increasingly popular, which has caused the sales of manual typewriters to fall off by 50 per cent. Secondly, economic and competitive conditions have caused the sale of Olivetti's electric typewriters to suffer. If the sales of electric typewriters were as had been projected, I am informed that employment at Olivetti would be approximately 128.

Perhaps the question of dumping would be relevant if Olivetti's competitors were importing at lower prices. But Olivetti is not complaining of this, nor are this company's competitors complaining that Olivetti's overseas plants are dumping in Canada—at least, no official complaint has been registered with the federal Department of Revenue anti-dumping directorate.

Olivetti does not anticipate any further plant layoffs and the company does not intend to close the operation on Don Mills Road.

Regarding the question from the hon. member on government purchases, I would like to explain that although each ministry makes its own purchase decisions, government-wide purchasing and supply arrangements for typewriters, as well as other products, are made by the Ministry of Government Services. Government purchasing policies are established by my colleague, the Minister of Government Services (Mr. Henderson), and I would suggest that the hon. member's question on the purchase of typewriters should be placed as a question on the order paper.

CRIMINAL RECORDS

Mr. Roy: I have a question of the Solicitor General: Would the Solicitor General advise whether we have here in Ontario a policy whereby the use of and access to criminal files and records are limited to accredited police forces or Crown agencies? Do we have a policy like that here or not?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Yes, Mr. Speaker, criminal records are only available formally to the police and to solicitors—for example, to defence counsel for trial—and in cases such as mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary: Then how does the Solicitor General justify the fact that a situation has been allowed to exist, in Ottawa at least—and I am not naive enough to think that it is limited to Ottawa; it probably goes on right across the province—whereby a private agency—in the case of Ottawa it is called the Universal Investigation Services—were allowed to get access to these criminal files and records and then turn around and sell this information to such agencies or stores as Hudson's Bay, Eatons, and so on, to check on their employees?

How is it that this situation was allowed to exist for five years in Ottawa—and, I suspect, across the province—and how is it that if it has been going on for that period of time the Solicitor General's ministry is not aware of it; and if the ministry is aware of it, what has been done about it?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The procedure, as the hon. member explains it, is not proper. I noticed just this morning a press report on the incident in Ottawa and have asked for a full report from the people within my ministry. I would therefore expect to report to the hon. member later.

Mr. Roy: May I ask one further supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister will report back when he has a full report.

Mr. Roy: There is one other aspect to this that I wanted to ask the minister about, if I may, Mr. Speaker. An important—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member originally asked a come-on question and then he had a three-part supplementary. Surely the hon. member can organize his questions in such a way that he doesn't pre-empt too much time of the question period.

Mr. Roy: I don't think I've taken up—

Mr. Speaker: You can't naturally assume that you are going to get three supplementaries to every question.

Mr. Roy: I appreciate that. It's an important question and that's why I want to ask about one aspect of it, if I may.

Could the minister advise on, and investigate as well, the fact that in the Ottawa situation there appeared to be a distribution of juvenile records? I understood that in this province police forces did not keep what are called "juvenile records."

Hon. Mr. Kerr: I can't agree with the hon. member that juvenile records are not available. But as I indicated in my previous answer, records of that nature certainly should not be circulated in the way the hon. member has mentioned. I will look into that, and also into the additional information he has given me, and will report back to him.

THUNDER BAY HEALTH REPORT

Mr. Foulds: A question for the Minister of Health: Has the minister had an opportunity to examine the Thunder Bay District Health Council report, Panorama of Mortality, which shows that mortality rates in Thunder Bay District are in excess of those for the province by 20 per cent overall, and in some sub-categories up to 112 and 139 per cent? Can he indicate to the House what his initial response is and what initiatives the ministry might take with regard to that report?

[2:45]

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I received the report minutes before I walked into the House, along with the letter of conveyance from Mr. Lester, the executive director of the Thunder Bay District Health Council. I may say, too, that in a separate letter accompanying the letter of conveyance he indicates that the council itself will be forwarding a brief making specific recommendations. In the meantime, while we await that further indication from the district health council of what concrete action they suggest should be taken, the ministry staff have begun a review of the report.

If the member looks at the conclusions—I always start at the end of a book and work my way to the front—there are three areas that they indicate need some further study, one being respiratory diseases. This is an area which is already under study with a grant from the ministry. We'll have more to say on this in the future, I'm sure.

Mr. Foulds: Supplementary: I wonder if while the ministry is examining the report the minister could take a look at two other areas other than those recommended in the conclusions of the health council report? Particularly I would ask whether it is worthy of consideration that ambulance service and air ambulance service in northwestern Ontario be upgraded in view of the high accident rate; and whether or not it is important to look at the infant mortality rate, which is 30 per cent higher generally, and particularly the 93 per cent excess from "symptoms and ill-defined conditions." Would that not seem to indicate that early diagnosis is called for, an up-grading of pediatric service and perhaps more prenatal classes and early child care?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: The second part of that question, I'm sure, will form part of the review by the health council of its task force report. The first part of that question is under review by the five district health councils in northern Ontario, subsequent to a proposal which was inaugurated by Mayor Piche of Kapuskasing.

FIRE DAMAGE ASSISTANCE

Mr. O'Neil: In the absence of the Premier, I'd like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. During this past weekend the town of Trenton suffered a very severe fire which destroyed a large section of the downtown commercial district. This has resulted in many businesses and people being displaced and will result in extreme hardships for many. Could I ask the Solicitor General what type of aid is available to assist these citizens of Trenton?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: A disaster of this kind would be looked at on an individual basis. We don't have any policy or precedent for situations of this kind. In the event of a disaster, for example a snowstorm or a flood, we have a policy of assisting during the term of that disaster, with manpower, equipment—things of that nature.

This was, as the hon. member has said, a very serious fire. It involved a number of commercial enterprises and some apartment buildings, I understand. I would have to look into this.

The Fire Marshal at the present time is undertaking an investigation; as the hon. member knows, arson is suspected in these fires. However, I will discuss it with the Premier, because it would have to be assistance by way of order in council and a decision of cabinet; so I'll get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Turner: Supplementary question to the Solicitor General: Having regard to the recent disastrous fire in the town of Bancroft, may I ask the Solicitor General if he is considering any assistance—

Mr. Foulds: Is this your maiden speech?

Mr. Turner:—either to the town or to the individuals involved in that fire?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The answer would be similar to the one I gave to the hon. member for Quinte. This is also under investigation by the Fire Marshal's office, so I would reply to him in the same manner.

TAGGART SERVICE LIMITED

Mr. Philip: A question of the Minister of Transportation and Communications: Is the minister aware that Taggart Service Limited is presently running west of Toronto on privileges of Jones Transport, a subsidiary of that company? Is the minister aware that Jones Transport is presently undergoing a legal strike and that Taggart is running on Jones' routes by authorization of a power interchange authority issued by the Ontario Highway Transport Board?

Hon. Mr. Snow: No, Mr. Speaker, I wasn't aware of that.

Mr. Laughren: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. Philip: I wonder if the minister then can tell us, is it not his understanding that a power of interchange authority is issued to take care of overflow situations and not for strike-breaking purposes? And is the minister therefore prepared to advise the transport board to withdraw the temporary power of interchange authority from Taggart Service Limited, since the transport board in this case is presently an accomplice in strike-breaking?

Hon. Mr. Snow: I haven't been made aware of any of the matters that the hon.

member refers to. I am most interested in the comments he has made and I'll certainly look into the whole matter.

Mr. Philip: One last supplementary, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has promised to look into the whole question and to get back to you.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Bradley: My question, in the absence of the Premier, is for the Minister of Labour. Since the mayor of the city of St. Catharines has stated, to that travelling road show known as the Conservative task force on employment, that the unemployment rate in the city of St. Catharines is now very close to 12 per cent, which according to his calculations would be the highest in Ontario, would the minister indicate what specific program of direct job creation her government is prepared to proceed with to alleviate this critical situation?

An hon. member: None.

Mrs. Campbell: Zilch.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, that is not the role of the Ministry of Labour—

Mr. Laughren: You're not kidding!

Mr. Makarchuk: What is your role?

Hon. B. Stephenson: However, I might counter with a question about the effect of the road show on industry and tourism, and the road show on regional government which the opposition party has been running.

Mr. Makarchuk: Why don't both of you hit the road?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: How about your road show in Quebec?

Mr. Laughren: That's different.

Mr. Bradley: Supplementary: Would the minister be prepared to speak to the cabinet favourably to have the timetable moved forward for any provincial government capital works in St. Catharines and the remainder of the Niagara Peninsula in order that jobs can be created in the construction industry and allied industries; for example by authorizing the immediate construction of the very much-needed courthouse in the city of St. Catharines? In other words, would she speak to her cabinet colleagues concerning this?

Mr. Makarchuk: As was done by the socialist government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Foulds: They'll build you a courthouse like the one in Thunder Bay.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I will most certainly look into the interesting suggestions made by the hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Welch: What's the federal member for St. Catharines doing to get our area designated for federal help?

Mr. Mancini: You are the last one to go by.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Jim, what's the federal member for St. Catharines doing to get our area designated for federal help? What's he doing?

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Read the editorial last night.

Mr. Martel: Control the government House leader; Robert, stay cool.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Yes.

Interjection.

Mr. Swart: Supplementary: Would the minister be aware that at that road show in St. Catharines the allegation was made by Conservative sources that a GM auto parts plant was going to go to Quebec instead of coming to Ontario? Is she familiar with this and has she made any representation to GM about getting that parts plant in this province?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly obvious that this question should be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Industry and Tourism.

Mr. Martel: Come on, John, give us an answer. But you were in the Bahamas.

Interjections.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Do you want an answer?

Mr. Lewis: Before you answer you had better speak to the government House leader.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, can I redirect the supplementary to the Minister of Industry and Tourism?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is prepared to accept it.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has obviously been hearing some of the stories that have been going around in that particular area.

Mr. Laughren: Our area too.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: There is reason to believe that General Motors has been looking for a site in various jurisdictions, one being Ontario and the other being Quebec, as well as in some United States areas. It is my understanding that the federal government, through their Department of Regional Economic Expansion, are prepared to make financial assistance available to General Motors if they were to locate in those areas where this money is available; and in this particular case, of course, that would probably be within the province of Quebec.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Certainly not in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Martel: Poor little GM.

DEATH OF ADRIENNE PAQUETTE

Mr. McClellan: I have a question of the Minister of Community and Social Services with respect to his statement and the report that he tabled today on the Paquette case. May I ask the minister, in view of what can only be described as shocking incompetence and mismanagement on the part of the Ottawa CAS, whether he will reconsider his decision to have an in-house, closed-doors, secret review of the matter between himself and the ministry, and instead appoint a full, public judicial inquiry which will, through a process of public hearings, come up with a set of publicly determined recommendations with respect to handling child abuse in the Ottawa society and in other societies in this province?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there is a task force that has been established by me and headed by Dean Garber which is presently undertaking just such a review, not as a judicial inquiry—

Mr. McClellan: It's not such a review at all.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —but it is looking at those very questions the hon. member raises, the questions of the practices and procedures and policies that are presently being followed by Children's Aid Societies in cases of child abuse in the province. It is the mandate of that task force to make recommendations with respect to improved procedures where they see such improvements as being desirable and possible, and also to make recommendations with respect to improved training programs for child-care workers, specifically directed to the question of dealing with child abuse cases.

I fail to see what additional advantage would be gained by the public—

Mr. Lewis: A public advantage; a public disclosure.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —by establishing a judicial inquiry to do that very thing at this point in time.

Mr. McClellan: Let me ask, just on one part of the report, by way of supplementary: Three of the recommendations deal with the total inadequacy of French-language services in the area—

Mr. Lewis: Shocking; incredible in all.

Mr. McClellan: Just appalling. I want to ask the minister whether he has any specific proposals or recommendations or plans to address that intolerable lack of services to the French community by that society?

Hon. Mr. Norton: First of all, with respect to this specific case, or this specific society, as the recommendations indicate, we will be immediately addressing ourselves to that issue and others with the society with a view to developing some plan—

Mr. Swart: You're faltering.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —by which we can assist the society in order to improve the francophone services. Part of the problem is something that is not entirely within the control of the society. There is a question, as I understand, or a problem, in terms of the availability of trained francophone personnel in that community, surprisingly enough.

Mr. McClellan: Ridiculously enough.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Apparently a number have sought in our neighbour province of Quebec, and there is apparently a shortage of such personnel in the Ottawa area.

Mr. McClellan: That's absurd.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Specifically with respect to the matter of services, I will be making an announcement within the next day or two with respect to something that doesn't arise out of this—our plans for improved French-language services for children in eastern Ontario—which clearly will impact upon such agencies as the Ottawa Children's Aid Society. I will give the details of that within the next day or two.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: May I ask the minister, apart from his lack of initiative in relation to French-language services for the Ottawa area, how can he possibly justify the fact that in the case of Adrienne Paquette, apparently she was returned to her parents because in fact they could not find what they called "French-speaking foster parents"? How can that possibly be, considering the population in Ottawa? And what steps has the minister taken since this case to accelerate the finding of foster parents who speak French?

Hon. Mr. Norton: At this point in time I don't know the answer to that question.

Mr. Martel: That tells us something about that Children's Aid Society.

Mr. McClellan: Neither you nor the agency know the answers.

Mr. Swart: That's why you need a public hearing.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The child was at one point in a French-speaking home, which according to the information I have was less than an adequate home, apparently—

Mr. Lewis: Right.

Mr. McClellan: The child was neglected in the home.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—which led to the child being returned to her biological parents. I don't know specifically why there has been a problem in that area in encouraging or interesting French-speaking families in taking children in as foster children.

[3:00]

Mr. Laughren: How are you going to solve it internally then?

Mr. Roy: Don't you think we need an inquiry to find out?

Hon. Mr. Norton: We don't need an inquiry. What we need is to get to the root of the problem and that's precisely what we'll do.

Mr. Lewis: As you perceive it.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Some high-profile judicial inquiry is not going to resolve that.

Mr. Lewis: What? But that's what does it.

Hon. Mr. Norton: We will be dealing with that problem along with the society in trying to find out what the problem is in terms of the provision of such services, and take whatever steps are necessary in order to see that it's remedied.

Mr. McClellan: You don't understand.

Mr. Lewis: Supplementary: In view of the answers which the minister is giving today, where he is clearly floundering as much as the society itself, would he not consider reconsidering the decision and the statement that he made today? Does he not feel that the indictment of the society laid out before him is one of the strongest he has received in recent times over the administrative procedures of any specific Children's Aid Society in the province, and surely it cries out for a judicial inquiry or something fairly explicit rather than another little, cozy, in-house review between the minister and the society, which has led to this problem that we're dealing with today?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Balderdash.

Mr. Lewis: It isn't balderdash; that's what happens.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect to the hon. member opposite, I think that's nonsense. I think there are ways in which—

Mr. McClellan: This report you've tabled is nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Obviously, it would be desirable for certain members on the opposite side to see some high-profile judicial inquiry crossing the province that may bring in recommendations two or three years down the road.

Mr. Roy: Sure, we want to solve the problem.

Mr. McClellan: What are you so afraid of?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I am interested in resolving these problems as quickly and as cooperatively as possible.

Mr. Lewis: But you're not doing it.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I do not see a long-term judicial inquiry that's going to be holding hearings across this province—

Mr. Lewis: You can do it in 60 days, for heaven's sake.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—bringing in recommendations two or three years hence, as resolving these problems. We'll see that they're resolved.

Mr. Martel: Your solution is five years down the road for dealing with kids. You'll give us another green paper.

DREE ASSISTANCE

Mr. Hall: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Treasurer in the absence of the Minister of Industry and Tourism. Has the government, as a government, asked the federal government for DREE designation in areas of high unemployment such as the Niagara Peninsula?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: To the best of my knowledge, not for the Niagara Peninsula. We have been asking for some time for an extension of the DREE area into eastern Ontario—Renfrew, Pembroke and that part of the province—and indeed on several occasions have said that a good portion of eastern Ontario should be included in the designated area. As late as last night, I looked at a letter from Mr. Lessard, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, saying no. Whether his view or their view would be different with respect to the Niagara region, I don't know. It's something which is worthwhile pursuing.

Mr. Hall: I am wondering if the Minister of Industry and Tourism could comment on this, inasmuch as he was out when I directed the question to the Treasurer. At what point would he consider it worthwhile to approach the federal government for DREE designation of this or any other area, but particularly talking about the Niagara Peninsula?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, I would think it probably is worthwhile to approach them considering the fact that the criteria for designation seem to be very flexible. If Metropolitan Montreal can be designated as a depressed area, certainly the Niagara Peninsula could be too.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Right; precisely.

Mr. Laughren: Why haven't you done it then?

An hon. member: Why can't you designate it for the $10 licence plates?

Mr. Roy: You are supposed to be the government over there.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: What do you know about government?

Mr. Swart: Who's the government in Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We have, as I indicated, been turned down on several occasions with respect to eastern Ontario, where the long-term unemployment figures have been much higher than they have been in the Peninsula, which is a relatively recent event. I might say we were in touch with DREE as recently as two or three months ago, once again on the basis that we felt eastern Ontario should be included in the area at the highest rate of the new employment programme—the programme announced by Mr. Chretien and I believe being undertaken by Mr. Cullen. We pointed out that the unemployment figure in eastern Ontario would qualify for the top percentage—seven, I think, or eight; the highest figure—and we were again told that eastern Ontario would not qualify. If members opposite have some greater influence than we do, I would be delighted if they would use it.

Mr. Roy: Would you give us credit for it?

Mr. Ruston: Did you get anywhere with Joe who?

EMPLOYEES' HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Mackenzie: Would the Minister of Labour inform the House as to whether or not she intends to bring Bill 70 on safety and health back into the House in the form in which it left the committee, or are there any grounds to the widespread and persistent rumours that the minister intends to change or withdraw sections of the bill, or indeed the bill itself?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to that question is a very definite perhaps.

Mr. Mancini: Supplementary: Does the minister not think it is totally unfair that she should dangle that legislation in front of this Legislature for three years, have it sent to an all-party committee of this Legislature and then back down?

Mr. MacDonald: Then defy the majority.

Hon. W. Newman: Who fouled it up? You fouled it up. Yes, you did.

Mr. S. Smith: Start telling the truth.

Hon. W. Newman: You take the responsibility, because that's where it belongs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I can't hear the answer.

An hon. member: That's what minority government is all about, Bill.

Hon. B. Stephenson: To refresh the memory of the hon. member, Bill 70 has been dangled only since October of 1977. We have been working diligently upon it, I must admit, for the past year and a half, and it is not my intention to abandon such important legislation.

Mr. Lewis: By way of supplementary, if I may: Since the minister must know that there are very widespread rumours circulating, some of them from within her own ministry, that sections of the bill will never be reintroduced into this Legislature, that there is a great deal of research being done to indicate that sections of the bill are financially impossible to implement, in other words to discredit the intent of some of the legislative amendments which the opposition introduced, since her colleagues are positively apoplectic every time we raise this question in the House, can she not indicate to us in advance what it is she intends to do with the bill prior to its reintroduction so that some work can be done in the public arena to prepare the ground?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, first, I would have to deny that any of my colleagues in the cabinet or in the caucus have been apoplectic at all.

Mr. Ruston: Newman is.

Mr. Roy: Take his blood pressure.

Hon. B. Stephenson: They have all been extremely supportive of the bill as it was originally written. They are not supportive of some of the significant amendments which were made by the opposition parties, nor are some of the client groups particularly supportive of those amendments. I am examining those amendments, and all of the implications thereof, extremely carefully and we shall be very responsible in whatever action we take regarding Bill 70, but, as I said before, it is too important a piece of legislation to abandon.

LANGSTAFF LAND FREEZE

Mr. Stong: I have a question of the Treasurer. Assuming that there is nothing unusual in changing the permitted uses of the Eagleson property, which was purchased in the town of Markham in the parkway belt after it was established and apparently for speculative purposes, when will the minister give the people of Langstaff in that same town, in that same parkway belt, some relief? They have been seeking it for three years and their homes and jobs are at stake.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I think that question might be put to the Chairman of the Cabinet, who is not here—

An hon. member: Yes, he is.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Yes, he is here, but I don't know what his timetable is. The parkway belt obviously has left my hands and is now before the legislation committee of cabinet and the member might want to direct that question to him.

Mr. Stong: Mr. Speaker, I understood that the order was made last month and that type of change would still be in the hands of this minister. The people of Langstaff are continually after him for change. When will he take it upon himself to assist them?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I haven't heard from them, to my knowledge, for some months now. I heard from them after the draft plan and they were satisfied. I don't believe I have heard from them, nor have I heard from the members of recent days, but I will be glad to check that.

Mr. Stong: Mr. Speaker, may I redirect that question for an answer for those people?

Mr. Speaker: The time for oral questions has expired.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Laughren moved first reading of Bill 46, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Laughren: The purpose of the bill is to increase and index the level of benefits payable under the Workmen's Compensation Act. In addition, the bill removes the ceiling on average earnings and provides for a new ceiling based on the calculation of a maximum wage rate. The bill also provides for the continued payment of disability compensation for five years following the death of a recipient, where the amount of the disability compensation exceeds the amount that would otherwise be paid to dependants as a dependant's allowance.

AGE OF RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. Leluk moved first reading of Bill 47, An Act respecting the Age of Mandatory Retirement.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Leluk: The purpose of the bill is to ensure that no person shall be required to retire before reaching the age of 70, where the person is willing and capable of performing his or her job. This is achieved by amendments to the following statutes: the Employment Standards Act, 1974; the Ontario Human Rights Code; the Pension Benefits Act, and the Public Service Act.

Mr. Martel: Put him underground for three years—he would rewrite that so fast it wouldn't be funny. That's what it is when you have never worked a day in your life.

An hon. member: You never worked a day in your life, Nick.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Look who is talking about working.

ESTIMATES SCHEDULE

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, before you call the orders of the day: On Thursday, March 16, I neglected to indicate which committees would be meeting on Wednesday morning of this week. If I could take this opportunity to report to the House, the standing committee on resources development will meet tomorrow morning at 10 to continue the consideration of the estimates of the Ministry of the Environment. That means that this week the standing resources development committee will meet tonight, tomorrow morning and Thursday night, with the estimates of the Ministry of Environment. The standing committee on social development will meet this afternoon and tomorrow afternoon to consider the estimates of the Ministry of Culture and Recreation.

ANSWERS TO WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the answers to questions 15, 16, 17 and 18, and the interim answer to question 19 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix, page 950.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY

LAND TITLES AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved second reading of Bill 33, An Act to amend the Land Titles Act.

Mr. Lawlor: It is basically a housekeeping matter flowing directly out of the family law legislation, the same as Bill 59. Nevertheless,

I think that rather than take time on second reading—we do agree with the principle of the bill—it would be better to send it into committee.

[3:15]

I simply say on this occasion that I wonder if this is the best way to have done it, particularly with respect to section 1. It is one way of doing it and, therefore, we don't take exception to it. I don't know if it was the better way to have done it. I would have thought that a section which spelled out in the legislation what the right in question was, having to do with matrimonial domicile, would have been more apropos, or possibly one could have done both to make that determination.

On subsection 2, the problem of uses, as I say, in committee I will be asking the minister why he concentrated only upon subsections 8 and 9 and not the other subsections of section 96. There are two or three others. I think the definition aspect should stay. But I would be interested in learning from the Attorney General, in effect, does he see the sum area as retention of the deed to uses concept—outside, of course, of the matrimonial domicile situation—and is that the reason these other sections are retained?

Finally, within section 132, I would direct his attention to the cluster of sections under that heading of dower and courtesy—sections 130, 131 and 133. Ought they not to be either revised or deleted also? Why the segmenting out of section 132, which certainly has to be dealt with? The others might have been considered too. Those are the only thoughts I have on this bill.

Mrs. Campbell: I too rise basically to support this amendment. It is unfortunate that the whole bill, together with the Land Titles Act itself, couldn't go to committee. It would seem to me, having passed the other legislation, it would create some chaos if we were to defer or adjourn the conclusion to this particular bill. I do have some rather serious concerns about the companion piece to this, but we are not opposing the amendments to the Land Titles Act.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: In response to the questions of the member for Lakeshore on the manner in which this bill was drafted, it might have been of greater assistance perhaps to have followed the course suggested by him. I'm really not in a position to make that judgement. As the member for St. George points out, there is some degree of urgency with respect to passing these amendments, in view of the fact that the family law reform bill will take effect on March 31.

I imagine a very large number of real estate transactions will be closed on that day which will be affected.

In so far as the transfer to uses is concerned, I understand that it's simply overridden by the provisions of the Family Law Reform Act. I think persons can still use the transfer to uses method, subject of course to the provisions of the Family Law Reform Act. The member for Lakeshore had a question in relation to section 132 of the bill. I think the question was why weren't other sections repealed as well as 132.

Mrs. Campbell: It's a little hurried, shall we say?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I'm looking at section 133 now. I must confess that conveyancing is an area of the law in which I never had the pleasure of practising—

Mrs. Campbell: For which we are truly thankful.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: —and for which I am reasonably grateful. But perhaps we might have an answer in relation to that.

Mrs. Campbell: It was just overlooked.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Perhaps it would be best just to let it go to committee. I gather this was the wish.

Mr. Lawlor: On a point of order, if I may get in under that pretext, Mr. Speaker, there is urgency in the matter. If it is going to hold this bill up beyond April 1, then it would be most unwise. We can deal with these other matters afterwards. I would let it go through. Is that the case?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Yes. I am very delighted to have that assistance.

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

REGISTRY AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved second reading of Bill 34, An Act to amend the Registry Act.

Mrs. Campbell: I indicated that I was more concerned about this bill, partly because here again it is quite apparent with the haste with which these amendments have been brought forth that they really don't correct all of the problems within the old Registry Act. We still have retained references to dower and so forth. I am sorry to see sloppy legislation going through.

I presume we have to approve it on the same basis because I don't think I want to be part of the kind of chaos that might result if we delayed the passing of this legislation. I would like to point out, however, that this one does take me into my problems, as indicated in the debate on the old Bill 59, in that we now have direct references to re-definition of wills as they relate to the Succession Law Reform Act or what I call Bill 60.

We have developed in this province at this point in time a great deal of scepticism as to the bona fides of the government in looking at that particular piece of legislation. I suppose all I can do is once more to ask the Attorney General if we can have a date set so that both the member for Lakeshore and I may meet with him on an urgent matter as soon as he returns to Ontario. I trust that if he might not return for some considerable period of time someone else might be appointed in the interim to discuss it. I trust that he will not be interned or have any other such problems as he proceeds on his tours with the Advocates' Society.

I do have this concern in this particular case. We have unresolved questions as far as they relate to Bill 60 and before this matter goes to a vote I would like to hear from the Attorney General. I must say I do not share the scepticism of others. I have felt his commitment was a very real commitment. But I think at this point I have to ask for a further statement from him since we are referring so specifically in these amendments to the Succession Law Reform Act.

Other than that, I can't quarrel with what I see as housekeeping. I just wish that perhaps we had someone doing a little better housekeeping in bringing forward the amendments to this Act.

Mr. Lawlor: Just two or three niggling points about this particular legislation. Again, because of the urgency and because a number of conveyances and dealings with real property are in the air at the present time, it would be wiser, to say the least, not to force this matter possibly beyond the first of the month.

A couple of points: Isn't it curious that whereas this legislation, the Registry Act itself, makes specific provisions for particular types of affidavit, there is nothing similar in the previous bill that we put through, that is in the Land Titles Act. I suppose that's done under the section on regulations dealing with forms being conducted under the Land Titles Act, over against the spelling out in this particular piece of legislation of precisely what those forms will say, and the specific wording of the forms.

The main point in this clean-up piece of legislation has to do with the definition of spouse. It's been broadened. It covers the situation of the voidable marriage and the void marriage, where cohabitation continues to exist for a period of time, and encompasses one of the individuals in that within the definition of a spouse.

I make a wry comment that our constant alteration of the basic forms provides not only continuing subsistence for the law stationers of the province of Ontario, but I suspect it is something of a bonanza even at this stage. We all order vast quantities of conveyancing paper, et cetera. I'm sure all law firms do, whether they're directly engaged in that work or not. Every two or three months the process of reordering and the destroying of the old must go on apace—either the shredding or the burning—and so you have to get another thousand of the forms having to do with conveyancing because the affidavit has been somewhat minutely changed.

The change in the one case is the business of when no spouse is mentioned; the affidavit has to say whether the person has a spouse. Previously it had to say whether he was unmarried, a widower or what not, but that old form is now being interred in the course of passing this particular legislation.

The only other question I have to bring to the Attorney General's attention, which would normally be done in committee, is section 2, subsection 4—right at the end, where he is revising the contents of subsection 10 of section 42 of the Act as it is at present. Down at the end it says, ". . . any other person who may be designated by regulation."

Has the Attorney General any notion at all of who these other persons might possibly be? If not, why does he give this kind of blanket—and, I feel, somewhat questionable—phraseology?

That's all I have to say on that, Mr. Speaker.

[3:30]

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Firstly, I can only express the hope that my distinguished colleagues, the Justice critics for the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, have created a hospitable atmosphere in the State of Israel by reason of their visit there earlier in the year and, as a result of the very favourable impression that I know was left by them, both the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) and myself will be reasonably well received as we journey to that distinguished fine little nation at the end of this week.

Mr. Laughren: Is the minister taking his parliamentary assistant (Mr. Sterling) with him? Take him.

Mr. Lawlor: We did nothing to bring any peace.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I want to make it clear that my commitment in relation to the Succession Law Reform Act, stands, naturally; and upon our return which, hopefully, would be approximately 10 days after our departure, we'll be able to arrange an early meeting. I would hope that the member for St. George would at least be content to await my return. I am very interested in the matter and while I am quite prepared to have people meet with the member for St. George in my absence, in view of my own personal commitment I would be pleased to be part of that. I can again give her my assurance that it should be possible to arrange such a meeting very shortly after my return.

The niggling matters being raised by the member for Lakeshore may be to him niggling matters but are always to me matters of great pith and substance, matters of great moment, and it is certainly always an opportunity for me to—

Mr. Lawlor: The Attorney General must be going away.

Mr. Laughren: Just go away, just go away.

Mr. Lawlor: Even the Attorney General can't turn molehills into mountains.

Mr. Laughren: It's the other way around.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Now, just where was I?

Mrs. Campbell: That's unusual for you, Roy.

Mr. Laughren: On your way.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The references to dower, in the Registry Act, are retained in certain places in that Act simply by reason of the fact that in certain cases, of course, dower has vested, and so it's necessary to retain the use of that term.

I'm afraid there was a question from the member for Lakeshore about one of the subsections. I had a little difficulty following it. I was looking for it in the amendments. Perhaps he might assist me by directing my attention again to that particular question; I would appreciate it.

Mr. Lawlor: It's section 2, subsection 4.

Mr. Speaker: This is second reading. Do you have a response?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Hopefully. It might be of assistance to me if the member for Lakeshore would direct his query to me again. I must admit, I just haven't been able to follow it, and that's my problem. I'm quite prepared to recognize his greater degree of familiarity with this legislation.

Mr. Lawlor: There is just a minor difficulty between you and me. Somebody by the name of the Speaker somehow obtrudes or stands between our proper forms of communication, so I would ask for his indulgence.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker is living up to your rules and not his own. It's traditional that everybody has his say on second reading and the sponsor of the bill winds up the debate. If you want to relax the rules because you're into something fairly complex, far be it from me to intrude further.

Mr. Lawlor: In an endeavour to expedite proceedings, I would ask to stretch a point very slightly. It has to do with subsection 4, the new 10, and at the end, these affidavits which are set out in the bill as having to be taken and saying whether a spouse is a spouse or not a spouse and that sort of thing. The bill excludes a whole host of individuals under the present subsections 5 and 6, and then at the end it says, ". . . and any other person who may be designated by regulation." I went through this carefully, and I think the minister has excluded pretty well everybody he possibly can. It has been in the legislation for an awful long time; if there was any other undreamed-of individual or corporation—and I wouldn't think it would really apply to a corporation anyway—who might it be? Why did the Attorney General put that in?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: It has been explained to me that this is really a form of escape clause inasmuch as we are concerned about situations which may simply not have been contemplated at the present time because we haven't had an opportunity of considering all the ramifications that may arise as a result of Bill 59.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might rise on a point of clarification to explain something.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it's a very, very brief point.

Mrs. Campbell: Yes. I think the Attorney General misunderstood what I was saying. I did not ask to meet with anyone in his absence. I was just made aware of the fact that there were certain conditions prevailing in the country to which he was going which might not permit him to return, and I was therefore trying to provide for some alternative in that event.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

HIGHWAY TRAFFIC AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Snow moved second reading of Bill 23, An Act to amend the Highway Traffic Act.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, having gone through this bill and found a great many errors in transposing to the metric system, I thought I should draw those to the minister's attention.

As far as I can gather, this bill is strictly to change the markings of highways and the regulations relating to mobile homes, street signs and so on into the metric system. We have no quarrel with that, of course, except to wonder whether the minister could come up with some easy way for the public to be able to translate into the metric system. But we will support this bill.

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, we see this as a housekeeping bill that is in keeping with other similar translations into the metric system and we support the bill.

Hon. Mr. Snow: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. members of the parties opposite for their support for this bill.

Mr. Foulds: Reluctant in some cases.

Hon. Mr. Snow: As you know, sir, last fall we introduced amendments to the Highway Traffic Act converting the speed limits and distances to metric. This bill completes the conversion of the Highway Traffic Act to the metric system.

Mr. Foulds: Why don't we distribute a free conversion kit for each speedometer?

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Mr. McKeough moved resolution 10:

That the Treasurer of Ontario be authorized to pay the salaries of the civil servants and other necessary payments pending the voting of supply for the period commencing April 1, 1978 and ending June 30, 1978, such payments to be charged to the proper appropriation following the voting of supply.

Mr. Reid: This is the chance to give my budget address but I will forgo that pleasure. I do want to make a note of the fact that the Treasurer has seen fit to follow our recommendation of some two years ago in cutting down the length of time for which he is coming to the House for supply in advance of the estimates being passed by this Legislature. It was the custom of the government to try to get six months' supply under this motion. I am glad to see we have at least cut that down to three months.

There are a number of matters I would like to discuss, but to facilitate the work of the House I will leave it at that for now.

Mr. Laughren: I too wish to expedite the matters of the House, but I do think I will make a few more comments than are normal when the interim supply motion is introduced by the Treasurer. We were pleased in this party when the motion indicated it was a three months' notice of motion for supply rather than the traditional six months. I would hope that that is not just a one-shot, three-month time period and that in future it will be either three or four months—perhaps four months. I think the select committee on the Camp commission recommended that it be introduced three times a year rather than twice a year, in which case four months would be appropriate.

What bothers us in this party a great deal about the way interim supply motions are dealt with is the amount of money that is involved. If we do it on a pro rata basis, we are talking here of roughly $3.5 billion or $1 billion a month that this provides for the government to expend. That is a considerable amount of money. I can't help but wonder if we shouldn't take a look—I know we should—at the relationship between the interim supply motion and the estimates debates, which will go on for many months now right through until probably the end of December. We should take a look at the whole budget debate. The budget debate has already started and will continue probably until the last day of the session in December 1978. That is something else that seems to be a contradiction, in handing the Treasurer these kinds of funds to dispose of now and then to debate the budget all during the interim periods.

It makes one wonder about a no-confidence motion. The OHIP motion, which we will be debating a week from today, is one which involves the expenditure of provincial funds as well. At the same time, we are handing the Treasurer his interim supply motion. I think it is time we seriously thought about that and gave the committees examining the various spending estimates a different role to play, perhaps gave them more staff and also disciplined them more in terms of time during their debate. This interim supply motion in effect pre-empts a lot of what goes on in the estimates committees.

It's become a tradition almost for this government, particularly since it became a minority government back in 1975, to set up various committees that suit its purpose. In other words, they will establish a select committee when they wish to delay making a decision. They will refer something to a standing committee when it suits their purposes to do so. These are all part of the moneys out of the interim supply, of course, Mr. Speaker. I know you understand that.

I think it's time we realize that the government is manipulating this Legislature. They're giving the Legislature itself power when it suits their purposes and they're taking it away when it doesn't suit their purposes. The committee that was just established with the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Wiseman) as chairman is a good example of that. As opposed to that, they'll establish a committee to look into the whole process of rent review. That's what I would call political manipulation of a minority Legislature, and I don't think it's what minority government should be all about. We need to watch very carefully when the government attempts to do something like that.

We are going to support this interim supply motion. I'll tell you, Mr. Speaker, we're unhappy about supporting it, but to refuse to support it would be to introduce some kind of fiscal paralysis in Ontario and we simply can't do that. We're going to support this supply motion, but at the same time we've put forth on the order paper a notice that we are not satisfied with the Treasurer's budget—and indeed we've expressed no-confidence in his budget. We've expressed no-confidence in his handling of OHIP premiums and at the same time we end up supporting an interim supply motion like this.

What bothers us is that this interim supply motion doesn't mean simply that we're saying to the Treasurer, "Here's your blank cheque." It is, in effect, endorsing some of the things the Treasurer is doing; or, conversely, some of the things the Treasurer is not doing. For example, we are really giving tacit support to much of what's in the budget when we support the two, three or four different supply motions that are brought before this Legislature. Whether it's an OHIP premium increase or whether it's the exemptions to the Mining Tax Act, that is the form of tacit support that we are giving. Whether or not one imposes a tax or whether or not one exempts one, in effect it's the same thing. If one exempts someone from paying taxes, in effect it is causing the government to spend moneys they would otherwise have collected. That's what this kind of motion allows this government to do.

We're unhappy with it because with that $1 billion a month that this interim supply motion provides to the Treasurer they are going to continue the same kind of programs that we've indicated we're unhappy with. For example, they're going to continue to ignore the kind of structural problems that we've got in this province, despite our indication that we're not happy with it. Despite, as a matter of fact, the Premier's (Mr. Davis) indication in his very tough letter to Prime Minister Trudeau in March that he's not happy with the way things are, the Treasurer sits on the sidelines and doesn't do anything about it either.

This kind of supply motion allows the Treasurer to continue to enact policies or not enact policies as he sees fit. It allows the Treasurer to continue to ignore the problems that we in northern Ontario face with the way our non-renewable resources are handled. The Treasurer apparently still doesn't understand that problem because he exempts the processing allowance in the mining industry to allow them to continue to ship out resources when we know they should be processed here, and indeed the experts in the Ministry of Natural Resources agree with that.

By passing this supply motion we are saying to the Treasurer, "You don't have to do anything meaningful in job creation in the province of Ontario other than what you've already promised in your budget, which is in effect 13,000 part-time jobs for this summer." That's simply not good enough and yet this interim supply motion allows the Treasurer to continue to do that.

It allows the Treasurer to continue to ignore what's happening in the auto industry. We see vans and Jeeps being produced in this province—not small cars, not parts for small cars, not the retooling for the small car market that's going to be needed. That's being done in the United States. We end up dealing with the fads, like Jeeps and vans. That's what we end up dealing with. That is not good long-run planning in the auto industry.

Yet the Treasurer sits back and watches this happen. We are not very happy with this kind of approach to running the province, and yet that is what this motion of interim supply allows the Treasurer to do. We think that with $1 billion a month the Treasurer has more of an obligation to the province than he is displaying. We are allowing the Treasurer with this motion to continue to preside over and to perpetuate an inequitable tax structure in the province. We know that despite 30 years of supply motions we still have an inequitable tax system.

It is very strange the way the Treasurer has done it. He sets up something that makes the system less regressive, such as a property tax credit, and then he does something to take it away, such as increasing the sales tax or increasing the OHIP premium. On one hand, he says, "We are attempting to make the system less regressive," and then he does something with the other hand to make it more regressive.

That is why statistically, in the last 30 some years while this government has been in power in Ontario, there has been no redistribution of income despite what the Treasurer would have the people believe. There simply has been no redistribution of income and wealth, and we don't think that is right. That is another reason why it bothers us that we are supporting an interim supply motion.

The Wiseman committee is, I believe, a self-serving committee and really a thinly disguised anti-public-sector committee and the Henderson committee, which the government set up two years ago, was a thinly disguised attempt to justify what it was going into the 1975 election with. We think those are the kinds of committees that are abusing the system.

There is another one too: The Ontario Economic Council is going to get some of this interim supply money that we are voting today, and that bothers me. I used to be a fan of the Ontario Economic Council and of the Economic Council of Canada. I thought they did some good, impartial reporting and analysis. But when I see what is happening with the Ontario Economic Council now I am greatly disturbed. I think it is not right.

John Smith notwithstanding, and his views on the Economic Council, I thought for example that the comments of the council on property tax not being a regressive tax were ill-timed. They were not ill-timed for the Treasurer's purpose, any more than were the comments of the chairman, Mr. Reuber, about the effect of the minimum wage on unemployment. Those two comments, I believe, were timed to coincide with the wishes of the government—both in terms of the minimum wage and the problem with unemployment, and in terms of the property tax reform when the Treasurer was bringing in market value assessment.

I think that is not the role of a so-called autonomous body such as the Ontario Economic Council. That really bothers me because there is a real opportunity to do good economic analysis there. And they have done some good economic analysis. But I am very concerned that they will become used by the Treasurer. The document they did on the sales tax exemption is a good example. There was no way that document would have been released for the budget if it had not been a self-serving document beyond 1978. As it is, it shows a loss of 15,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector for 1978, and then the Treasurer says, "That is all right because in the years down the road we will all benefit by it." That is simply not right, to use a body like the Ontario Economic Council to suit the political purposes of the Treasurer.

That is the kind of thing we would like to see changed.

Rather than setting up those kinds of committees, perhaps the Treasurer and his colleagues should consider setting up the kind of committee that the United States Congress has set up—I think it is called a joint economic committee—in which they look at who benefits from government expenditures and who pays. Maybe we should find out who benefits from the distribution of government moneys as it is spent in Ontario. Perhaps it is time we had something like that, rather than these other committees which are set up almost as a self-fulfilling prophecy on the part of the Treasurer and his colleagues. Why doesn't the government set up a committee to do some meaningful research and analysis? We would all be better served by that. You might not like some of their findings but at least it would be good honest research and not self-serving. Perhaps it's time that we in Ontario had something like that.

So, while this interim supply motion is traditionally considered a ritual—and we will support it today—it still bothers us that it's treated like the budget debate and, perhaps, like the Throne Speech debate as well. I think there's room for improvement in the handling of interim supply, and I would hope that members of this Legislature would give it serious consideration.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make some comments on this motion—which we will support, as the member for Nickel Belt has already stated—to point out some of the rather serious difficulties that we've got, even with our new provisional orders, of dealing with the expenditure of funds by this government. The member for Nickel Belt went on at some length; I won't go quite to that degree, but I do want to point out a couple of things in all of this.

Here is an amount of money, really for rather unstipulated purposes. As members of this House attempt to investigate how the government spends its funds and for what purposes each allocated amount will be used, it becomes more and more difficult. There is a good deal of sham and ritual involved in many of the things we do around this House, and I'm afraid that this is one of them. This is, in fact, one of the very specific votes that members will have—where we have an amount of money which is not already spent—although to determine in our mind how this money will be spent is a rather difficult process, because one would have to go through various ministries and determine who will be spending what moneys over the next three-month period. That's difficult to do.

The one particular point I wanted to raise was this matter of looking at how money is spent by this government and whether the members of this House really have much of an opportunity to make an accurate assessment of how the money is spent, and whether or not it's well spent. I was one of the members of this House who was fortunate enough to have, for a short period of time, a parliamentary intern, a very intelligent and competent young woman by the name of Gail Hogarth, who worked out of my office for about a three-month period. It brought to the office an added dimension for an opposition back-bencher—someone who could do some research, who had the time to pore through government reports and provide the member with additional information. It is often very difficult in a member's schedule to sit down and do that kind of academic work.

I happen to chair a committee that has now been charged by this House with reviewing a number of boards, agencies and commissions. It struck us that one of our most difficult tasks would be to conduct such a review without any kind of staff at all, because we are now dependent on the Clerk's office to provide us with a clerk, and we also have the services of the legislative counsel. We have asked for one researcher, which does not seem to be for a terribly large amount of money, and we have some assurances that we will have some accommodation made so that we can do some research.

It's interesting to note that while a committee of the Legislature, charged by the Legislature with doing this kind of review, has no actual funds allocated for research—and in fact may have some difficulty in getting that allocation made, though it may yet happen—we have at the same time the government, the Premier (Mr. Davis) himself, appointing a committee of his own, of four members of his own party—not giving any consideration to other members of the House—to operate, supposedly without any funding. That's hardly a realistic expectation. It is true, in the newspaper articles that I have before me, that the Premier made a point of saying that the members of that particular committee would not be paid. That's probably all well and good, except that one could probably make the case that they are already being paid as members of this House and, in particular, some of those members are getting additional allowances for additional responsibilities.

But there is a committee which will function, supposedly, almost as part of this Legislature but not quite, and which will conduct a review entirely outside this House. It would be rather difficult for the members of this House to get an accurate assessment of how those costs will be borne. They certainly won't get any information under this kind of motion which provides blanket amounts of money for the government to spend. But there, I dare say, is a quasi-agency of the Legislature, four members of the government party doing an investigation of boards, agencies and commissions over a nine-month period. Someone will do that research; someone will do that typing; someone will print up that report. It will probably be seen by a select group before the minister—or the Premier, in this instance, if he so desires—makes any kind of public statement at all. All of that, undoubtedly, will be done at government expense. Where in the world could you find an estimation even of how that money will be allocated? Under which ministry will that money be spent? How much will it cost? How will it be done?

[4:00]

The members of this House have a very difficult time in determining in a very specific way how moneys will be spent. In fact, the members of this House have a most difficult time in doing so before the money is actually spent. We in this House have great difficulties in examining government expenditures of any kind and, in particular, in examining this kind of supply motion which provides to the government, almost in a moment of urgency, the necessary funds to carry on its business as it sees fit without any serious questioning possible by members of the opposition.

We on this side of the House have made a long and arduous argument to have more accountability on the part of the government. We have attempted, with a revision of the rules of the House, to see if we can determine some technique that really would allow opposition members to investigate expenditures of funds on the part of the government in a detailed and ongoing manner, but that becomes increasingly difficult.

In the instance of this supply motion we would be simply punishing those who least deserve the punishment if we withhold our support. Yet this form of interim supply motion continues to provide us with a very difficult problem—that of supporting the government in a program we disagree with, involving agencies, boards and commissions which we know virtually nothing about. Really, it is asking us to support the financing of an entire mode of government operation and a type of government expenditure where we're not terribly sure what is going on and where we're not terribly sure of how the money will be spent.

We understand that government must continue and that is important to us so we wouldn't want to take this opportunity to deny our support. But I think it does point out several rather clear instances, and in particular the one I mentioned—where a committee of this Legislature, charged by the Legislature to deal with a specific task, is having difficulty finding the funding. It is important to us that we are given the tools, as members of the opposition, to allow us to do our job and, at the same time, to allow the government to continue its business.

We have no desire to stop the business of the province of Ontario or to see that people who work for the government of Ontario are punished unduly, but we are still seeking a means of investigating expenditures of government moneys that allow us to see very clearly and very directly how this government spends its money before the money is spent.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, may I just emphasize at the outset the importance of this debate that is now taking place. There is an historic right on the part of members of Parliament that is time-honoured, in fact, century-honoured. It is that when the government seeks supply of the money with which to carry on its operations, that provides an opportunity for members of Parliament to present grievances and to seek some redress of those grievances.

In this Legislature, for years even the motion to go into committee of supply, which is historically the opportunity to move a want of confidence motion in the government, withered to a point of non-operation, but in my recollection, and I think I'm correct, in some 22 years around this Legislature I don't think there's ever been a debate other than the ritualistic support of a motion to grant interim supply. Therefore, I just want to underline at the outset the importance of this debate in terms of reclaiming for members of the Legislature a really historic right of Parliament. I want to do it with reference to just one grievance—one grievance alone that has been referred to by the last speaker, the hon. member for Oshawa.

In recent years and particularly in recent months, we have been increasingly disturbed with the growing proliferation of agencies, boards and commissions in the province of Ontario. They've grown like Topsy. Some of them have been around since the First World War. Nobody knows exactly what they do. The means of accountability have not been clearly established. There's a grave suspicion, in some instances, that they're really accountable to nobody and from where they get their finances for their continued operations is again another matter of mystery.

Therefore, as this government leads the public concern over the size of government, there has grown up even in its own ranks an interest in so-called sunset laws that would provide a mechanism for the review of these existing boards and agencies so that we can find out whether or not some of them aren't so redundant that they should be wiped out, or whether some of them aren't a duplicate of other organizations so that they should be amalgamated, or whether some of them might more efficiently be drawn back into one or another of the ministries and not have this particular emanation of the Crown because, may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, there are, I understand, from 360 to 370 of them.

That's the general background, but there's an interesting conflict which is emerging which I want to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker. What has built up in this province over the last 40 or 50 years is a dismantling of the historic bureaucracy of patronage, one which is related to the Civil Service Commission. We have moved increasingly to a professional Civil Service Commission by which appointments are made on the basis of ability, experience and training, except at top levels in close relationship to ministers, and not on the basis of friends of the government.

However, at precisely the time we have been dismantling what I would describe as the historic bureaucracy of patronage, this government has been building up a new patronage system in relationship to these 360 agencies, boards and commissions. There are, in the estimation of at least one person, as many as 7,000 to 8,000 people across the province of Ontario who are appointed by the government to an agency, a board or a commission and continue to work without that measure of accountability that I think is necessary and which I noted a moment ago simply doesn't exist.

Who appoints them? Last fall when we had a debate on the resolution that was introduced by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. S. Smith) with regard to sunset legislation, we discovered, and it was drawn firmly to the attention of the House, that the appointments to these agencies, boards and commissions of these thousands of people, this new patronage bureaucracy, is made by a so-called appointments committee. And what is the appointments committee? It is chaired by the deputy minister in the Premier's office, Dr. Stewart. It is staffed by a range of people all of whom are party people, from Mr. Kelly, the bagman, to the gentleman whose name escapes me for the moment who is the organizer for the Conservative Party, and so on. It is exclusively the appointment of people on a patronage basis by the Conservative Party.

If we are going to do something about implementation of a sunset law and the dismantling of this great new patronage bureaucracy, obviously it is a matter of great sensitivity from the government point of view. I wonder if the hon. member for London South (Mr. Walker), who introduced the bill last fall about implementing sunset law, realized the extent to which he was moving into a very tender and sensitive area.

The story in the Globe and Mail that announced the appointment of this new four-man committee last week noted there was a bit of a contrast between what they described as the McKeough approach and the Davis approach. The McKeough approach characteristically was to barge ahead with the sunset law, to review these agencies, boards and commissions and come to some conclusion as to whether they had any legitimacy for continued existence.

The Davis approach is the somewhat more sensitive political approach. He is going to have them reviewed. And who is he going to have them reviewed by? Is it going to be by a committee of this Legislature that would be representative of all parties? No, it is going to be reviewed by what one of the news stories rather euphemistically refers to as the Wiseman group—a group of four Tories, not responsible to this Legislature. It's really a party committee. It's a party committee which is going to review this sensitive area as to how to dismantle this great patronage bureaucracy which the government has built up over the last 40 or 50 years, for most of which it has been in power.

Mr. Laughren: I will believe it when I see it.

Mr. MacDonald: That's one aspect of it. The second aspect of it is that this committee appointed unilaterally, appointed without any consultation with the House, officers of the House, House leaders or anybody else, is now going to move into an area which has all the appearances of being in conflict with a standing committee of this Legislature.

Mr. Foulds: Shameful.

Mr. MacDonald: Last year this government introduced a motion which referred to the standing committee on procedural affairs, chaired by my colleague from Oshawa, the 106 agencies, boards and commissions which are statutorily obligated to table an annual report in this Legislature. In fact, last fall, in the debate on the sunset resolution introduced by the Liberal Party, they tried to extend it to include all 360 agencies, boards and commissions. But the government blocked that.

At least the standing committee on procedural affairs has the obligation of taking a look at those 106 ABCs which must table a report. In the motion that was introduced by the government House leader (Mr. Welch), and passed by this House, establishing the jurisdiction of that committee, it specifically said that one of its responsibilities was to examine the operation of these agencies, boards and commissions that tabled annual reports, and to make recommendations with regard to the legitimacy of their continued existence. Are they redundant and should they be abolished? Should they be amalgamated? Should they be absorbed in one or other of the ministries?

The government now moves unilaterally and sets up a party committee, an all-Tory committee, which presumably is going to usurp something of the responsibilities, if not the total responsibilities, of the standing committee of the Legislature. I acknowledge that the Premier is quoted in the Globe and Mail story on May 24 in this fashion: "In announcing the Wiseman group, Premier Davis said it would not infringe on the legislative authority of the standing committee." I think it's about time this House had some explanation as to how it is not going to encroach on the authority of the standing committee.

Is the standing committee now going to be restricted to a routine review of the annual report and excluded from a review of the legitimacy of the continued existence of that agency, board or commission? If it is, I suggest that is an encroachment on the operation of the standing committee.

Mr. Foulds: Shameful.

Mr. MacDonald: We have had no explanation of it, though. I am not going to take any more time of the House. Sure, this government has to operate, it has to pay civil servants and it has to carry on the business of the province. I hope sometime soon it is going to get away from the chaotic pattern of the presentation of business to this House which has resulted in estimates often coming up in October or November of the year when two-thirds—indeed, sometimes three-quarters—of those estimates have already been spent, making a farce of the whole consideration of estimates.

I hope it will get to the point that estimates will be put in the early stages of each session, and will be considered between the budget and the end of June, in the first quarter or so of the year. I know we have very little right to change any estimate, but let's not make such a total farce of it that we don't even have a consideration to take a look at the estimate until the year is two-thirds or three-quarters over.

Apart from all of that, what we now have is an opportunity to say to the government, "We are voting you interim supply to continue the business of the province, but we are raising with you in pretty sharp and firm fashion the questions as to what you are doing with regard to the whole issue of agencies, boards and commissions."

I want to suggest two basic principles: First, if we are going to finally get around to examining this bureaucratic monstrosity which the government has been responsible for building up, this new patronage bureaucracy which reaches out into almost every community in the province of Ontario, then it should be done by an all-party committee, not by an exclusively Tory committee operating in this sensitive area with a report back to the government that nobody will see the substance of, quite possibly.

Second, it should be done within the framework of the Legislature, within the standing committees of the Legislature. Since it has already referred to the standing committee on procedural affairs at least a certain area of this responsibility, I repeat, I think that ultimately that's where the responsibility should be given in total.

Mr. Foulds: I rise to speak on this motion for interim supply. To start off, I would certainly like to second the comments of the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) and those who have spoken about the boards, agencies and commissions problem.

[4:15]

I want to shift the debate slightly, because I would like to take a moment or two to focus on the cost of health care, and the health care problem. As I look at Ontario's provincial budget, we spend 28 cents of the budget dollar on health care. The Health estimates, as I understand it, won't be up for debate for a considerable period of time. I want to bring to this House a problem that I consider to be urgent and pressing as it affects the residents of Thunder Bay district.

We have had in the past number of years, starting with the present Minister of Health's predecessor, Draconian measures with regard to expenditure and cutbacks in health care in terms of active treatment beds, and extended care beds in northwestern Ontario. We have had recently in the Treasurer's budget—and he's asking for interim supply based on some of the budgetary measures in that budget for the next three months—OHIP increases that are, to say the least, shocking, shameful and outrageous. We have premium increases. We have an increased payment for health care, and yet we are getting in terms of that health care less for more.

Last week in Thunder Bay the Thunder Bay District Health Council released a report called "Panorama of Mortality." That report was a good report. I believe that report was a sound report. As referred to by my colleague from Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren), it was a good honest research report. It was done by a body that is basically funded through government funding from some of the moneys that will be spent over the next three months in this interim supply motion. It was done by a health council that I think is not a tame committee responding merely to the wishes of the central health bureaucracy here in Queen's Park, but one which responds to some genuine concerns and needs of the people in the district of Thunder Bay. It is the kind of health council we should have throughout the province.

What that report showed was that in every category except one the mortality rate in the district of Thunder Bay was greater than that for the province as a whole. There were a number of specific areas. Overall the rate for all ages between 71 and 74 for Thunder Bay was 20 per cent higher than it was for the province as a whole. In several subcategories the rate went up as high as 139 per cent greater than the rate for the province as a whole. Those are serious figures.

I won't go into detail on every item, but I think the report deserves some analysis by the ministry, a further report by the health council itself and some personal examination by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I don't want to interrupt the hon. member but I think that that commitment was given by the minister during question period.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, if I may say to you, I think that some of the answer the minister gave was not fully informed. I was just getting into that. The minister indicated that he had only received the report a few minutes before coming into the House. It is my understanding that the health council sent the report to the minister or if not the ministry, by courier service the moment it was released. It should have been received by the ministry no later than yesterday; and, by courier, presumably it should have been received late last week.

The minister indicated in his answer this afternoon that the district health council would be doing a review of its own report. It is my understanding that they will be making a submission to the minister for some funding to carry out a study as to the reasons for the findings in this initial report. That is, this initial report tells us what people are dying of in the district and at what ages; what we don't know is why. If the review which the minister referred to is the one that I think the district health council intends to undertake, it falls very much within the whole problem of financing in the Ministry of Health in the next three months and subsequently.

For example, the report indicates that, for whatever reasons, we do have a need for more active treatment beds in Thunder Bay district and that, for whatever reasons, we are experiencing a high death rate in the province as a whole. Although the provision of more active treatment beds won't solve the long-range problem—I admit that—it would alleviate some immediate suffering and it might mean that some of those people who now are dying prematurely could, through various measures, have their lives extended.

It seems to me that, in terms of budgetary matters, the Ministry of Health should be looking at funding for other district health councils throughout the province to provide the kind of study that this report provides for the district of Thunder Bay, so that, to analyse the statistics properly, we could have a location-to-location comparison, and not merely a comparison between the district of Thunder Bay and the province as a whole.

I'll give one small example of what I mean. If, for example, in Metropolitan Toronto and the surrounding areas, because of its high population density and perhaps because of the availability of specialist medical services, for example, the death rate is substantially lower than the rate for the province, then it stands to reason that the rate in most other places in the province will be higher and there is therefore not much to panic about in Thunder Bay.

While there should be no cause for panic, I think there is cause for concern and action on the part of the ministry. If we had the comparison, say with Oshawa, Peterborough or Hamilton, perhaps we could get a better idea of the health care system as it is working throughout the province.

Regarding the report, and especially with relation to the Ministry of Health—and the reason I am speaking on this interim supply motion is that, unless we deal with them in interim supply, these problems will not be able to be debated in detail until, as my colleagues from York South indicated, the ministry's estimates come up in the fall—it may mean, for example, that something like the high infant mortality rate needs to be looked at in detail. It is particularly worrying to me that there is an extremely high rate—93 per cent over the figure for the rate for the province—of deaths in infants from “symptoms and ill-defined conditions.” From that, it seems to me that we need to have better early diagnosis, that we need to have additional help for the existing pediatric care and that we probably need more prenatal training. It may mean that we need to have more training for midwives and that we need to have more training for nurse practitioners, because they may be the only people in the remote parts of the district who are available to have a look at early symptoms that are now ignored.

I think it is important that we do a thorough review—and this is one thing that the minister did not mention, I'm afraid. He mentioned the review with respiratory diseases. What he didn't mention is that the current study is looking only at grain handlers exposed to dust. I think it needs to look at the entire work place and the populace as a whole, and I think it would be very useful if the minister would look favourably upon the speeding up of the present study, if that's possible—if it's possible to do it validly and scientifically and still maintain valid results—but also to include also residents of the district.

My former colleague, the former member for Fort William, Mr. Angus—

Mr. Laughren: Ah, great, great member.

Mr. Foulds:—has fought for many years and continues to fight as a private citizen—and I hope soon a public citizen again—on the whole question of respiratory diseases. He has indicated, for example, that there may be some concern with regard not merely to the grain industry but to the pulp and paper industry. That may be something that the Ministry of the Environment, the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of Health should be co-ordinating.

Basically, Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you would concur that most of us who live in the Thunder Bay district agree that it's a very fine place to live. We like it there. We live there by choice. But it seems to me that the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) should look at areas like research and immediate support for immediate problems, such as some additional active treatment beds, such as, for example, upgrading of services, psychiatric services, social work services, counselling services for young people—because of the very high suicide rate in the district. These should be looked at and they should be looked at for the coming year. If, over the next three months, we pre-empt too much of the Health budget, that may not be possible. There has to be some flexibility, it seems to me, in the Ministry of Health budget.

I think we have to meet some very real health care problems that have been pinpointed in the district of Thunder Bay. They have to be looked at seriously. I would hope that the minister, during this period of interim supply, would not hide behind his traditional defence: "We've got a committee of the ministry looking at that; we've got this committee looking at that; that needs a review; we don't have the scientific data."

Mr. Speaker, you know what surprises me? Statistics about death are absolute. You don't have to take a sample. They are all recorded. What surprises me is that this information is not readily available either to the ministry or through the ministry, and this kind of information has not been made public before by the ministry. It would seem to me that the district health council has performed a valuable function by bringing this important and grave information before the public.

Specifically, then, I want to emphasize two points. First, I want to emphasize that in the short term the Minister of Health should not say, carte blanche, that he has no funds whatever. He should say, in the case of a request that came to him last week for more extended care beds in order to free up 60 additional active treatment beds in Thunder Bay, that that should happen immediately.

Secondly, he should agree to provide the necessary funds for the further studies that the district health council needs to undertake to find out why these statistics, these mortality rates, are so high in Thunder Bay in comparison to the province as a whole.

Mrs. Campbell: It seems to me that this is, perhaps, an important debate and an important moment in time, because it is through this particular motion that the funding of this province can continue for the next few months. I am of the opinion that those of us in the opposition must certainly take this opportunity to express our deep concern with the kind of incompetency which we see in this government at this point in time.

I had a series of questions on the order paper which would be within the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Government Services but, obviously, from his reply, not within the minister's competence. One of the questions asked, for example, was: "Has Professor Eric Arthur prepared any reports dealing with the legislative building?" This minister can't answer. He needs more time.

"Will the minister table the reports prepared by Professor Eric Arthur?" This minister is incapable of answering without getting more time.

The answers given in this House by ministers of the Crown are deplorable for the most part; they are hiding behind their opportunity to take more time to answer the simplest question.

The situation in this building is urgent. The problems relating to committees and committee work are urgent, and yet this minister doesn't even appear to know that he has no jurisdiction whatsoever, as it relates to committees and the committee function. But he's going to take the time until, perhaps, somebody can get through to him that we don't need to take delays in the matter. We could, perhaps, cut out some of the waste if we could get someone acting competently on behalf of the members of this Legislature.

This, of course, is one aspect of our problems—when you have people who don't understand; when the minister can't even answer the question: "Has the minister personally familiarized himself with the provisions of sections 93 and 94 of the Legislative Assembly Act?" He needs more time to answer that kind of a question. This, of course, is pettifoggery of the worst type, and why we would be countenancing any interim supply to someone who is unable to answer the simplest questions, I don't know.

Reference has been made here today about the Premier's appointment of a one-party committee to look at boards, agencies and commissions. I would like to know just how much money is allocated to that committee, since the committee on procedural affairs which is vested with that authority has no money to make that kind of an investigation. Yet, we're asked to sit here and approve interim supply for what? I don't know. It's time we started looking at the operation of a government which loves to hide its courses of action any way it can.

Of course, look at the Treasurer's performance with reference to OHIP. Reference was made to that today by my leader and others, and we see, again, the complete contempt of this Treasurer for this House in apparently seeking to raise revenues for general purposes out of the OHIP premiums so that he doesn't have to appear and answer to the House or to the public or to anyone else, and yet he wants us to approve interim supply to carry on the work of this government.

We heard today from the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Norton). Here we have one of the most blatant inadequacies of any ministry as we discuss the matter of the abused child or the battered child. We have seen committees appointed by this ministry and apparently they got lost some place. Certainly there's no accountability from them as to what they found or what they propose. Then they are suddenly replaced by a task force. In the meantime, children are being battered.

I don't support those Children's Aid Societies which undoubtedly and apparently made some bad decisions about children who have been battered. But I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I don't condemn them either in the same way that others do because they don't get the funding they need to do the kind of protective work that is essential in this area.

Mr. Speaker, you may recall some time ago when the hon. member—and I am sorry, I keep thinking of Moonbeam—for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle) was the Minister of Community and Social Services, we raised with him—and he's now three ministers ago—the whole question of the prevention of this kind of abuse. We had a meeting which he called—in fairness at the insistence of not only the opposition but other concerned people in the community. Nothing really came of that meeting. Nothing happened. Children have continued to be abused.

I wonder what money was wasted in all of these delays in attacking the problem. I can recall addressing his successor, who is no longer with us as a minister, and pleading with him to at least do some decent funding through the Sick Children's Hospital so that we could then have a base from which there could be an operation as a network across the province in order to try to cope with this whole horrible problem in our society. An election was coming along and so we dribbled here and there with a little money to this group and a little money to that group, none of which was adequate for any of them, so that they could start all over again doing what there was already expertise for in the Sick Children's Hospital.

This is the way in which we spend money, wastefully, unconcerned with the problem and certainly unconcerned with attacking the problems as they exist. I would love to have each and every member of the government sit in a court and listen to the evidence from doctors and others and look at the photographs of these battered children. Maybe then they would start looking at some way to spend some money usefully in trying to prevent this kind of tragedy. As long as members of the government sit in here, as long as they don't get out there and see it, then they can go on stumbling from one thing to another, always short of enough money to be effective in trying to cure a problem. What the government does, of course, is cost itself more money, and the people of the province more money, because when it spends money inadequately that is what happens. It then has all of the cost taken up in all sorts of different areas. It doesn't really have to examine the financial costs because it can spread it from one ministry to another. But I will tell you something, Mr. Speaker, it doesn't spread those social costs quite the same way, and it is responsible for those social costs, because it has been in charge all these years when these problems have developed and there has been no real attention to them.

In speaking of the participation of the member for Cochrane North, I am not trying to impugn his motives in calling the committee—I think we were all very much aware of his deep concern—but, unfortunately, as he sits there with some of these others who have less concern, he hasn't had the clout that perhaps the Treasurer has in getting through the kinds of things that he desires.

Mr. Laughren: Is that true, Rene?

Mrs. Campbell: No, he's no longer there—that's the point—and the Treasurer is forever with us.

Mr. Haggerty: There is no hope.

Mrs. Campbell: Then we are looking at the situation of money as it pertains to municipalities. We have seen this Treasurer backing off a commitment made. It's funny. He worries so much about irresponsible municipal officials, but municipal officials have a sense of honour and when a commitment is made they do their very level best to carry out that commitment. They don't sit proudly in the front row reneging on every single possible commitment to municipalities on the basis that they might be encouraged to overspend and blame the provincial government.

Let's just look at what has happened. I can recall seeing the same Treasurer, some years ago, to point out the problems of a municipality such as Toronto with the kind of funding that was available to it. Of course, he didn't see fit at that time to take any heed of the proposals we made and the concerns which were expressed. He did, I think a year or so later, with a new budget chief at the city, perhaps more malleable than I was, but he did make some kinds of commitments to the city of Toronto.

He was warned that if we did not get some relief we would find ourselves in the position where the city of Toronto, at least, would be funding certain very important functions on the backs of the taxpayers. He didn't, of course, believe that either. One of the interesting things about this particular Treasurer is that he has all sorts of very strange approaches to prognostications. It wasn't ever going to happen. Last year it did happen, and the city of Toronto did fund its education out of its taxpayers, including its levy at Metro.

I haven't seen this Treasurer yet come forward and say, "All right, that has happened; therefore, we will have to pay to the city of Toronto that portion of the tax which is for educational purposes." Of course not. One is trying to be as niggardly as possible in order to protect one's own position. That is difficult, and I have sympathy with the Treasurer, in that it is always difficult to cover up your errors, unless, of course, you can find some whipping boy to take that kind of punishment. Of course, in this government you always have those irresponsible municipal people to play that role.

[4:45]

It is time that this government faced up to its very long record—not all the time, I won't say this, but latterly—of inefficiency and wastefulness. Yet we are asked to be here to approve interim supply to carry on the purposes—and I wonder, you know, if this government thinks they're the purposes of the people of Ontario or the purposes of this Legislature, or if that supply isn't only for the government's purposes, because this government has a very strange way of trying to differentiate between what it wants and what it thinks the rest of the province is interested in.

Mr. Laughren: They don't believe in minority government.

Mrs. Campbell: No, they don't.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I could go on at length. I recognize the fact that this is in essence an exercise in futility, first of all because the motion will pass after all our protestations because those of us who are responsible people couldn't place this province in the kind of chaotic position it would be in if we didn't. Secondly, because I don't think there's a person over there—certainly sitting there at this point in the front row—who is prepared even to listen to what is wrong with the way in which this government functions today.

I have tried to point out some of the inadequacies. I have tried to point out some of the contempt which I believe the Premier and certainly the cabinet have for this Legislature. And I have tried in some small way to express my concern for those who are really not able to address this House themselves—particularly, as I say, those children who really need our concern and are not getting it because whenever this government wants to delay an issue or has no concern in an issue it appoints task forces and others. Or if it wants to try to take credit for something which has been the initiative of the opposition members, such as the sunset law, then they will appoint people to function in this area.

There is nothing we're voting on at this point which gives any kind of hope to those people who are without jobs. There is nothing in this particular budget to do anything other than allow this government to stumble along for the next three months with very little—very little—encouragement for either the members of this House in their attempts to create some efficiencies or for the people of the province.

I am very saddened that this is so, because I think times are such that all parties in this House, all members in the House, should be pulling together to try to make some improvement in the quality of life for people right across this province. It shouldn't be a partisan approach at all, because the issues are far too serious for the kind of gamesmanship we see here. But I suppose in the nature of things that's exactly what we're going to face. So, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken. I suppose perhaps the member for Cochrane North would recognize the fact that I conclude—as I have heard many of our very fine native people conclude—with some hopelessness and some deep depression about the state of things. Mr. Speaker, I have spoken.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I do want to thank the spokesmen from the opposite side who indicated they would be supporting this particular motion of the government and that the bills will be paid.

The member for Rainy River—not Rainy River; no, he spoke very briefly. He was the soul of—

Mr. Reid: Brevity.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—brevity today. But the members for Nickel Belt, St. George, Oshawa, York South, wandered far and wide in their various comments. Some of them were helpful, some interesting and illuminating, I say to my friends opposite. Of course, as the member for York South correctly pointed out, this is traditional on a supply motion of any kind.

The budget motion itself is really a supply motion. I'm looking at the Clerk who is nodding his head, I think. I suppose that is why the budget motion really is in the same way a wide-ranging debate. The tradition has grown, as the member for York South correctly has pointed out, over I suppose hundreds of years, that on supply, members can say what they want—some of it helpful, some of it not so helpful.

I will only answer just one small point. I was interested in the remarks from the member for York South. I am sorry he is not here to hear what is a very brief and will be a very inadequate reply to the rhetoric of what he had to say about the new committee which the Premier (Mr. Davis) announced last week. The committee has obviously upset the member for York South and several other members in his own party. Finally the member for St. George picked up that refrain as well and echoed it—to some extent at any rate.

I would simply point out the genesis of the committee. It was over a year ago, as I recall, that members agreed to enhance responsibilities for the standing committees, which has been referred to. It is my understanding that committee last session was first to be chaired by the member for York South. It is now being chaired by the member for Oshawa and the member for York South has assumed the position of vice-chairman. I'll come back to that.

During the debate last fall on the sunset resolution of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. S. Smith), the government—we were referred to earlier today as being apoplectic and perhaps that isn't far off the mark. In listening to the Leader of the Opposition, he was calling for legislation which was going to have committees, boards, agencies, commissions, ABCs—called continually before some committee and sunset them all. There was no orderly progression as to what he wanted to do. If we became apoplectic over the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, so be it.

But we were not comforted by his particular approach to the very serious matter of getting down to looking at whether some agencies or boards need changing, combining, are redundant, or are doing the job that was originally set out for them by the Legislature—whether it was still necessary that that job today be carried out. This is a very serious business indeed, and one which should not be taken lightly. We certainly were not impressed by the scatter-gun approach that the Leader of the Opposition was proposing in examining that whole subject.

Mr. Reid: Well, it got you moving.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Then during that debate on sunset, as I recall, the House leader (Mr. Welch) made an undertaking that virtually any report tabled here could be referred—and I think automatically—to the standing committee chaired now by the member for Oshawa. I will close by saying to the member for York South, who chaired that committee previously and who spoke so long and so eloquently today—

Mr. Laughren: Not so long.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—I say to the member for Oshawa who now chairs the committee—he was shorter and not as eloquent but he did speak on the same subject—as the chairmen of that committee in successive years, what have they done about it? What annual reports have they looked at? It's fine to stand here and criticize the appointment of four government members to get on with the job. But the member for York South should look at his own diary, refer to his own notes, to see just how many meetings of the committee he called and what he did about getting on with what is obviously a very important job.

Mr. Laughren: You can't transfer guilt that easily.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member for York South was talking out of both sides of his mouth—

Mr. Laughren: You are too.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—and the new chairman of the committee, the member for Oshawa, is going to follow in the same footsteps, it would appear.

Mr. Foulds: That's a complete fabrication and you know it. That is a complete fabrication.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: And, therefore, with no expenditure of government funds—

Mr. Laughren: It's your responsibility. You're the government.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: They haven't even met.

Mr. Foulds: You guys were so obstructionist it took us six months to get a letter. You don't even know how many boards, agencies and commissions you've got. You don't even have a list of them in the Premier's office.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Listen, I've dealt with a lot more boards, agencies and commissions than that committee which has yet to call anybody in front of it. You're just talk over there, just talk.

Mr. Laughren: You set them up.

Mr. Foulds: You're just wind.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You're abusing the time of this House in the historic voting of supply on an interim basis by talking such rubbish over there, because your former leader and your near leader, the member for Oshawa, have never got down to the business at hand.

Mr. Foulds: How are you going to finance that committee? Are you going to finance it out of your party hacks' contributions? Or are you going to do it out of government funding?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Now, within our responsibility—

Mr. Foulds: If there is government funding for your hack committee, why isn't there for the procedural affairs committee?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —we discard and reject the scatter-gun approach of the Leader of the Opposition. We simply can't wait for that tired old socialist chairman of the committee, past or present, to get under way, so we appointed our own committee of fine, well-spoken, albeit Tory, members, who are going to do a very fine job—

Mr. Foulds: How do you know?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —of doing what your former leader twice removed was supposed to have done, and what your near leader—who has just come into the House—is thinking about doing. While they are talking, we'll get on with the job.

Mr. Foulds: You're speaking out of both sides of your mouth and the back of your neck at the same time.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, again, thank you for your kindness, for your forbearance, and I thank my colleagues opposite for agreeing to vote supply. Civil servants will be paid. Stationery will be ordered.

Mr. Germa: Don't hide behind the skirts of civil servants.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: People, paper and things will be looked after. And last, but not least, the member for Rainy River, high tax bracket that he finds himself in—by his own choice, I might say, because he could do something about it; he could move into a much higher range of deductions—

Mr. Reid: That's true. I will suffer along with the higher taxes.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —something which is available to all of us. The member for Rainy River will be able to look forward to receiving his cheque after April 1, which is something all of us can go to bed feeling a great deal happier about tonight. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Foulds: Bombast and bereft of substance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Motion agreed to.

TOBACCO TAX AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Maeck moved second reading of Bill 25, An Act to amend the Tobacco Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I have a very short opening statement, Mr. Speaker. Bill 25 proposes amendments to the Tobacco Tax Act to reflect the objectives announced in the Treasurer's (Mr. McKeough) March 7 budget. Specifically, this bill increases the rate of tax on cigarettes, cigars and cut tobacco products. It also increases the compensation paid after April 1, 1978, to appointed tobacco tax collectors.

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few comments to Bill 25, and to support it. I'm not too happy about supporting any government tax increase, but I understand the difficulties that the Treasurer is in with the province of Ontario with deficit spending and deficit financing.

Mr. Laughren: If it's regressive, you'll support it, Ray.

Mr. Haggerty: It's a luxury tax that is perhaps acceptable to a great number of people in the province of Ontario, and it has little effect or little impact upon the tax increase in this particular area. It's one area where the government can have access to this additional revenue, and this is the area they chose to go to this year in raising some $30 million.

The minister did mention something about the section that applies to the collectors, I believe it is, in the province of Ontario. Just how many collectors do we have in this particular area and what would their income be?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister can make a note of that and reply at the appropriate time.

Mr. Haggerty: Those are all the comments I have, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Speaker, we in this party are also going to support this bill in principle. However, there are a number of concerns that we have with the bill. We are happy, for example, to see the increased payment to those who collect the taxes; and I suppose we are able to accept the increases in taxes that the minister has laid out. Unfortunately, the minister has failed to note in his opening statement that this bill is not all increase. That's where our concern comes in.

We understand the government's need to raise additional revenues. We also understand all of the arguments that have been used over the year about tobacco being a luxury product and the need to tax luxury products or luxury commodities. However, the bill contains one major contradiction. The contradiction is in the area of the proposed taxes on cigars and specifically in subsection 1(f) of the bill.

Subsection 1(c) of the bill proposes that the tax on cigars whose retail price before tax is seven cents or less shall remain unchanged.

Mr. Laughren: That's a disgrace, Lorne.

Mr. Charlton: Subsection 1(d) of the bill proposes a one-cent tax increase on cigars retailing for more than seven cents but not more than 10 cents before taxes. Subsection 1(e) proposes an increase in tax of one cent for all cigars whose retail price is greater than 10 cents but not greater than 90 cents before taxes.

[5:00]

The contradiction comes in subsection 1(f), which puts a maximum on the tax of 39 cents for all cigars whose retail price before taxes is more than 90 cents.

Mr. Braugh: It's those Tueros; do you know them?

Mr. Laughren: You've been had by the Treasurer again, Lorne—like every preceding Minister of Revenue.

Mr. Charlton: The contradiction is twofold. Firstly, in the Tobacco Tax Act as it now exists, the tax on cigars is fairly uniform throughout, with a maximum tax of 40 per cent against the cost of any cigar. The tax is assessed on a five-cent price range, or any portion thereof; so the tax fluctuates slightly as a percentage of the retail cost, depending upon whether the price is the first or the last cent of a five-cent range. However, the tax at present is fairly uniform and the maximum is 40 per cent on all cigars.

In this new bill, the tax on cigars is fairly uniform as a percentage of retail cost up to 90 cents, although the tax does decrease slightly as the price increases. However, as the retail price of cigars before taxes goes over 90 cents, the decrease in taxes as a percentage of the retail price is dramatic.

Mr. Reid: Now we know what the NDP researchers have been doing for the last month.

Mr. Charlton: With this Bill 25, we have a situation where the taxes on cigars between zero and 90 cents will range between 40 and 50 per cent of their retail price before taxes. Cigars whose retail price before taxes is greater than 90 cents will receive a significant decrease in taxes, both as a percentage of their cost and in actual cents.

Mr. Foulds: Shameful.

Mr. Laughren: Typical.

Mr. Foulds: A typical Tory cigar tax.

Mr. Charlton: We have a situation where, in the case of a cigar whose retail price is $1, the tax will actually be one cent less than it is under the bill as it now exists and it drops below the 40 per cent level that we had before.

Mr. Reed: How much does the Premier pay for his cigars?

An hon. member: He smokes a pipe now.

Mr. Charlton: On a cigar whose retail price is $2—

Mr. Braugh: Whew, I saw one once.

Mr. Charlton:—there will be 41 cents less in tax payable than under the present bill, or only 19½ per cent on its retail cost before taxes. The contradiction is that this luxury, cigars, will be more costly for those who can least afford it and less costly for those who can best afford it.

Mr. Foulds: Typical Tory taxation.

Mr. Braugh: They are caught with their hands in the humidior.

Mr. Charlton: Surely people who buy cigars that cost 90 cents or greater, plus tax, have more disposable income and more excess income to spend on luxuries than those who buy 10-cent cigars.

Mr. Reed: You better start smoking better cigars.

Mr. Charlton: I am terribly upset with this proposal. I am upset because it reflects for me the government's whole approach to increased revenues. Time and time again this government has used methods to increase revenues that are regressive and which hit hardest those who can least afford it. We have only to take a look at some of the other measures in the present budget to realize that—the OIIP increases and so on.

Mr. Germa: Shame.

Mr. Charlton: We in this party cannot accept this kind of proposal, to increase taxes at the bottom end and decrease taxes at the top end. During the committee stage we will be moving amendments that we hope will rectify this problem. We ask our Liberal friends beside us at least to have a serious look at—

Mr. Breagh: This will be a test.

Mr. Charlton:—what this government is doing. Although he's not here now, we ask the Treasurer to have a serious thought about his role in this whole thing as well.

Mr. Reed: The government may fall on a 90-cent cigar.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member for Sudbury East.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Nickel Belt.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Sorry, Nickel Belt.

Mr. Laughren: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank the Minister of Revenue for drawing it to your attention as well.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I know where the member comes from.

Mr. Laughren: I know there were some smiles in this chamber when my colleague from Hamilton Mountain was talking about the tax on cigars, as though it were a trivial matter. What bothers us about this is that the government never makes this kind of mistake the other way. The Treasurer has consistently used the Minister of Revenue to defend the indefensible in years gone by, and he has continued to do it with the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Maeck). We don't think that's right, but as long as the Minister of Revenue has to defend the tax bills of the Treasurer, I guess it will always be so. It's really strange, isn't it, that—

Mr. Foulds: Would you name the man sitting in the government House leader's seat, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Kerrio: It is highly irregular.

Mr. Laughren: It may not seem significant but when this bill becomes law someone who buys a $2 cigar pays 41 cents less, I believe, than he does at present. I think that is important because it reveals the kind of attitude the government has towards regressive taxation. That simply is regressive taxation. I think this is a mistake by the way. It's hard to believe the Treasurer would be so foolish as to put in tax legislation that would make someone who buys a $2 cigar pay less than he does at the present time, when the sole purpose of the legislation is to increase revenues to the province of Ontario by $30 million.

Mr. Ruston: An imported cigar too, probably.

Mr. Laughren: I am convinced that this is a mistake. I find it hard to believe that the Treasurer is suggesting that people in Ontario buy more Cuban cigars. I know what his doctrinaire economic philosophy is. He wouldn't for a moment suggest we buy Cuban cigars that sell for $1 or more. He simply wouldn't do it.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Revenue should seriously consider the amendment that will be put by my colleague from Hamilton Mountain. If the Minister of Revenue chooses not to accept the amendment by my colleague—and I have one as well which would go partially towards accomplishing the same goal, except that my amendment does not impose a new tax—then I would suggest to the minister that what he has got himself into is a bind because the Treasurer has slipped one by him.

That always happens. I have been here six and a half years and I have yet to see a debate on tax bills go through in which the Minister of Revenue is not embarrassed by something the Treasurer has slipped by him. I would suggest that that's exactly what's happened here and that the Minister of Revenue should right here and now dig in his heels and say, "I will not be a hack or a flunky to the Treasurer any more. As Minister of Revenue, I have my rights too."

Mr. Makarchuk: Yes, assert yourself.

Mr. Laughren: I want to tell the minister that we will support him. I am sure our colleagues in the Liberal Party—

Mr. Haggerty: I smoke $2 cigars.

Mr. Laughren:—see the insanity of lowering taxes on $2 cigars when the purpose of the bill is to increase revenues to the province of Ontario. I don't know how anyone can resist the kind of logic that is inherent in the amendment that will be put by my colleague for Hamilton Mountain, and I would encourage members to support it.

Mr. G. I. Miller: I, too, would like to speak on the increase in the tobacco tax. If you are not aware, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make you aware that I do represent an area that produces much of the tobacco in Ontario. Norfolk county was the first county to produce tobacco to any extent, and that goes back many years, I think to the twenties. It has provided a good return for the agriculture industry there, and it has been the backbone in the last 25 to 30 years. If anyone has the opportunity to come down to that part of Ontario, I think he will realize what it has contributed to the economy of this great province of ours.

I was just going over Hansard, and it was only last June 29 that we were discussing this very same issue. At that time, there was an increase of about 40 per cent in the tax on tobacco. Now again, less than a year later, I see another increase of approximately 20 per cent. I would like to point out that it is an agricultural product that we are taxing, and I think that while it is somewhat of a controversial issue our party has said it will support it.

I would like to make it very clear what it has contributed to Ontario. It is an agricultural product, and it does concern me a little bit that only the Premier can smoke those big fat cigars. I used to like them myself. Since the fact that a Marguerite and a White Owl, the average guy's cigars, are up to about $1.75 a pack, it does seem a little extravagant. Consequently, I have got out of the habit, although I do use a pipe and smoke the odd cigarette.

As was indicated, we do import our cigars from Cuba and other areas offshore, and with unemployment the way it is maybe the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) should take a look at producing a cigar from our own tobacco, and maybe we could look for new markets. I think that is the direction in which we should be going. To the average smoker, a pack of 25 cigarettes costs about $1.10 now. It doesn't matter what wage bracket you are in, it creates a hardship. I think we have to take that into consideration, too. While a balanced budget is what the Treasurer is leaning towards, I don't think we should do it at the expense of a flourishing industry such as the tobacco industry.

I think we should be encouraging production. Last year, I think we were utilizing the tobacco rights at about 46 per cent. While they did have a good crop in 1977, one of the better crops, and they are finding the markets exceptionally good, perhaps because of the devaluation of the dollar, which has been helpful, I still think we could encourage an acreage increase and look for export markets to expand that industry rather than tax it out of existence.

I am pleased to speak on behalf of my producers, the tobacco farmers in my area. Hopefully, the government will take this into consideration and at least keep the tax increase within the same guidelines as those affecting wages and rent increases. I would hope in the future that this would be given greater consideration.

[5:15]

Mr. Foulds: I just want to say a few words. First of all, I would really like to call to the minister's attention the brilliance of the point put by my colleague, the member for Hamilton Mountain, with regard to this particular task. I think although individual members might have some reservations, all parties in the Legislature generally look upon tobacco tax as a luxury tax. That is one of the major arguments that is used that makes us accept it.

I sometimes think we may be getting to the point that we're taxing anything that is considered to be slightly sinful or slightly fun, or both.

Mr. Reed: The wages of sin.

Mr. Foulds: It's not popular for legislators to oppose an increase in taxes on tobacco because of the arguments put about how harmful this is and how it increases our hospitalization costs and it creates diseases by choice.

Mr. Reed: The government is living off the avails.

Mr. Foulds: That's exactly the point that I want to make. I thank the member for putting it so succinctly. The government itself is living off the avails of these vices, if you like. It seems to me that as a Minister of Revenue and as a Treasurer they have to give some consideration to this continual taxing of a so-called luxury. If it is considered a luxury tax, then it seems to me that the government must be consistent and carry that all the way through, so the point that my colleague from Hamilton Mountain makes is that you really tax the luxury items of the luxurious—the $2 cigars.

Mr. Laughren: They tax them less.

Mr. Foulds: What happens is that instead of doing that, instead of really taxing those luxurious luxuries, the government is taxing more heavily the common or garden variety of cigars, if I may say so, and letting the orchids go free.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is really a matter of degree.

Mr. Foulds: In a nutshell, this particular tax encapsulates the whole Tory philosophy of taxation: Hit the low-income and the middle-income groups; leave the high-income groups. You put a ceiling on it so you can have a regressive form of taxation.

Mr. Turner: That is ridiculous.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: How many of the low-income group smoke cigars?

Mr. Mancini: Do you smoke cigars?

Mr. Foulds: In this one little tax with this clause 1(s) you have a most regressive form of taxation. I want to say that I have no vested interest in this particular bill.

Mr. Haggerty: How many $2 cigars do you smoke?

Mr. Foulds: I don't smoke a five-cent cigar, let alone a $2 cigar.

Mr. Makarchuk: I wouldn't smoke a five-cent cigar anyway.

Mr. Turner: You smoke a pipe though.

Mr. Foulds: I think the minister should accept the proposal that is going to be put forward by my colleague, the member for Hamilton Mountain. It will certainly make the tax more sensible. It will certainly make the tax more progressive, and it may even avoid the contradiction in this kind of taxation; one of the theories is they're used as deterrent taxes and that as one increases taxes on this kind of item the revenue will decrease.

We all know that those who can buy $2 or $3 cigars or what have you will continue to buy them because they'll be able to afford them, whereas as my friend from Haldimand-Norfolk indicated the guy who buys a pack of White Owl or Old Port may cut down and therefore cut down the government's revenue and cut down on the avails that it lives off through this form of taxation.

So I would strongly recommend that when we get to committee stage, if the minister accepts the proposed amendment, he should perhaps have a huddled conference with his colleague, the Treasurer. I'm sure that the Treasurer will be glad to know that opposition parties are in favour of one portion of one tax increasing. It may even get him some additional revenue so that he can meet that mystical, magic moment that he wants to make in 1981, a balanced budget. The additional revenue can be obtained this way, in some small way, by the suggestion by my colleague from Hamilton Mountain. I'm sure that the minister should accept it.

I just want to say one last thing, because I think for the first time since I've been a member of this Legislature we have as Minister of Revenue a man of some courage and a man of some thoughtfulness and a man of some competence. I want to underline the points that my colleague from Nickel Belt made. We have generally had as a Minister of Revenue a front man—

Mr. Laughren: Or lady.

Mr. Foulds: —or lady, a front person for the Treasurer, a minister who simply takes the flak on the tax bills that the Treasurer imposes. This particular minister, when he was chief government whip, had the courage to chew out his then so-called superior cabinet ministers for not attending to their duties in the Legislature. I think it is time this minister chewed out the Treasurer for not thinking through his taxes and having to carry the can for him.

Mr. Makarchuk: He might set a tradition that would be appreciated over there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to participate in this debate? If not, the hon. minister.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the members opposite realize that tax policies in the province of Ontario are brought in by the Treasurer—

Mr. Laughren: All too well; we know it all too well.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: —and implemented by the Minister of Revenue. I am sure that they are aware that that is the way it has been in the past and probably that's the way it will be in the future or the Minister of Revenue wouldn't need to be here at all, I suppose.

Mr. Laughren: Well, you suggested it.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: It wasn't really a mistake.

Mr. Laughren: That's even worse.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: There are some reasons that we adopted the policy we now have before the House in the legislation. One of the main reasons is simply that even with taking the 90 per cent maximum in cigars we are away beyond any of the other provinces. All of them are much below that. We are much higher than any other province. In other words, we are collecting taxes on cigars at a higher price than any other province at the present time.

Mr. Laughren: We are just asking you to be consistent.

Mr. Makarchuk: It didn't stop you in the case of OHIP.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: We talked about the fact that expensive cigars are imported, and some of them are, but not all of them are. Many of them are hand made here in Ontario and Quebec, and if we increase the taxes we are then going to be perhaps putting the small manufacturer in a bad position.

Mr. Laughren: All OHIP bills are paid here in Ontario, Lorne.

Mr. Reed: Is that the Canadian tobacco firm?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Yes. Let me also say that cigars as a total represent only three per cent of the revenue from the Tobacco Tax Act. It is a very small amount.

Mr. Laughren: It's the principle involved.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Last year we collected something like $150 million in this branch of the ministry; only $4.5 million of it was from the tobacco tax—at least, from cigars.

Mr. Laughren: The principle is offensive. It's the ability to pay.

Mr. Foulds: It's an offensive principle you have established.

Mr. Reed: It keeps the superministries going.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Forty per cent of cigars sold sell for seven cents or less and that's the area that has the smallest percentage of taxes.

Mr. G. I. Miller: They are just big cigarettes.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: The tax is two cents and that has remained unchanged. We haven't increased that at all. The member for Port Arthur suggested that it would be the low income group that would be hit mostly by these taxes. It really isn't so, because we didn't increase the tax on the seven-cent cigar.

Mr. Makarchuk: For seven cents, you are not going to get much of a cigar.

Mr. Foulds: Do you have any brand names? Are these known as Brand X?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: The other thing is, how many people on low incomes smoke cigars to start with? There aren't that many. The member for Erie asked about the number of collectors there are in the province. There are 146 collectors. With the new legislation it would cost in the neighbourhood of $90,000. That's what they would receive.

Mr. Foulds: I don't think those cigars use tobacco.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I have very little extra to add. I am not at this point in time going to debate the proposed amendments. I want to see whether they are, in fact, introduced. I would question whether or not the Speaker or the Chairman would find that those amendments were in order.

Mr. Foulds: You can introduce them.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I would refer the hon. members to section 86 of the standing orders.

Mr. Laughren: Lorne, don't be petty.

Mr. Foulds: Quit hiding behind the rules.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I believe that we are justified in going ahead with the proposals as they now stand. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Laughren: I am surprised.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered to committee of the whole House.

RETAIL SALES TAX AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Maeck moved second reading of Bill 27, An Act to amend the Retail Sales Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Bill 27 proposes amendments to the Retail Sales Tax Act to attain certain budgetary policy objectives, and specifically these are to further assist Ontario in coming to grips with the need for energy conservation. This bill proposes to expand existing exemptions for energy conservation materials and equipment to include storm doors and windows.

Mr. Laughren: That again.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: The bill strengthens the hospitality industry's competitive position within Canada and internationally. Retail sales tax will be removed from all accommodation, including the full price of hospitality services sold at an all-inclusive price under the American plan until the end of 1979.

In order to narrow the disparity existing in the taxation of the various forms of land transportation, and to further meet the objectives of the budgetary policies, this bill proposes the removal of existing exemptions for railway rolling stock. This includes railways, subways, railways in mines, and other such items.

The bill also includes an expansion of the definition of fair value designed to produce greater equity among retailers of similar products. Most retailers must sell their products at an all-inclusive price. The amendment will cause all retailers to collect tax on the same basis.

There are also several other important amendments contained in this bill and these deal with the matter of promotional giveaways, catalogues and suchlike. Members may be aware of a recent decision in the Supreme Court of Canada concerning the application of the New Brunswick retail sales tax to catalogues. The court found that the New Brunswick tax did not apply. In Ontario, we have held since 1961 that the retail sales tax applies to catalogues and other promotional distributions and that the consumer of these items is the promotional distributor.

The purpose of the amendments in this area is to reaffirm and clarify Ontario's policy. The amendments in no way reflect any change in policy. Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the amendments clarify what is a promotional distributor, who is a promotional distributor, and they make clear that the purchaser of such materials is a distributor and the distributor must pay the tax. In addition, the bill clarifies that the recipient of this type of material, when he or she receives it free, is not liable for tax.

As I noted earlier, Mr. Speaker, these changes concerning promotional giveaways are for clarification and greater certainty and do not represent any change in the taxation policy of the government.

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few comments to Bill 27, and thank the minister for his explanatory notes.

I agree, and I think our party will, with the principle of the amendments. I'm concerned about the matter of the retail sales tax, and I thought perhaps the minister might go a little bit further—perhaps the Treasurer should have gone a little bit further—in reducing the whole provincial sales tax.

We do welcome the extension of the exemption, I guess it is, of the sales tax on insulation and energy conservation programs, such as relates to storm doors and windows. I mentioned, I think a year ago, during the estimates of the ministry, that I thought this area alone would create a number of jobs in the province of Ontario, particularly as it relates to the storm doors and storm windows. It's pretty labour-intensive and I'm sure that it will add to the employment opportunities in Ontario.

[5:30]

I also thought the minister might have included thermal pane windows. I thought they should have been included in here, since I'm sure they will conserve energy.

Regarding the matter of the exemption available at present for railway rolling stock and repairs thereto, I'm a little bit sceptical about that particular section of the bill. There's no doubt that the cost of the taxes generated by this provision will be passed on to those persons using GO trains and GO buses, and the additional cost will be reflected in fares to help supplement the seven per cent increase in sales tax. Although it will raise approximately $359 million between the loan and trust companies, it's quite an amount that's going to be raised by this particular tax levy. I question at this time of energy conservation whether we should be hitting the pocketbook of those persons using the GO Transit system and even of those using bus service in the province of Ontario. No doubt this will have some impact on the fare rates.

The matter of the tax break given to the travel and tourist industry is welcomed by the tourist industry in the province of Ontario in that the sales tax on meals and rooms is being removed. While I think that will be some help, again the government comes back and increases the taxes on alcohol. The government takes it from one hand and puts it in the other; it's like robbing Peter to pay Paul. I don't know whether this is going to help the tourist industry or not. I think the government is going to move further in this particular area.

The government is talking about increasing the building of new tourist establishments and the renovating of older establishments. This should create employment, but I don't think this is going to be good enough. If the government really wants to increase employment in this particular area it's going to have to remove the sales tax in this area also to encourage the upgrading of our tourist establishments in the province of Ontario. We pay perhaps the highest, in this area, of any of the provinces, and even in comparison to the United States. The room rates are still away beyond the ability of the travelling public to handle. I suggest that the government, in looking at the area of employment and job creation programs, should be considering removal of the sales tax in this whole industry. I think that's the area the government should be looking at. If it really wants to get the tourist industry to move, the government should be moving in this direction.

I've heard an old saying that as soon as the Canadian dollar is devalued, as it was, say five per cent, a few years ago, that it encourages tourists to travel into Ontario and into Canada. Today, the Canadian dollar is at its lowest level and yet we're not bringing the tourists in from other countries. If we are going to encourage bringing in tourists into Ontario, the government is going to have to take harder measures than it has to relieve the taxes in this area.

My other area of concern is that the Treasurer should have brought in some amendments to the Retail Sales Tax Act. The bill indicates there are areas where the government is going to create jobs. If the government is looking at having a balanced budget and full employment in the economy, it isn't going to happen in the province of Ontario. We can't have further layoffs across the province with unemployment as high as it is now. Questions were asked about the Niagara region this afternoon during the question period; there is unemployment of about 11.5 per cent to 12 per cent in that area, and yet it's supposed to be a highly industrialized area.

One can find industry closing down and phasing out jobs all across Ontario, yet we have nothing definite in here to say that we're going to do something to create jobs. We can't have industry building huge inventories if the general public is not buying. In 1975, when the Treasurer reduced the sales tax on automobiles to five per cent at that time, there was a boom in sales of automobiles. There is no doubt that in the long run it did generate extra revenue for the province because more people were buying. As long as the government is going to have high sales tax here in Ontario, I don't think it is going to have an upswing in the economy. Until it takes some drastic action to reduce the sales tax, it is not going to encourage public spending.

If the government isn't going to be spending money in projects, then it has to look to the private sector. But we must have something there to encourage the private sector and to encourage the consumer to buy their products. I suggest to the minister if he wants to get rid of the lagging economy in Ontario that he should be taking this approach. There's no doubt the Treasurer will have to bring in a supplementary budget because we have been in a recession now since 1944 with no improvement in our economy, no jobs.

Mr. Foulds: What have the federal Liberals been doing about that?

Mr. Haggerty: We will let them worry about that. I am not elected at the federal level; I am elected here. I think one of the problems here is the responsibility of this government—

Mr. Mancini: Like a fish out of water.

Mr. Haggerty: —to get the economy rolling. It is not good enough for the Premier of Ontario to go to Ottawa and come up with a program and say, "I have a program here that's going to create 500,000 new jobs." Then he talks about energy programs out in Alberta and in the Northwest Territories which have little impact on employment for the people of Ontario. We will get a certain break out of it but I think the matter rests with this government here, if we are serious in the matter of unemployment.

It is going to have to take a second look at reducing the sales tax. In the overall picture, as I said before, we can't have a huge inventory. Almost every manufacturing firm in Ontario has a large inventory, and if we don't have the consumers to purchase it, the government is going to lose additional sales tax. One way to generate more revenue and more employment is to reduce the sales tax. I think the Canadian Manufacturer's Association suggested that to the government, and the Chamber of Commerce in the province has suggested that too, and I think it is going to have to take a good hard look at it.

But we support the bill in principle. It doesn't go quite far enough, but we will support it.

Mr. Charlton: Again we find ourselves in the position where we are going to have to support the principles that this bill expresses. But we have a number of serious reservations and a number of questions that we feel should be answered before the bill is passed.

The reason we have these reservations and questions is that our support for some of the proposals in the bill is based on a lot of "ifs" and "mays." First, with the repeal of the exemption presently available for railway rolling stock and repairs, has the government done any studies which clearly show what effect the removal of this tax exemption is going to have on the industries that produce the rolling stock in this province? We have Canadian Car in Thunder Bay and National Steel Car in Hamilton that are producing rolling stock and providing jobs in the province.

I don't know whether the Minister of Revenue can answer the question or not since the tax changes are obviously being proposed by the Treasurer. But has the government, has the Treasurer, has anybody done studies which will show what effect the removal of this tax exemption is going to have on the competitive position of those industries? How is it going to affect jobs? I haven't seen anything which indicates the answers to those questions and I am sure everybody on this side of the House would be more than happy to see some answers.

There's another question related to rolling stock: Has the government done any studies or does the government have any figures to show how the removal of this tax exemption is going to affect a city like Metropolitan Toronto where they rely rather heavily on railway rolling stock in their public transit system? Does the government know how many additional dollars this is going to cost the city of Toronto, and the province as well, in order to pay that tax on rolling stock?

Secondly, in the case of the proposal to exempt the rental price of rooms in hotels and motels, et cetera, again we are going to support this proposal for the dollars it may generate in the tourist industry—and I emphasize the "may"—and the new jobs it may create in the tourist industry—and again I emphasize the "may."

I go back for a moment to a point that was raised by the member for Erie (Mr. Haggerty). The government gives a tax exemption to the hotel industry and then it turns around, raises the taxes on alcohol and takes some more money out of their revenue. It sometimes seems like taking the money from one hand and putting it into the other. The only problem is that the government ends up adding costs in between. Has the government done any studies which project how many dollars this tax exemption will create in the tourist industry or how many jobs this tax exemption will create in the tourist industry? I haven't seen any such studies; none of us on this side of the House has.

The Canadian dollar is down right now. That's obviously going to add some potential for stimulus in the tourist industry. But it is really questionable how much stimulus this tax exemption is going to provide. I would really be interested in seeing any facts or any studies the government has done on the effects of this tax exemption. At the same time that it is giving this exemption, it is allowing gasoline prices to go up in the province of Ontario, and the tourists have to get here somehow. Campsite fees are all going up this year, and it's all an integral part of the tourist industry in this province. I would really like to see something on just what effect this tax exemption is going to have.

I think all of us on this side of the House are probably happy to see the tax exemption for storm doors, storm windows and screens and so on. But it is not really a huge stimulus to the consumer sector of this province and it is not really the answer to the economic problems we are having. I don't really see anything in this bill that is going to provide a great stimulus across the province to job creation or to the overall economy.

Before we finish third reading of this bill, I would seriously like to see some facts and figures and some projections on exactly what the government expects these proposals to accomplish.

Mr. Reed: I would like to dwell for a few minutes on one section of the bill as it pertains to energy conservation and to point out that we welcome the addition of the tax exemption for storm doors and windows. While my friend to the left has suggested that it won't create any stampede in this direction, it does represent at least a symbolic gesture towards encouraging energy conservation in the home.

I would like to point out an area here that perhaps has been overlooked by the minister or perhaps not—and it would be interesting to have his comments. There is now a group of exemptions pertaining to energy conservation. They involve insulation, wood stoves and so on. But a number of the necessary accessories to some of these purchases are not exempt from taxation. One example would be chimneys. One can buy a wood stove tax-exempt but when one buys the chimney, he pays taxes on it. This creates something of a difficulty for the retailer who really doesn't know whether he should be exempting a product or not. This has resulted in a certain amount of confusion in the manufacturing industry.

For instance, there is a heat exchanger which is being sold for installation in existing fireplaces. The effect of the heat exchanger is to raise the thermal efficiency of what is a grossly inefficient combustion unit from about eight to 12 per cent up to about 25 or 30 per cent. Yet, that Thermo-grade—as it is called—that's one of the brand names for it—is taxed. It is not tax exempt, and yet it is one of the very direct ways in which energy can be saved in a great number of homes.

As we know, fireplaces have been built in thousands upon thousands of homes across Ontario and only a small percentage as yet contain any form of efficiency raising device such as the things we commonly understand as—I think one brand name is Heatilator. Here is another heat exchanger unit which is an add-on to an existing fireplace. It's a very practical thing, a very good idea, and yet the manufacturer feels compelled to charge the tax through to the retailer and the retailer is compelled to charge the provincial sales tax.

This has created confusion in my riding. I have now, in one small area, three new businesses that have started in the last year which are devoted solely to the conservation of energy and to the related hardware, and yet some of the goods that they sell are tax exempt and some of them are not. I would hope the minister would take it upon himself when he's making his windup statement on this bill to clarify this situation, either to recognize that these things might have been genuinely overlooked when they were being considered or whether he would, in fact, consider them for future addition.

Mr. Foulds: It is a little difficult to speak on principle on a bill such as this, which is really a dog's breakfast in terms of what it does, because it increases taxes in some areas and exempts taxes in other areas and they all have to do with the retail sales tax.

Hon. Mr. Maccek: All housekeeping.

Mr. Foulds: There are three particular items that I would like to speak on. As my colleague has indicated, our party will be supporting the bill on second reading, although we have some questions, and I think even though we don't have any amendments to this bill, we will ask for the bill to go into committee to get some specific questions answered with regard to certain sections of the bill.

First of all, we do approve wholeheartedly the exemption on storm doors and windows. One of my particular worries is that, as has been raised by the previous speaker—to whom I give credit in terms of his continuing battle, both in committee of this Legislature and in the House, on conservation matters in terms of energy; there are members of the House who have similar concerns, but I think he expresses those particularly ably and well—I notice that in the definition of the change in the legislation they say “storm windows and storm doors as defined by the minister.”

I would hope that in the definition that comes out in the regulations, Thermopane, as the previous speaker mentioned, is included, because in the area that I come from in northern Ontario many ordinary people that I've talked to are looking at triple glazing. I think that obviously should be one of the things that is allowed and encouraged in terms of conservation of energy. I don't know, in this bill, whether that will be, because we haven't seen the regulations yet. We don't know what definitions the minister is going to attack. If he includes those and gives us a commitment on that, I would feel much happier.

I'd like to make one quibble. While I approve, particularly as a northerner, the exemption granted to storm doors and windows, isn't it a pity that so many young married couples in their twenties, just starting out to raise a family, can't afford to build a house behind those storm doors and windows because of other budgetary measures of the Treasurer?

Hon. B. Stephenson: The other budgetary measures?

Mr. Breaugh: He just pointed out that you were against young families.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I think that is very serious.

Mr. Foulds: The point is that there was nothing in the Treasurer's budget or in the budgetary measures he brought down to encourage the development of housing for young married couples starting out. Absolutely none.

Hon. B. Stephenson: How about the removal of the federal sales tax on building materials?

An hon. member: Masters at passing the buck over there.

Mr. Foulds: They may be able to buy a storm door and a storm window and store them in the little locker in the basement of their apartment. But it is going to take them some time to actually buy a home.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is speaking about what is not in the bill, not about what is in the bill.

Mr. Foulds: That's true. Right on, Mr. Speaker. Your accuracy, your acumen—

Mr. Martel: Perception.

Mr. Foulds:—your perception is first rate.

Mr. Roy: You are out of order. That's not going to get you anyplace.

Mr. Reid: You are still out of order.

Mr. Foulds: I simply want to point out the dichotomy, the sort of dog's breakfast—the phrase I used at the beginning of the debate on the principle of this bill—that is the Treasurer's budget, and which is involved to some small extent in this bill. So, while we support that, I think it is important for the House to recognize that it is a modest provision, a limited provision.

Mr. Breaugh: One might even say it's meagre.

Mr. Foulds: Meagre, my colleague from Oshawa suggests. He was the housing spokesman for this party and knows whereof he speaks.

Mr. Bradley: He's health now.

Mr. Foulds: I want to move to another section of the bill about which I have much stronger reservations. In fact, when we get to the clause by clause stage I may feel myself moved to vote against that provision of the bill which lifts the exemption on the sales tax on railway rolling stock, because it seems to me this is an area that should be exempt from taxation. Here we are exempting the tax on storm doors and windows; good. But here we are removing that exemption—in other words, imposing that sales tax on railway rolling stock.

Mr. Martel: That's terrible.

Mr. Foulds: What particularly worries me about that is not so much the Treasurer's neat move to tax the feds through the CPR and the CNR, but the effect that that will have on public transit, because the taxation will be levied on railway rolling stock used by the TTC and by GO Transit. It seems to me that those are areas that we should be encouraging, the use of public transit. Once again, if we are interested in energy conservation we should be cutting down on the use of the automobile, and should be encouraging the use of public transit.

I raised with the Treasurer—I think it was just before we adjourned—the effect that the tax would have on manufacturers. My colleague mentions the plant in Hamilton and I want to spend a few moments on the plants in Thunder Bay—Canada Car. While the Treasurer says it won't put them in a disadvantageous position in terms of bidding on contracts—and I think the Treasurer is right there that it won't affect sales, although this bill embodies certain contradictions—

Mr. Bradley: I can see the headline now, "The Treasurer is right."

Mr. Foulds: —it seems to me that the Toronto Transit Commission with an additional 7.5 per cent cost to them on the purchase of railway rolling stock for the subway system will look again. My colleague, the member for Scarborough-Ellesmere (Mr. Warner), has some interesting statistics about the additional costs that it would have entailed for the TTC in 1972, 1973 and 1974. It seems to me that they amount to several million dollars in each case. If that happens on future contracts, then it seems to me that what we are doing is putting an inhibition, we are creating an inhibition on the development and the purchase of railway rolling stock for public transit. By doing so, we will be cutting back on the manufacture of those cars, therefore we will have a kind of domino effect: We'll have fewer cars purchased for public transit within Ontario; we will have fewer cars manufactured for public transit within Ontario; in large urban centres such as Toronto and in the golden horseshoe where public transit should be developing, we will have the consumer, the user of public transit, crowded, made uncomfortable—

Mr. Bradley: The horseshoe is no longer so golden.

Mr. Foulds: Right; it's a little bronzed these days, it's gone to bronze.

We will have an inhibition on usage because that usage will be less attractive and there will be a possible decrease in use, certainly not an increase in use; and on the other hand we will have, in the manufacturing sector, a decrease in the amount of units to be produced. That will affect the development, the continuance in the creation of jobs, in Canada Car and in the Hamilton plant. That seems to me to be something that we should be avoiding. We should be developing secondary industry; this particular secondary industry is a vital one that should be developed, the development of rapid transit cars. So I have severe reservations, Mr. Speaker, about that particular clause in this bill.

Finally I want to say a few words, if I might, about the effect on the hospitality industry, and I believe I can complete my remarks before the clock—

Hon. B. Stephenson: In 30 seconds?

Mr. Foulds: —reaches 6.

Mr. Martel: It's the angle, Bette; from our angle it's two minutes.

Mr. Foulds: That's true, as a matter of fact.

Hon. B. Stephenson: There's something wrong with your vision.

Mr. Foulds: I think it is one of the few measures that the Treasurer has taken and this minister is carrying out, that does make an attempt to stimulate the hospitality industry.

Mr. Reid: Time! Gong!

Mr. Foulds: However, the questions my colleague from Hamilton Mountain raises are good ones, because I don't think studies have been done. We don't know how much the hospitality industry is going to be encouraged by the removal of the sales tax; we don't know how much that will be in the interest of visitors from outside the province and how much it will benefit commercial use that would take place in any event. We don't know how much it benefits the hospitality industry in the large urban centres, such as Toronto, and how much it benefits the industry in the rural and northern parts of the province.

It seems to me that it is the minister's responsibility, and the Treasurer's responsibility, to bring that kind of information before the House. I would like to see the minister do that before the conclusion of this debate, Mr. Speaker.

The House recessed at 6 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See page 923)

Answers to questions were tabled as follows:

15. Mr. Ruston—Inquiry of the ministry: How many floors of the building at 145 King Street West in the city of Toronto does the government lease? What is the rate per square foot? How many government employees are located in the building? What is the total square footage leased in the building at this time? Is any part of the building being leased by the government not occupied or used by government employees? (Tabled March 9, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Government Services (Mr. Henderson): The government does not lease any space in the building at 145 King Street West, Toronto, at the present time.

16. Ms. Bryden—Inquiry of the ministry: Will the Minister of Health report on the total cost of the advertisements placed since January 1, 1978 on health care services delivery and costs showing separately the amounts spent for: (a) newspapers; (b) radio; and (c) television, including any costs of preparing the advertisements? (Tabled March 10, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell):

Year	Acres Treated	Insecticide and Amount	Areas Sprayed (MNR Districts)
1974	48,300	3,600 lb. Zectran and 50 gal. Thuricide	Atikokan, Wawa, Chapleau and Algonquin

1976	101,000	5,060 lb. Matacil 25,300 lb. Fenitrothion 840 lb. Orthene 500 gal. Thuricide	Fort Frances, Wawa, Chapleau, Algonquin
1977	10,500	1,100 lb. Matacil 500 lb. Orthene 80 gal. Thuricide	Wawa, Chapleau, Kirkland Lake

18. Mr. Reid—Inquiry of the ministry: Will the ministry provide a list of public opinion polls commissioned and paid for by the Ministry of Education since January 1, 1975 and any current polls that have been commissioned in 1978? Please provide in each case the name of the company that conducted the polls, the subject matter of the polls and the cost of the polls. (Tabled March 14, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Education (Mr. Wells):

Response to question on advertising costs:

(a) Newspapers	$110,058.00
(b) Radio	102,198.20
(c) Television	nil
Advertising preparation (including testing)	22,500.00
Total costs	$234,756.20

This amount came out of the normal budgeted allocation for OHIP advertising in fiscal 1977/78. It was not an add-on budget item.

Details of this advertising campaign—including the total cost of the campaign and the fact that costs would be borne out of the established OHIP budget—were released by the minister during a press conference held February 7, 1978.

17. Mr. Reid—Inquiry of the ministry: Will the ministry provide a list of the chemicals used in spraying Ontario forests as a protection against spruce budworm since 1974? What amount has been used, and what area of the province has been sprayed? Has the chemical Fenitrothion been used in the province? (Tabled March 14, 1978.)

Answer by the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller):

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1978

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

RETAIL SALES TAX AMENDMENT ACT (concluded)

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Speaker, my comments are not going to be lengthy concerning Bill 27, An Act to amend the Retail Sales Tax Act, but I do want to bring to the government's attention the flip-flop that has occurred on their side of the fence.

Mr. Haggerty: Listen to this.

Mr. B. Newman: Yes, and when I say a flip-flop I really mean a flip-flop.

I can recall back in 1969 when the Hon. Charles MacNaughton was the provincial Treasurer and how he vehemently spoke for a retail sales tax, stating that a retail sales tax on production machinery would have no detrimental effects whatsoever. His successor, the Hon. John White, in 1970 maintained that same attitude. In fact, we on this side of the House tried to point out to the government of the day the harmful effects that there could be.

I can recall raising the issue when Bendix-Eclipse of Canada contacted me, or wrote me a letter; Hull-Thomson Limited—these are all concerns in my own community; many of them are very small operators but they depended on production machinery to be a viable operation—Kelsey-Hayes Canada Limited; Tamco Limited; Fabricated Steel Products (Windsor) Limited; Somerville Industries Limited; Auto Specialties Manufacturing; Fabco Limited; Champion Spark Plug Company of Canada Limited; Duplate Canada Limited, and many others.

At that time we tried to point out to the government the detrimental effects of imposing a five per cent sales tax. It was only five per cent in those days. I'll read this comment only. This was in the November 5, 1969, issue of the Windsor Star.

"Ontario Revenue Chief Defends Surcharge:

"A provincial five per cent sales tax surcharge on production machinery will not have a detrimental effect on Windsor's industry, Minister of Revenue John White said Tuesday." That's Tuesday, November 4, 1969.

He made that statement, by the way, in comments after I had raised a question in the House concerning the harmful effects of the imposition of a retail sales tax, especially on my community, because of the fact that its industries have to compete with American companies and the dollar was on par at that time. They had to compete with American industry where the American industry was a little more productive than the Canadian. Had the government not imposed the five per cent sales tax at that time, I'm fairly certain that many of these small industries in here could have developed to the point where even the imposition of the sales tax at a later date may have not had the detrimental effect.

I bring this to the attention of you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House, to show how, in the short period of nine years, the government has completely flip-flopped, maintaining at one time that the imposition of the sales tax would have no harmful effects and now, seeing the light of day after it was pointed out at that time and also by many of the industries since then, that this imposition would have a detrimental effect.

I am pleased to say regarding the Minister of Revenue (Mr. Maeck), for whom I have a very high regard, having been on one select committee with him and knowing his capabilities, that I would hope and I would think that maybe his judgement led the government to see the detrimental effects that this imposition of a sales tax at that time has had, and it has taken some nine years, eight-to-nine years, before they saw the light of day and decided now to eliminate the sales tax.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Speaker, in this hodge-podge of various inastute recommendations, I shall only select two for comment this evening.

One has to do with an area that has got scant cognizance. Try as I may, Sherlock Holmes as one might, looking through the Ontario budget as to what the alterations in the sales tax picture may be, no mention, not a phrase, is dedicated to a peculiarly interesting and a peculiar concept. It has to do with promotional materials and a definition for promotional distributors: whether, as I believe the representatives of the ministry will say, this has been in effect all along—that is the business of loss-leaders or the business of promotional material, something given away or discounted down in price in order to sell a good or a particular service, and then the ministry coming along and setting a true valuation or a fair value on the head of that particular good; and then secondly, of course, imposing its tax upon its then set valuation.

What the condition has been to date, I am not clear or sure. Certainly on the basis of the rather elaborate new sections being interjected into the Act, the government has had no authority to do whatever it was doing. There is a note in here which says that the clarification, as the government benignly put it, of the section in question, the clarification of the Act with respect to its application on promotional distributions is necessary because of a decision earlier this year of the Supreme Court of Canada and the interpretations given in that decision to the analogous provisions of the statute of the province of New Brunswick. The amendments proposed in the bill with respect to the promotional distributions are intended to preserve the application of the Act, and therefore I assume that it has been in effect all the way along; and quite illegitimately, again reading the elaborate provisions that the government has now inserted.

If one looks at subsection (4) of section 1, the definition of promotional distribution is quite elaborate; and then, at 8b, the bill seeks to define promotional distributors. I would like some clarification as to what presumption or efronterly the government has been up to in this particular area at this time. What, in terms of a quantitative measurement, does this new section mean? Third, I am very much concerned with respect to just how the government proposes to make it work.

There are areas in which one has to concede: if you are marketing kewpie dolls and they have a pretty set value and well known, then if you start giving the kewpie dolls away in order to get a tube of toothpaste, then I suppose some valuation can be reached. But there must be a very broad range of goods, and services particularly, upon which this very nice mesmerism or gazing into crystal balls by this ministry will be brought into play, and the sheer administrative complexity would seem to me to cause the minister some pause and halt. Is the minister going to have a group of inspectors fan out, men well versed in kewpie dolls, to be able to determine this? Or, if a particular service has been rendered, these people would have to have acquired a fair expertise in what, in surrounding circumstances, that particular service is likely to be worth, or to elicit that information. The possibilities of this particular manoeuvre boggle the mind—at least they do mine.

I think this kind of legislation, leaving such great areas of variables and vacillation, probably can only be more costly in the process of its being administered than it would ever hope to bring in revenue over against it. What about all those problems that arise? Ought this section not be reconsidered in full?

The second area with which I am concerned has to do with rolling stock. This is a benighted area indeed—benighted in its implementation and purblind in its conception—if this tax is directed primarily against the federal government, as I surmise is this government's nefarious intent, because it has become a tradition with this government in a roundabout way to siphon away money from what would otherwise remain within federal coffers, or affect federal institutions, into the provincial Treasury—that's where the chief weight would lie; that would be one element of the whole picture.

The second element has to do with the province of Ontario itself and the impact of this particular tax on public transportation in terms of the rolling stock involved and then a fortiori on Metropolitan Toronto, which is the only city in the province that will be vitally and substantially affected by this particular tax, even in a very severe and possibly crippling way.

I put it this way: What I would like to have is the whole picture of the total moneys being brought in, or which the minister estimates—and he is pretty shrewd in the estimate, I trust—arising out of this particular taxation. What portion will be borne by the Ontario Northland Railway, the GO system, and the light transit system operative within Metropolitan Toronto? And what portion, over against that, is this government expecting to garner from the federal government or from federal agencies? I can throw in the CPR, which I trust will soon fall within that demesne. In any event, that division would be terribly important. If it is two-thirds/one-third, perhaps the tax is not as iniquitous as I suspect it may be.

But let us confine our attention for the moment to Metropolitan Toronto. If the TTC decides to spend $100 million on capital goods in transportation within this city, which is a great alleviation to environmentally and otherwise a hundred things, as we know—and I won't go into them—and which is the direction of the future, particularly if we don't find a methane substitute for oil, because the shortage will be upon us very soon and public transportation will become crucial for all of us and it will have to expand in order to accommodate us.

[8:15]

If they spend $100 million, 75 per cent of that comes from the provincial government, 25 per cent of it comes from the municipality itself. Here is Josiah. He gives with his right hand and he takes away with his left; because out of the $100 million, obviously $7 million of it will fall under taxation, so the total amount forthcoming would be $93 million.

Within that particular picture, if you make a breakdown of these sums of money, you will find that Metropolitan Toronto, in effect to get the same amount of capital goods, would have to spend $32.2 million in order to get $25 million worth of what it would otherwise get before this tax came into being.

So who are you penalizing? As far as your government is concerned, you're taking back with one hand, as I say, from the contribution or grant that you've already made that's on the 75. So you're no longer giving 75. Is everyone supposed to wink their eye and not to notice this particular piece of sleight-of-hand?

On the other hand you bring the full weight to bear upon the transit riders, in the Metropolitan Toronto area at least, by making them not only pick up that particular amount of money which you've taken back, but to find moneys for tax purposes on top of it, over and above the portion which they are obliged to spend in any event.

It's a retrograde piece of business on the whole. The increase to Metropolitan Toronto—hold on to your hat—is 37 per cent. That's what it's going to cost them for all the benefits you're going to achieve in this particular regard.

So without prolonging the debate, and taking the whole picture into consideration, on a reply we would like to know the total picture here as to the distribution and who's going to bear the brunt, so that we can estimate what the particular brunt being borne by the people of Ontario, and particularly the people of Toronto, might be.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I too would like to have something of the rationale and something of the facts in so far as the city of Toronto is concerned. I don't know what this government is thinking about, but it seems to me that every time we turn around they've got another hatchet out for this city. I think it's time that we get some explanation as to what the costs are to the citizens of Toronto.

The government has already put us in a very preferred position on the matter of educational costs. We are unique. We know we're unique, but I don't know that we want to be so unique that we're the only municipality that gets no assistance from this province grant-wise for its public school system. Now we get this kind of thing, and since the city of Toronto is covering off a good deal of the metropolitan costs, it seems to me we ought to have those facts and the minister ought to see that we do have them.

Every single proposal that is brought in, particularly by this ministry, or under this minister's jurisdiction, seems to be an attack on this particular area of the province; this is another case. Metro is not in a position, at this time, to be able to cover up all the costs that the government wishes to shove upon it. It is no longer a growing or an affluent municipality. It now has to have some consideration.

If we are going to have any kind of a system in this particular area which will be useful to the people of it, we certainly should be giving some encouragement, rather than imposing further and additional costs. I trust the minister will give some answers to us before we're asked to go further on this bill.

Mr. Swart: I would like to make a few comments on this bill, because I share the concern of my colleagues about the sales tax which is going to be imposed on rolling stock. It may be said at the present time that it is not a great amount. My understanding is that perhaps it will cost Metropolitan Toronto this year about $50,000 net because of this tax, which would be a total charge against the transit system of something like $200,000.

That $50,000 may not seem to be a very large amount and the government might think we shouldn't put up an objection to this, but I think what we recognize in this bill is that it is the first step towards reciprocal taxation by the government. Perhaps that isn't the best term to describe it, perhaps what should be said is it is the first step on the part of this government to see that every public agency pays just as much taxes as private agencies.

We know from the budget that perhaps next year, whether property tax reform comes in or not, but at least when it is introduced—and property tax reform is a misnomer too; what we really mean or did mean at one time was market value assessment—they are going to introduce certain other taxes against municipalities. There will be full sales tax imposed against municipalities, according to the statement in the budget; there will be full licence fees imposed against municipalities; and there will be full taxes on such things as gasoline and all other things that the municipalities use.

Again it is my understanding, from the information which I have received from the Ministry of Revenue, that this will probably amount to about a $30 million additional payment that municipalities annually will have to pay over and above what they pay now.

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the hon. member that this is the Retail Sales Tax Act.

Mr. Swart: Yes, I'm coming to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I wish you would.

Mr. Mancini: That's why he is in the second row now.

Mr. Eaton: Some time down the road he is coming to that.

Mr. Swart: In fact, I think I have been dealing with that. This principle of applying taxes against public agencies and reciprocity may not be that bad in principle, but what I want to say here is that this and the measures which the Treasurer tells us are going to come later with regard to taxation on municipalities, can't be considered in isolation from transfer payments and assistance from the government to municipalities and to the public agencies.

The reason I am concerned about this bill and have real reluctance to support this bill is that it is significant that they bring in this part of the bill first. Before they deal with the matter of transfer payments to help the municipalities pay these additional charges, they are bringing in the charges against the municipalities. From the history of what has taken place with this government in the last few years, with the breaking of the Edmonton commitment and all of these other measures where they have backtracked on their commitments to public bodies and to municipalities, I have real reluctance to see a further levy against transportation, even if this one only applies to Metropolitan Toronto, without seeing what other measures they are going to introduce to assist the Toronto Transit Commission.

Finally, I want to say there has to be something a bit weird about a budget and a measure like this which was stated in the budget, which on the one hand says, "We are going to remove the sales tax from such things as storm doors because we want to conserve fuel, we want to encourage good insulation," and then, by the next measure, they say, "We're going to apply additional costs against our public transportation system," which inevitably is going to mean in the long run that fewer people are going to use it, they'll have higher costs, and more people will be providing their own transportation. I say it's a contradiction and we have very real difficulty in supporting a bill such as this.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: The members have certainly raised some interesting questions in this debate, and I'll probably try to deal with each member separately, if I can. I'll deal first with the member for Erie who was the first speaker. He spoke about the rolling stock, as almost all members did. I would like to point out to all members of the House that this isn't something new. This was already in the Act and was exempted. All we are doing is removing the exemption. It's not something that's new.

Mr. Haggerty: That's bad enough though.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: It's already in place in British Columbia, it's in place in Manitoba; it's in place in Quebec.

Mr. Haggerty: What about Alberta?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: And it's in place in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Haggerty: What about Alberta?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: No, Alberta does not have it.

Mr. Haggerty: Alberta doesn't have any sales tax at all.

Mrs. Campbell: Are you going to equate that to OHIP premiums?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: No, I'm not going to equate it to OHIP premiums at all. That's not under discussion at this particular moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: The member for Erie also talked about the exemptions on storm doors and windows and so on, and I think perhaps for the record it might be wise for me to read into the record the actual exemptions that are now used—at least the rules for exemption that are used by the federal government, which we intend to use. There aren't that many of them but perhaps it would help to clarify this particular section of the bill for all concerned.

"Storm doors and storm windows, commonly marketed as such, qualify for exemption. Principal doors and entranceways and similar doors containing small double-glazed window-panes do not qualify for exemptions. An entranceway with the principal door, door-frame and threshold and sidelight unit does not qualify for exemption. Should this unit contain a secondary or storm door, the value of that door may be deducted from the overall unit price when determining the value."

Mrs. Campbell: What size bureaucracy are we going to have?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I listened to the member for St. George quite carefully. I would really expect her to pay the same respect to me. She may not like all the answers I am going to give her, but I think I should have that much respect from her.

Mrs. Campbell: I agree.

Mr. Roy: Try not to be so provocative.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: "Double-glazed windows and window units incorporating the insulating features of the double-glazed units; permanent or removable storm units qualify for the exemption, provided that the units are sold complete with their storm units; double-glazed patio doors and patio door units with double-tracked door systems which incorporate the glazed insulating feature qualify for exemption; double-glazed storm windows, screens and slim-shades imported for shop assembly as double-glazed windows with a built-in operating dial at the bottom corner of the sash to enable the slats to be adjusted may be imported exempt of federal sales tax," and also our tax.

There are two more items. "Window frames for sealed-glass window units: sealed-glass window units qualify for exemption; window frames installed separately from the sealed-glass window units are subject to sales tax. If the window frame is sold already installed with the sealed-glass window unit as one complete unit, the frame would be considered as part of the storm window and therefore exempt from tax.

"Heat pumps for use principally to provide heat in the heating system of a building are exempt. Heat recovery units and devices for extracting heat from exhaust air or waste water for recovery of energy are exempt. Solar cells designed to produce electricity directly from the sun for charging batteries are exempt." Those are the items that are exempt under the proposed amendment to the Act.

[8:30]

I believe the member for Port Arthur asked about the triple glazing, and I would inform him that it is also exempt. I think that was one question he asked me.

The member for Erie suggested that perhaps sales tax should be lowered. Of course, that again is a matter that is decided by the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) and not by the Minister of Revenue. But I would point out that any time we lower the sales tax the money has to be raised somewhere else. I didn't hear any suggestions as to where that money would come from if we lowered the sales tax. That's the other half of that coin.

Mr. Reid: You can fire whoever wrote the speech for you.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: This isn't a speech, I'm ad libbing for a change.

Mr. Roy: You know what to do then, eh?

Mr. Reid: You shouldn't have admitted it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mrs. Campbell: What is the cost of the bureaucracy in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: The member for Hamilton Mountain also spoke about rolling stock. He wanted to know if any studies had been done regarding the effect on industry. He was referring, of course, to those firms that manufacture rolling stock. I'm informed there should not be an effect on that industry. There is no charge as far as the industry is concerned; they don't pay any sales tax. It's the people who purchase these cars and equipment who are the ones who will pay the sales tax; so it should not really affect the manufacturers in any way, shape or form. The only way it could affect them would be if, because of the sales tax, they weren't able to buy as many, but experience in other provinces would indicate that doesn't really bear very much fruit.

Mr. Swart: Which provinces?

Mr. Foulds: Who else has a TTC system?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I am still waiting for an answer from my staff as to the effect that the rolling stock tax would have on the city of Toronto. As soon as that is at my desk—maybe it's here now.

This is a very rough breakdown of the $15 million that is anticipated being raised: public transit authorities, including GO Transit, approximately $1 million; and CNR, CPR, Ontario Northland, Algoma Central and United States carriers—this would be for parts and repairs—$14 million. The breakdown between railways really is not available. It's just taken on an average.

The member for Halton-Burlington (Mr. Reed) asked some questions regarding the chimneys and so forth. I see he's not here now—

Mr. Roy: Yes, but he asked me to be careful about the answers; I am making notes.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Okay. He can get the information in Hansard.

With regard to the exemption for insulating materials, the Treasurer was quite specific about the insulation items that are to be exempted. As members opposite know, those decisions are made by the Treasurer and not by the Minister of Revenue. If, however, there is confusion about the interpretation of the insulating materials, my ministry is prepared to re-examine this whole issue and clarify any areas that may be causing difficulties. Also, Thermopane is exempt as well as triple glazing, which I mentioned earlier.

In further reply to the inquiries of the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Charlton), the railway rolling stock is taxed by other provinces, as I indicated, and therefore the competitive position for manufacturers in Ontario should not be more than in any other province. They should all be pretty well in the same boat.

I indicated earlier the expected revenue is $15 million annually. The Treasurer announced in the budget reciprocal taxation between municipal and provincial levels, which the member for Welland-Thorold talked about, which should leave municipalities no worse off because of the removal of exemptions, and this again is the Treasurer's policy.

The member for Lakeshore mentioned the promotional distribution. Valuation of promotional material is calculated on the basis of cost of material, plus labour costs, plus percentage of overhead. This is a common method of valuing tangible personal property. The legislation makes no change in the method of—I am having a little difficulty in reading this—

Mr. Campbell: Get an interpreter.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: —evaluation and the application of the tax. The method has been in use for many years, I am informed, and poses no additional administrative costs. Revenue estimates of tax collected on promotional material for the last two years amount to approximately $50 million. The member is quite correct in saying that as far as the promotional material is concerned it has been in effect all of these years. Because of the court case in New Brunswick, we felt that it's best to tidy up the legislation—

Mr. Lawlor: I guess so.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: —and that is the reason this amendment is here.

Mr. Lawlor: If I were a promoter, I would sue you and get my money back.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: As a matter of fact they did sue in New Brunswick, and that is the reason for strengthening the legislation. We are not changing any policies. It is a policy that has been in effect in this province since I believe something like 1961.

Mr. Lawlor: You make it retroactive too.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. minister please disregard the interjections.

Mr. Lawlor: If he is going to disregard them how can we talk?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: That's quite true. It's retroactive. It goes back two years.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the member for Windsor-Walkerville for the kind words. I appreciate it very much, and also the kind words that I received from the member for Port Arthur. I don't know whether he was trying to curry my favour a little bit but—

Mr. Foulds: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: —perhaps it was sincere.

Mr. Foulds: You are beyond currying favour with, I know that.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: He's got a home buyer's grant he wants to get straightened out.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: I believe that I have covered most of the questions that have been raised, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered for committee of the whole House.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Ashe, on behalf of Hon. Mr. McKeough, moved second reading of Bill 30, An Act to amend The Municipal Elections Act, 1977.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have an opening statement?

Mr. Ashe: Just extremely briefly, Mr. Speaker, this Bill 30, the amendment to the Municipal Elections Act which was only enacted by this Legislature late last year, is principally in response to many queries and concerns and possible interpretational misunderstanding by many municipalities. In effect, the amendments hopefully clarify some of the procedures and take out some of the maybe slight ambiguity in one or two sections of the Act as originally proclaimed.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that we on this side of the House would be pleased to support this bill in principle. We have a number of thoughts that we would like to express at this time.

First of all, I am somewhat surprised that less than four months after the other bill was passed by this House, after much discussion and after the ministry consulted municipal leaders over the past two- or three-year period, it was already necessary, within four months as I indicate, to bring in a number of amendments in order to clear up these ambiguities and vagaries that the parliamentary assistant has indicated exist within Bill 98, as it was called last year when it was passed.

The changes make sense because they are a little more explicit. They are particularly important because they emanate from the municipalities themselves. I am at a loss to know where the ministry has been in dealing with this bill when it had the advantage of the municipalities and their suggestions in originally proposing the amended bill last year. When we dealt with this bill last October and November we dealt with a number of important changes. For instance, we changed the election date for municipalities from the first Monday in December to the second Monday in November.

This party brought in a couple of important amendments at that time, including the elimination of the qualification that British subjects could vote. We wanted to make it equal for all people within the province, in that everyone who was a Canadian citizen could vote, which would mean that one could be here three years and then vote rather than have a particular group be a privileged group within the Municipal Elections Act.

Additional powers were given at that time to the clerks of municipalities. They were empowered to delegate responsibilities to their assistants. This was particularly important in case of emergency. Another amendment at that time was that we removed the occupation of a candidate from the ballot itself. Some of these things were included in the other Act, with the exception of two proposed amendments that didn't pass this House but which will in the near future, I am sure, when the other two parties see the wisdom of those two amendments we proposed.

Nevertheless, we are prepared to support Bill 30 and we will be looking forward to dealing with the various amendments when it goes into committee.

Mr. Swart: We too are going to support second reading of this bill and ask that it go to committee for at least one amendment, or perhaps two which we may introduce.

This bill is before us, as the member for Durham West has said tonight, to tidy up Bill 98 that was passed last fall. Some of the things in here are absolutely necessary for the functioning of the municipal elections. I am not going to put all the fault on the government for missing these things. I guess all of us on all sides of the House had some responsibility for not catching these contradictions or omissions. The government has far more staff, so I suppose the prime responsibility has to rest with it.

Although we are supporting this in second reading, my party has concern about two specific sections of the bill. I want to deal with those briefly and deal with them now, because I have some hope that the parliamentary assistant to the Treasurer might be willing to incorporate them and accept the amendment, or at least give some thought to them before they are actually introduced.

Section 1 of this bill does two things: First, it assures that council and local board members' term of office this year will expire on November 30 and not December 31; this makes that clear, and it wasn't clear from the bill.

The second thing it does is it legislates that all such members will get for this year only eleven-twelfths of the remuneration which is set by their bylaw if it is an annual remuneration. That second function of this section, in fact, again has two principles with it.

The first is that because they're only putting in eleven-twelfths of a year they should only get eleven-twelfths of the remuneration. That principle, I guess, might be acceptable, but I think I should point out that in many municipalities at the present time the last month is a very slack month. There is not one-twelfth or anything like it of the work done in the municipalities in that month. Very frequently, after the elections are held most municipalities have only one council meeting. That is very short and deals with non-contentious matters.

In the month of December they perhaps put in one-half to one-tenth of the time that they would put in during the month of March. So it may not be quite fair to arbitrarily state that they should only get eleven-twelfths of their remuneration. It is certainly going to create some injustice between those municipalities which pay on an annual basis and those municipalities which pay by the meeting, because if there is only the one meeting in December, those members of council and those members of school boards and so on will lose very little remuneration, a very little percentage of their remuneration, whereas those who get paid on an annual basis will lose one-twelfth of it.

In spite of that, I suppose we could go along with that principle, but the thing we can't accept and to which we object is that this government is telling local governments what they must do about their remuneration. For decades—I was in municipal government for a large number of years—municipalities fought to have their full rights in setting the remuneration for the members of council and for the various boards. Previously limits were set by the Municipal Act that they could only get so much depending on the size of the municipality. Municipal people said, with justification, "Surely when this money is all raised from the local taxpayers and we are accountable back to them, we should have the right to set our own remuneration?"

The government conceded and passed the necessary legislation and now sections 205, 211, 238 and 389 of the Municipal Act all give full authority for councils to set their own salaries, their own stipends, their own remuneration—whatever you want to call it—and on what basis, whether it's on a meeting basis or whether it's on an annual basis.

Now the government is backing off. It is saying to the municipalities, to the municipal leaders, to those who are elected by the local taxpayers, "You are not capable of determining what remuneration you should get this year and we're going to arbitrarily rule that you're going to have one-twelfth of your annual remuneration deducted." I suggest that this section must be based on one of three premises.

One is that they think councils through inadvertency will not deal with this issue, or may not think of the fact that they're only serving 11 months and may not, therefore, consider any reduction because they don't think of it. I say if that is the case then the Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs could simply notify the municipalities, reminding them that this was an 11-month year and they may want to give consideration to the amount of remuneration that they are going to receive and may want to make some change. If that is not the premise then it must be that the government thinks municipal people are not capable of deciding whether they are entitled to 11 months or to 12 months, whether or not they are entitled to full salary; or else the third presumption must be that they are going to grab it all for themselves when they've got the opportunity.

I suggest this is a degree of paternalism that members of municipal councils and school boards and the other boards don't need. I suggest that they are capable themselves of assessing whether any changes should be made in remuneration because it's an 11-month period instead of a 12-month period.

I think it is particularly true that they should have that right when every penny they receive for their services as members of council or the board comes from the local taxpayers. The province does not pay one cent towards that remuneration. They should be accountable to the local taxpayers for that and not be told by the government that they have to make these changes.

The second section of this bill that I am concerned about is section 2. We recognize that change is necessary in that clause to some degree, because by the time the court of revision is held to determine finally who is eligible to be an elector, nomination day has come and gone. Thus the 10 nominators of the local government candidates cannot be determined fully at that time; they can't be on a final voters' list and they can't be determined to be eligible voters, at least by a voters' list.

Mr. Haggerty: Should be 100.

Mr. Swart: They can be determined but not by a voters' list, so there had to be some change. But the change is bad, it is not well thought out and it is backward step.

The principle of nominators has always been that they should be eligible voters, that they should have the right to vote within that municipality for the offices they are nominating people to fill. This is clear whether we go back to the old Act—and I want to read these because I am very seriously trying to impress upon the parliamentary assistant what the change we have here really means; if I can find this quickly: The 1972 Municipal Elections Act, amended up to 1976, had this clause, "A person may be nominated as a candidate for an office by filing with the office of the clerk during the normal office hours a nomination paper described, upon which shall be signed at least 10 electors whose names are entered in the polling list of electors entitled to vote in the election to such office." I agree that at that time—and I'm sure the parliamentary assistant would agree—the final court of revision had taken place and they would know who were eligible voters. Nevertheless, it said people "entitled to vote in an election to such office."

Bill 98, the one we are amending now, had a section which said: "The nomination papers shall be signed by at least 10 electors whose names are entered or entitled to be entered under section 33 in the polling list of electors entitled to vote in an election to such office". This is the section which we are amending.

The reason we must amend it is that it refers to the final list of electors, and as that list is not prepared by nomination day we have to amend it. I point out that it says: "Shall be signed by at least 10 electors whose names are entered and entitled to be entered under section 33 in the polling list of electors entitled to vote in an election to such office."

If we go then to the provincial Election Act, Revised Statutes of 1970, we find there the same principle expressed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of private conversations, which may be necessary but I believe they are unnecessarily loud.

Mr. Roy: Who is that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Swart: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roy: Try to keep it down over there.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. B. Newman) is talking.

Mr. Swart: The provincial Election Act states, "Nominations shall be by writing, signed by at least 100 duly qualified electors of the electoral district," et cetera. All it says is that they must be duly qualified electors.

Then we come to the bill which we have before us at the present time and we find that it does not in fact say that. It says: "shall be signed by at least 10 electors, either whose names are entered in the preliminary list of electors or who have furnished to the clerk an affidavit in the prescribed form that they are entitled to vote in the election to such office." In no place does it say that those preliminary lists of electors are people who shall be entitled to vote.

The courts of revision are held after the nomination papers are submitted. It is conceivable, then, that in any nomination paper there could be one person whose name was taken off because he doesn't live in the municipality; for a great variety of reasons his name could be taken off. It is conceivable, although unlikely, that one could end up with the nomination of a candidate who wasn't nominated by a single qualified elector in the municipality from the way this is written.

I suggest that was not the intent of the parliamentary assistant or even the minister, but I do suggest that is exactly what this says. Therefore, some consideration should be given to changing the wording in that section so that only duly qualified voters—people who are entitled to vote—should be eligible to sign the nomination papers.

I'd just say again that may not happen very frequently, but I suggest at some time in the future that it will be one of those chickens that come home to roost. Somebody will have a nomination paper which was not signed by 10 duly qualified electors or 10 people entitled to vote and some other candidate will challenge that. Yet under this Act they'd not be able to do anything about it, even though he is not duly nominated.

The other part of this section that bothers me is where it says, "or who have furnished to the clerk an affidavit in the prescribed form that they are entitled to vote in the election to such office." I think we have to take that within the context of what the Municipal Elections Act now provides. It provides, first of all, that the clerk need post only two lists of the preliminary lists of electors and that one will be in his office and the other in some other public place.

[9:00]

There really is not the opportunity now that there was formerly. Granted many people didn't use it, and the lists often didn't stay up on the poles. Nevertheless, it provided greater opportunity than is now provided for a person to find out if his name was on the voting list, and therefore he was eligible to nominate a candidate. But the other aspect of this, and I hope the parliamentary assistant will recognize and admit this, is that under the present Municipal Elections Act there is a requirement that the preliminary list, the list that is going to be posted in two places, has to be up only one day ahead of nominations. The sections of the Act provide that very clearly and if the parliamentary assistant is not aware of it, I will tell him to check sections 25(2) and 25(3), which will tell about the posting of the lists and require they be posted 22 days prior to election day; and section 35(1), which says that nominations shall be 21 days prior to election day.

The facts are that the opportunity for an elector to find out if his name is on that preliminary list before he signs the nomination papers involves a minimum one-day posting and two lists, one in the municipal office and one elsewhere. From a very practical point of view, of course, what will happen is that a person will expect his name is on the voters' list as it has been for the past 10, 20 or 30 years and will sign that nomination paper; when the candidate takes it in, he'll find that name is not on there. He may be able to rectify that, but we know of instances in this province where people, top-notch candidates—and that's a subjective view—have been unable to run because their nomination paper was short one name; they found one name wasn't accurate or something of that nature. I suggest that the parliamentary assistant should take a pretty good look at those sections. I'm sure he'd have to agree that it only requires but one day.

Not only is that a minimum, of course, but I would point out that in any year when there is only 62 days between the start of the enumeration and election day, the timing is such that the clerk will not be able to post that list ahead of that deadline and, in fact, there will only be that one day. When there are 69 days between those dates, as there will be in some years, then there will be a bit more time.

I think what has been done in this change probably has been done at the request of the clerks, in that they didn't want any responsibility for determining whether the names on those nomination papers were, in fact, eligible voters in the election; therefore, this lets them off the hook from even having to give opinions, although the Act itself, the Municipal Elections Act, says that the onus is on the candidate to determine that he submit a bona fide nomination paper.

I would ask the parliamentary assistant whether he might consider wording something like: "It shall be signed by at least 10 electors who are entitled to vote in the election to such office." I think that would clear it and overcome any of the difficulties that I have mentioned. I leave that suggestion with him to think about before we go into second reading of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Does any other member wish to become involved in the debate?

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, I just want to speak on the last point that my colleague from Welland-Thorold has raised with regard to the timing. I just want to say to you and to the House that if the parliamentary assistant and the government had accepted some of the amendments that my colleague had put forward on the original debate on the bill we wouldn't be into the difficulties that we are into now in having to rectify this legislation so early on. I suspect that we'll actually have an encore every four or five weeks, having spotted a new weakness in the bill that the parliamentary assistant piloted through the House in the last session, once again adopting in half-hearted measure some of the more pungent and straightforward amendments that my colleague had submitted earlier. Too bad we didn't accept them at that time.

An hon. member: The party of perfection.

Mr. Foulds: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no other speakers, the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Ashe: Mr. Speaker, I will try to cover the various points that have been made. As far as the reason and necessity for the bill, I would suggest some of the changes are, yes, possibly slight misinterpretations or not enough clarity in particular sections; but as was already indicated by the hon. member for Waterloo North, all through the procedure the government was working with a committee set up by the municipal associations and they were quite convinced that the words in the legislation were sufficient to describe what the intent was. In actual fact, in some of these sections we still do, but on the basis that there are some municipalities that maybe because of their size do not have the sophisticated personnel to be involved in some of these questions, they were a little concerned and had some few questions, so we felt that since we like to protect and respond to the needs of all municipalities, whether they be small, large, rich or poor, for the sake of amending a few clauses to make it clearer we would be very happy to bring forth this kind of an amending bill and take the wrath of the opposition, if you will, in criticism and get them through to protect these municipalities, their municipal clerks and so on.

The hon. member for Welland-Thorold has proposed two amendments, one of which I did receive by telephone at noon today. The other one I have still not received, the second one. I do have the one regarding the amendment proposed to section 1. I am not prepared actually to acknowledge that his amendment is a good one. I would go so far as to say it is a very poor one and whether you want me, Mr. Speaker, to go through all the reasons now or wait until committee, I suppose it can be debated one way or the other.

Just touching upon some of the issues very briefly, I support many of the thing that the hon. member has said regarding the municipal councils' right to set their own pay, et cetera, and it's exactly for that reason and it is exactly because they do have to be accountable to their electorate that this particular amendment is put forth the way it is in this particular piece of legislation. We have had questions from municipal clerks, from treasurers—

Mr. Swart: Explain that. I don't understand.

Mr. Ashe: —from heads of council saying that if their bylaw now reads "per annum" some of them took the literal interpretation that they could not make that eleven-twelfths even if they wished to by their own decision. The member can challenge whether somebody should ask that kind of question or put forth that kind of statement—

Mr. Swart: Change the bylaw.

Mr. Ashe: —but we got them. We also had a lot of just straight questions. “What do we do? Do we have two councils in office during the month of December? Do we pay two councils in the month of December?” Of course the answer that we are making very clear is no. If a council does feel that eleven-twelfths of what would normally be its per annum salary is not sufficient to pay for 11 months of work—and I acknowledge what the hon. member has said relative to the work load over the year, that December has not been considered to be one of the busier months, although I think with the new term of office it will become somewhat busier—let the council take the option that it now has to amend its bylaw relating to compensation. If councils now have a bylaw that says it shall be $5,000 per annum, they can amend their bylaw as soon as they wish and change it to a different sum if they feel they are being short-changed for having a pro rata salary for the whole year because of the month of December.

There was reference made to the inequity between those councillors who are paid on an annual basis versus those who are paid on a per diem basis, and in the strictest sense again the argument is probably relatively true, but I would also submit that in actual fact, generally speaking—and I appreciate there are exceptions to this—those councils that are on an annual basis are usually receiving a significantly higher sum per diem than if they were being paid on a per diem basis. Therefore I don't think the inequity that in theory is there, actually exists in fact.

Last but not least on this particular section, we are, I think, making it sound like a real big deal. It is for clarity. We also know that probably 75 per cent of those in office today will be in office December 1, 1978; so in actual fact we are talking about a relatively small percentage of turnover in the council. It is that group of people to whom the council should address itself in terms of the adequacy of the remuneration.

So on that basis we do not feel that the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Welland-Thorold (Mr. Swart) is the right one. We think that the section, as proposed, is the way the municipal people, both elected and otherwise, have asked that it be. They said, “Make it very clear. We know how to handle it after that; but make it very clear what you mean.” We feel that the particular section in the bill, clause 1, does make it very clear; and the municipalities and the municipal councils can judge their actions accordingly, both to themselves and to their electorate for any change they feel necessary in their remuneration bylaw.

On the proposed amendment to clause 2, I must say I don't buy the argument of this one day business again, not in the least. I would go so far as to say that any potential candidate, whether he is at present in office or not—and I don't mind this being in print—but anyone who goes forward with 10 names on his nomination list and stops there probably shouldn't be a candidate for office in any event.

So again I think we are talking about virtually no one in the province who does that. They are going to get 12, 13, 15, 20, 25—so you're not worried whether one or two or three; or 10 even—

Mr. Davidson: You had better check with the former mayor of Cambridge trying to run for alderman.

Mr. Ashe: —as in the case put forward by the hon. member, would be declared ineligible.

The posting of the list means nothing. Think about it: Whoever has really suggested that nominators go and look at the post—even when the lists were on the posts—to see if they were on the list before they signed. Surely it is not only implicit in the legislation but even in common sense that it should be up to the particular candidate to make sure that the nominators he is getting on his nomination forms are legitimate, or at least appear to be legitimate electors.

There is one point in his argument that I do agree with—

Mr. Foulds: Appear to be, at least appear to be; it's okay if they appear to be.

Mr. Ashe: Probably appear to be.

We have to make it clear that the municipal politician, or potential politician, has to think for himself. The hon. member has been saying this over and over, and I agree with that. It may appear to him, it may not appear to others.

Mr. Foulds: But there may only be two copies of the list he can check against.

Mr. Ashe: In any event, as I was saying, there is one part of his argument that I do buy, and that is to possibly further clarify the clause, which is now section 2 of the bill, to further clarify at the beginning, “shall be signed by at least 10 electors, either whose names are entered in the preliminary list of electors”—and there it probably should be clarified—“and are entitled to vote in the election to such office"—as well as saying it again when we talk about the affidavits. So that part of the amendment I think is reasonable and probably it should say that anyway. It possibly does say it in other sections, I really haven't had the opportunity to fully check; but clarifying it even further there would ensure there was no ambiguity.

Mr. Foulds: You use a lot of split infinitives, do you know that?

Mr. Ashe: I see nothing wrong with leaving the section in relating to the affidavits. These affidavits, by the way, will be available with nomination papers, so anyone who wants to stop it at 10, 11, or 12, and has any hesitancy about some of his nominators can have the affidavit attested to by one or more of his nominators.

[9:15]

The main reason—and the hon. member did touch upon this—that this section is being put in, is the clerks, I think, generally as a group, through at least some of their spokesmen, felt that the onus should not be on them to make decisions that were not really, in their minds, their responsibility to declare whether somebody may or may not be ultimately an eligible elector. I think with that one addition the clause is correct, basically, in its present form.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered for committee of the whole House.

TOBACCO TAX AMENDMENT ACT

House in committee on Bill 25, An Act to amend the Tobacco Tax Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Charlton: I move that subsection 1(e) of section 1 be amended by adding thereto: "thereafter an additional three cents for each additional five cents or part thereof that the price at retail of a cigar purchased by him exceeds 90 cents."

Mr. Peterson: Why are you punishing the Premier (Mr. Davis)?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would refer you to rule 86 of the standing orders which says: "Any bill, resolution, motion or address, the passage of which would impose a tax or specifically direct the allocation of public funds may not be passed by the House unless recommended by a message from the Lieutenant Governor, and may only be proposed by a minister of the Crown." I submit to you that this amendment falls into that category.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Nickel Belt on the point of order.

Mr. Laughren: I find it passing strange that the minister chooses to take this position in view of the fact that the tax already exists on the cigars. It's not as though the member for Hamilton Mountain was proposing a tax that does not presently exist. Secondly, it is even more passing strange in view of the Treasurer's (Mr. McKeough's) behaviour with the OHIP premiums that the minister would see fit to take a position based on standing order 86 when in fact what the member for Hamilton Mountain is proposing is simply to make an existing tax more equitable.

Mr. Roy: He is changing it.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The member for Port Arthur on the point of order.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Chairman, I'm a little confused. I thought the procedure was at least for the Chairman to read the amendment that was put before we discussed whether or not it was in order.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The amendment was put and immediately the hon. minister rose on a point of order and I must hear the point of order as soon as it is raised. I have no alternative.

Mr. Foulds: Then I will speak specifically to the point of order that was raised as it is enunciated in standing order 86. I submit to you that in the strict interpretation of that standing order the amendment as put forward by the member for Hamilton Mountain does not fall into that category. It is not a motion, it is not an address, it is not a resolution, it is not a bill; it is an amendment to a bill and nowhere in our standing orders is there a definition that defines motion, address, resolution, bill in the terms that have been put by the member for Hamilton Mountain; I would suggest to you that the suggested change is entirely within his rights and is proper and is in order.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Do you wish to speak further to the point of order, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I would only direct your attention to the phrase, "specifically direct the allocation of public funds". I believe that is pretty definite, that members of the opposition, or as a matter of fact any private member, does not have the authority to bring in this type of amendment.

Mr. Davidson: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to the point of order, I would just like to refute what the parliamentary assistant has just said. The proposal, as put by the member for Hamilton Mountain, is in no way specifically allocating the direction of public funds.

Hon. Mr. Maeck: Yes, it is.

Mr. Davidson: Raising them, not allocating them.

Mr. Peterson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I would have to say very clearly this is out of order and I have to support the minister in this particular matter. If one allowed this kind of amendment it would open a door and the floodgates to all sorts of amendments to all sorts of bills, changing tariffs or financial structures of certain taxing statutes. And clearly, in my judgement at least, the opposition has no right to introduce this. This could clearly become a matter of confidence, if you chaps so decided that it became such; and if you wanted to punish the Premier in some of his bad habits, of smoking cigars, you could certainly come out against this.

But it is my view that the opposition has no right to amend this kind of a section in a bill, and therefore we would have to side with the government on this issue.

Mr. Davidson: Do you agree with the principle?

Mr. Foulds: On a point of order, I would simply like to indicate, to the best of my knowledge,—and nothing that the Chair or any other member has pointed out has brought it to the attention of the House—that any of the subjects—if I may use the grammatical phrasing—in rule 86, which is the basis that the minister cites—have been defined or included in what my colleague from Hamilton Mountain has proposed. May I suggest that when the minister rises and uses the second half of the phrase “specifically direct the allocation,” et cetera, he must make the connection grammatically, and the connection is to bill, resolution, motion or address.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Charlton has moved that section 1, subsection 1(e) of Bill 25, An Act to amend The Tobacco Tax Act, be amended by adding after the words “90 cents and” in line six the following: “Thereafter, an addition of three cents for each additional five cents or part thereof, that the price at retail of a cigar purchased by him exceeds 90 cents”; and further that section 1, subsection 1(f) of Bill 25 be deleted.

Firstly, Mr. Charlton has moved a motion. It is a motion of amendment but it is definitely a motion as defined in clause 86. Secondly, on reading the motion and studying it, the motion does increase the amount of taxation that would be imposed on cigars and therefore is imposing a tax. Therefore it is a motion, the passage of which would impose a tax. And that is contrary to section 86 of standing orders.

I therefore must rule the motion out of order.

Mr. Foulds: I have no desire whatsoever to challenge the ruling, but I would—

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Then you may not debate the ruling.
